DESIGNED FOR THE PROMOTION OF PRACTICAL PIETY, THE DIFFUSION OF RELIGIOUS AND GENERAL INTELLIGENCE, AND THE MAINTENANCE OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 5, 1929. No. 1.

MY CHURCH AND I

My church is the place where the Word of God is preached, the power of God is felt, the Spirit of God is manifested, the love of God is revealed, and the unity of God is perceived.

It is the home of my soul, the altar of my devotion, the hearth of my faith, the center of my affections and the foretaste of heaven.

I have united with it in solemn covenant, pledging myself to attend its services, to pray for its members, to give to its support, and to obey its laws.

It claims the first place in my heart, the highest place in my mind, the principal place in my activities, and its unity, peace and progress concern my life in this world and that which is to come.

I owe it my zeal, my benevolence and my prayers. When I neglect its services I injure its good name, I lessen its power, I discourage its members, and I chill my own soul.

I have solemnly promised, in the sight of God and men, to advance its interests by my faithful attendance, by reading the Holy Bible, by never neglecting its ordinances, by contributing to its support, by meeting with my fellow members, by watching over their welfare, and by joining with them in prayer and praise and service, and that promise I this day renew, before God my Father, Christ my Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit my Sanctifier.

THE NEW YEAR.

He comes across the wide, white world,
The world of ice and snow,
Just as the Old Year, worn and wan
And weary, turns to go.
And young and fair, with smiling face,
And footsteps light and free,
The New Year marches blithely in,
And greets us cheerily.

And as the Old Year slips away,
He kindly with him takes
The pages we have blurred and marred
With failures and mistakes.
The blighted hopes and needless fears
Are gone beyond recall.
And ours once more the fair, clean page
The New Year brings to all.

A fair, clean page where we may write
A record good to read,
Of noble thought and lofty aim,
And kindly word and deed;
Of many things worth-while achieved,
Of duty nobly done,
Of righted wrongs, and grudges laid,
And evil overcome.

And so we greet the glad New Year
With strong, courageous heart,
And putting all mistakes away
Resolve to do our part
To overcome all hindrances,
To make all weights our wings,
And all our failures stepping stones
To higher, better things.

The Voice of Free Grace

The First Nation-Wide Gospel Broadcast

While evangelical truth is being broadcast over individual stations, the religious messages over the great chain networks have thus far been largely of the liberal, modernistic type. Now there has begun a national chain broadcast that is thoroughly evangelical. The Vesper sermons of the Rev. Donald Grey Barnhouse are broadcast from the historic Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, over the stations of the Columbia chain, which can be received in the United States from the Atlantic to the Rockies, and also in eastern Canada.

Mr. Barnhouse may need some introduction at the present time, as he is a young man whose work is just becoming known, but after you have heard him you will have no doubt as to his position. These sermons are not controversial; Mr. Barnhouse rides no hobbies, but seeks to lift up the Lord Jesus Christ, and to make Him real as Saviour and Lord. This is a great venture of faith undertaken in assurance that God's stewards will support this much-needed fundamental and evangelical testimony.

Mr. Barnhouse writes: "This year God has seen fit to open the door to a project so vast that we can hardly measure its possibilities. For we are really doing an unheard of thing in this nation-wide broadcast. Many people do not realize that this is the only chain broadcast of a sermon that costs anything. The broadcasts going out from New York are courtesy broadcasts, and we doubt if the ministers would be allowed to tell people that they were lost sinners, headed for a Christless eternity, and that the only way of salvation is through the blood of Jesus Christ.

"The cost of this is stupendous—We pay one thousand one hundred and ten dollars each and every Sunday for our thirty-minute broadcast. Ours is a small church with less than 500 members, but we look to God to supply our need. Let us make it plain. If the people of the country like yourself do not send in to us the thousands of dollars necessary to cover our broadcast, we will not be able to renew our options. If you want this kind of preaching on the air will you not pray that we may continue? We have received a few more substantial gifts, but many people cannot afford to give large amounts. If you can, you may be sure God will use it to His honor and glory in the salvation of souls; if you cannot, we are happy to know that you are listening in as we lift up the Lord Jesus Christ as the only hope of this world."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"God had an only son and He was a missionary."

That which one gets at the price of honor is too dearly bought.

God can and will tell us what to say, but never if we remain satisfied with empty minds.

"If you want to serve your race, go where no one else will go and do what no one else will do."

"It is evident that we need help from without, from above, not only to begin, but to continue in a right life. Some inspiring power must come down upon our failing spirit."

If you are to get the fire of God's holiness and power and love burning in your heart, you must take more time in His fellowship.—Andrew Murray.

"You have your own store, more or less, of goods, of talents, of learning, of influence. You, too, are the heir of God's bounty, the inheritor of man's providence for you. This is the serious question waiting your answer, what will you do with it?"

"Truly this was the Son of God," said one; and "Is not this the Carpenter?" said others. In pursuing His more sacred purpose He sanctified the secular side of life. The woman baking bread had His notice as well as the woman sitting in devout contemplation at His feet."

Thou dost confound the dreaming of our seers,
Though who in human guise, not flame, would bring
Our world the message of its precious tears,
Its humblest service angel-winged with thought
So hither unto Thee, O Saviour, King,
And Brother—lo, the myrrh adoring brought.

There are needs in our nature not easily satisfied here; there are prayers not completely answered while we are on the earth. Every hunger and thirst of our souls, is prophetic. What we now receive is but an earnest of an inheritance yet held in reserve for us. We are on our way to our Father's house where there waits us the exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Herein is love, not that we love God, but that He loves us. We love Him because He first loved us. It is, therefore, not so much our love for God as God's love for us that secures our final good. Our love may change as moonlight on a cloudy night. His purpose is without change or shadow of turning. Having loved His own which were in the world He loved them unto the end. It is the saving purpose of God, then, that lies beneath our Christian hopes. It is His wise hand that fills the shuttle and His unerring hand that throws in each successive thread. God is at the loom. Love fills the shuttles with their various threads. Love conceived the design of our perfect salvation and love will surely complete it in that day.

OPIATE

"Religion is opiate for the people" is the widely placarded maxim and the foundation policy of the Russian Soviet. It means that religion benumbs and paralyzes the ambitions and activities of the masses, holds them in abject submission to despotism of rulers and priests. It is not a new assertion. Persons absurdly calling themselves "Free Thinkers" have proclaimed it vociferously from time to time through centuries. Their claim to be "Free Thinkers" is absurd because they tie their minds to the material and the sensual and the narrow limitations of the physical senses and our mental equipment stifle the aspirations and impulses of the soul. The "Free Thinker" is the most abjectly compressed and slavishly restrained and restricted of all thinkers.

It is a curious fact that in each generation a loud, boastful foe of Christianity thrusts forward in every Christian country, clamoring eagerly for public attention, striving laboriously to destroy faith and hope and establish some system of life and ethics and conduct based on human reasoning and the theory that for each of us the life here is all. Following Voltaire, Paine and Volney, Robert Owen, a Scotchman, organized, about 1820, an onslaught against religion, indissoluble marriage—advocating "companionate marriage"—denouncing all ownership of property not required for the needs of the owner. Mr. Owen was not of the Robert G. Ingersoll, Darrow and Sinclair Lewis kind who have come later. He was a gentleman by birth and training, avoided their vulgarities and penny grubbing, did not deride the Deity to obtain dollars nor seek to earn a living by denying eternity. He was a man of large wealth and manifested the merit of readiness to spend his own money for spread of his doctrine. He and his father undertook, at their own cost, to establish, in Indiana, a community based on no religion, companionate marriage and no ownership of property. This went to pieces quickly, but Mr. Owen held to his confidence that this new, diversely and thinly populated and uneducated country was fertile field for his cultivation. He traveled and lectured continually, challenging the clergy to debate with him the qualities and evidences of Christianity. The challenge was accepted by the Rev. Alexander Campbell, "of Bethany College, in Virginia". The debate was conducted at Cincinnati in April, 1829, before a chosen board of moderators, continued through twenty-five days and was heard by large audiences. The stenographic report of it fills four hundred and sixty-five pages of a book of usual size. Apparently Mr. Owen did not win many disciples. When the several hundred people present on the closing day were called on to vote but three persons arose to indicate acceptance of his teachings.

His leading idea—precisely like that of the present Russian leaders—was that if children were taken by the government and from infancy taught their duties to the world and themselves and intelligent knowledge of fact and history they would be delivered from the thraldom of religion and made virtuous, peaceful and happy by power of their own reasoning.

It is interesting to consider some of Mr. Owen's assertions and predictions in connection with conditions of the present, a hundred years since they were uttered. He said:

"Religions are directly opposed to the never changing laws of our nature. They have been, and are, the real source of vice, disunion and misery of every description and are now the only real bar to the formation of a society of virtue, of intelligence, of charity in its most extended sense."

Speaking of the method and rituals of Christianity, he said: "The time is now near at hand when these worse than childish proceedings must give place to the plain and simple law of obedience to one uniform practice in accordance to the divine laws of human nature."

Another of Mr. Owen's contentions was thus defined: "The errors which the various religions of the world have forced into the minds of the human race have been the cause of all the poverty which now exists; first, by creating universal disunion among men, and secondly by the large appropriation of the time and gains of the people to the clergy."

Again: "To expect the tree of religion to produce the fruit of charity were just as irrational as to expect figs from thorns or grapes from thistles. How, indeed, is it possible that religion and intelligence ever can exist together? If we are ever to become people truly intelligent our first preliminary step must be to discard all religious It will be easy in practice to give more knowledge requisite to happiness to a population in ten years to come than the world has been permitted to acquire in two thousand years."

Mr. Owen urged also that the doctrines of Christianity made the only obstacle to the most important improvement, were the greatest bar to the progress of knowledge; and on this he based the promise that what he was saying would be found soon to be the most valuable truth to which his audience ever had listened. The most intelligent of the population of Europe, he said, had abandoned religion to the ignorant and credulous, and he was confident that the same would happen here. "If the Christian doctrines were to continue to form your character for ten thousand years," he said, "they would make you worse than you are today; for they are daily becoming more incongruous compared with the knowledge derived from the growing experience of the world."

One night last year 75,000 people of all types, classes and ages were gathered in an American city to see a prize fight. As the pugilists were about to enter the ring the official announcer spoke briefly to the excited crowd. An American boy, he said, was at that moment over the sea, flying alone from this country to Europe. The prize fight announcer asked that all unite in two minutes of silent prayer for the boy's safety. Newspapers reported that every man—including, doubtless, some desperate ruffians and criminals—responded to the appeal and stood with bared head during the suggested time. Last month the winner of that fight presented to the British Marines, in behalf of his former comrades of the American Marines, a piece of plate as a memorial of joint service in the Boxer Rebellion in China. The ex-prize fighter, as the ceremony ended, requested all to join in brief silent prayer for recovery of the English king. The hard-boiled, hard-fighting devil dogs complied instantly, confessing outwardly, at least, allegiance to the Creator and the dependence on His Mercy and Power of all kings and nations.

Recent statistics show two-thirds of the adult population of this country members of religious organizations, more than fifty million professing Christians, which is fourteen million more than the total vote in the national election, over four times the entire population of the Union of 1829. The growth and progress of the country have been beyond Mr. Owen's wildest imaginings. The diffusion of education and the diffusion of wealth and the advancement in scientific attainment and achievement in the hundred years of dominance of Christianity here have extended the precedents of all history and astounded mankind. The benefactions for religious and charitable and educational purposes in our own land and for other lands are so enormous as to make all those of the past seem trivial. This religion ruled nation, tested in war and peace, has become the strongest, richest and most peaceful of all the nations, the world's leading moral force, the most bountiful and consistent contributor to the world's welfare, comfort and improvement.

We have much to do toward cleansing and lifting ourselves, much sin to be fought and folly to be corrected. Surely, however, we stand as living refutation of the predictions of the brilliant and diligent Mr. Owen that adherence to religion would emasculate and destroy us; and to the proclamation of the Soviet that religion is opiate for the people. These United States certainly give no evidence in the last century of their history of being benumbed, paralyzed or dragged to helpless slumber.

Alfred B. Williams.

R. I. P.

James W. Morris

IT is well known to competent and discriminating students of the Catacombs of Rome, that in the earliest epitaphs the letters R. I. P. stood for the words, "Requiels it in pace", i. e., "He rests in peace", and not for the words, "Requiescat in pace", "May he rest in peace". Primitive Christians had no doubt that the dead in Christ did rest in peace; they would not, even in prayer, cast doubt upon that blessed assurance. It is said that 6,000 epitaphs from the Catacombs have been catalogued, and that of these only one hundred and twenty have the consular date. Of these, one only is from the first century, two are from the second century and twenty-three date from the third century. Not one of these earliest inscriptions contain any prayer for the dead, while later epitaphs abound in such prayers. "The quiet and thankful certainty that all is well with those who have gone in to see the King," is changed later to a wistful longing that it may be well with them.

The so-called primitive liturgies, as they are called, are certainly not apostolic productions. Their material has been modified from time to time, and a great part of it is late. Says Dr. Wright, "The primitive liturgies, as they are termed, are documents to which only a limited amount of credence can be given. . . . The text is uncertain, and as a whole, they cannot be depended on as evidence of apostolic doctrine".

One of the earliest of these liturgies—perhaps the earliest of them all—that of Alexandria, belonging probably to the middle of the second century, gives the order for Holy Communion in full, and in it, there is no hint of prayer for the departed. Dean Luckoh admits that out of the vast number of these early liturgies, used widely in the Church, only two have prayers suggesting suffrage for the blessed dead.

If this practice were apostolic we should get clearer evidence of it, the nearer we get to apostolic times. Now it is Tertulian of Africa, living in the last quarter of the second century, who first refers to prayers for the departed, and that in doubtful terms. But the post-apostolic fathers, such as Clement of Rome, Ignacius of Antioch, Polycarp and Justin Martyr, are silent on the subject. The remains of these writers, it is true (extending from 100 to 150 A. D.), are not abundant, but the entire absence of any mention of a practice supposed to be apostolic, in writings so near to the apostolic times, should be conclusive.

It would seem, too, that the Holy Scripture is clear on this point. We remember our dear ones awaiting the final adoption and redemption with unclouded and happy confidence, not with intercessions for blessings upon them, but rather with thanksgiving to God that "they who depart hence in the Lord are in joy and felicity". Clearly to pray that the faithful departed may have peace and rest, happiness and holy progress, is to fill the mind with grave doubt as to the sure promises of God. According to His faithful word, i. e., a word to be relied on and entirely trusted, departed Christians are now in Paradise, they are with Christ, they are like angels. They have spread over them the tabernacle of God's presence. They are at home with the Lord. They sin no more, they suffer no more, they die no more. In short, they are perfected in holiness and happiness to the limit of capacity and present possibility, and of their future progress and growth in holiness and happiness and heavenly knowledge there is no cloud of uncertainty—only sure and joyful anticipation. Indeed, the assured hope and the certain expectation of ever-increasing light shining is one of the supreme delights of the redeemed in Christ. This state is never static or stagnant; it is ever onward in the knowledge of God, and of His glorious activities and will—and yet with no shadow of doubt or fear. Not only is the past unsighed for, but the future is sure.

And so there is no good ground either in reason or in Scripture for the meticulous contrast so often drawn between Paradise and Heaven. The joys and happiness of heaven are given in Paradise. Paradise is a part of heaven; for surely to be with Christ is heaven—to be at Home with the Lord is to be in heaven. The distinction is not of kind, it is one of degree. Paradise is the first stage in heaven's endless eras of felicitous progress in knowledge and service. And after the great final day of bodily resurrection, then shall be further and higher glories awaiting the sons of God. Indeed, the holy angels, not less than human saints, are ever pressing onward to greater heights of life and knowledge and experience of God's being and wisdom as manifested in His boundless and timeless creation.

Browning in the "Death in the Desert", proclaims progress as the distinctive march of man, separating him both from God above him and from the beasts below him. Says he:

"God is, beasts are; man partly is and wholly hopes to be."

What he says of man, may be said as well of all finite rational beings. Only God is growthless, entirely perfect in His completed and self-sufficient Being. Finite creatures have as a part of their eternal happiness endless progress in holiness and knowledge—a progress that is sure in all its stages and complete in each several stage.

And so for the dead in Christ Paradise is in effect heaven. They enjoy all that heaven can give, with the exception only of the crown of the Great Day. They are not in a state of precarious purification and probation: they are numbered among the saints in glory.

ROBERT E. LEE

By the Late John W. Daniel, LL. D.

Premonitions of the End—The March to Appomattox.

VAIN was the mighty struggle, led by the peerless Lee. Genius planned, valor executed, patriotism stripped itself of every treasure, and heroism fought and bled and died—and all in vain! When the drear winter of 1864 came at last, there came also premonitions of the end. "The very seed-corn of the Confederacy had been ground up," as President Davis said. The people sat at naked tables and slept in sheetless beds, for their apparel had been used to bind up wounds. The weeds grew in fenceless fields, for the plow-horse was pulling the cannon. The church-yard and the mansion fences were stripped of their leaden ornaments, that the musket and the rifle might not lack for bullets. The church bells, now melted into cannon, pealed forth the dire notes of war. The land was drained of its substance, and the Army of Northern Virginia was nearly exhausted for want of food and raiment. All through the bleak winter days and nights its decimated and shivering ranks still faced the dense batallions of Grant, in misery and want not less than that which stained the snows of Valley Forge; and the army seemed to live only on its innate, indomitable will, as oftentimes we see some noble mind survive when the physical powers of nature have been exhausted. Like a rock of old ocean, it had received, and broken, and hurled back into the deep in bloody foam those swiftly succeeding waves of four years of incessant battle but now the rock itself was wearing away, and still the waves came on.

A new enemy was now approaching the sturdy, devoted band. In September, 1864, Atlanta fell, and through Georgia to the sea, with fire and sword, swept the victorious columns of Sherman. In January, 1865, the head of the column had been turned northward; and in February, Columbia and Charleston shared the fate that had already befallen Savannah. Yes, a new enemy was approaching the Army of Northern Virginia, and this time in the rear. The homes of the soldiers of the Army of Northern Virginia from the Southern States were now in ashes. Wives, mothers and sisters were wanderers under the winter skies, flying from the invaders who smote and spared not in their relentless march. Is it wonder that hearts that never quailed before bayonet or blade beat now with tremulous and irrepressible emotion? Is it wonder that, in the watches of the night, the sentinel in the trenches tortured to excruciation with the thought that those dearest of earth to him were without an arm to save, felt his soul sink in anguish and his hope perish? So it was, that with hunger and nakedness as its companions, and foes in front and foes in rear, the Army of Northern Virginia seemed bound to the rock of fate.

On April 1 the left wing of Grant's massive lines swept around the right and rear of Lee. Gallantly did Pickett and his men meet and resist them at Five Oaks; but that commanding strategic point was taken, and the fall of Petersburg and of Richmond alike became inevitable. On the next day, April 2, they were evacuated. Grant was now on a shorter line, projected toward Danville, than Lee, and the latter commenced at once that memorable retreat towards Lynchburg, which ended at Appomattox.

The Battle of Appomattox—The Last Charge.

Over that march of desperate valor disrupting fate, as over the face of a hero in the throes of dissolution, I throw the blood-reeking battle-flag, rent with wounds, as a veil. And I hail heroic army and its heroic chief, as on the ninth of April morn, they stand embattled in calm and stern repose, ready to die with their harness on— warriors every inch, without fear, without stain. Around the little hamlet of Appomattox Courthouse is gathered the remnant of the Army of Northern Virginia—less than 8,000 men with arms in their hands—less than 27,000 all told, counting camp followers and stragglers; and around them in massive concentric lines the army of Grant, flushed with success and expectation—more than 80,000 strong upon the field, and with each hour bringing up reinforcements. "The environed army, with a valor all Spartan, stand ready to die, not indeed in response to civic laws denying surrender, but obedient to the lofty impulse of honor." Can they cut through? Does the dream of a saved Confederacy yet beckon them on beyond the wall of steel and fire that girdles them? Can they find fighting ground in the Carolinas with Joseph E. Johnston, who, among the first to meet the foe, proves amongst the last to leave him? Can these dauntless foemen yet cleave a path to the inner country, and renew the unequal strife? Not till that hope is tested will they yield!

As the day dawns, a remnant of the cavalry under Fitz Lee is forming, and Gordon's infantry, scarce two thousand strong, are touching elbows for the last charge. Once more the thrilling rebel cheer rings through the Virginia woods, and with all their wonted fierceness they fall upon Sheridan's men. Ah! yes, victory still clings to the tattered battle-flags. Yes, the troopers of our gallant Fitz, are as dauntless as when they followed the plume of Stuart, "the flower of cavaliers". Yes, the matchless infantry of "tattered uniforms and bright muskets" under Gordon, the brave, move with as swift, intrepid tread as when of old—Stonewall led the way. Soldiers of Manassas, of Richmond, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, of the Wilderness, of Spotsylvania, of Cold Harbor, of Petersburg—scarred and sinewy veterans of fifty fields, your glories are still about you, your manhood is triumphant still. Yet, the blue lines break before them; two cannons and many prisoners are taken, and for two miles they sweep the fields towards Lynchburg—victors still!

But no, too late! too late! Behind the flying sabres and rifles of Sheridan rise the bayonets and frown the batteries of the Army of the James, under Ord—a solid phalanx stands right athwart the path of Fitz Lee's and Gorden's men. Too late! the die is cast! The doom is sealed! There is no escape. The eagle is quarried in his eyre; the wounded lion is haunted to his lair!

And so the guns of the last charge died away in the morning air; and echo, like the sob of a mighty sea, rolled up the valley of the James, and all was still. The last fight of the Army of Northern Virginia had been fought. The end had come. The smoke vanished. The startled birds renewed their songs over the stricken field; the battle smell was drowned in the fragrance of the flowering spring. And the ragged soldiers of the South, God bless him! stood there facing the dread reality, more terrible than death—stood there to grapple with the face down despair, for he had done his all, and all was lost, save honor!

Surrender.

General Lee, dressed in his best uniform, rides to the front to meet General Grant. For several days demands for surrender had been rejected—now surrender was inevitable. And the two commanding officers meet at the McLean House to concert its terms. The first and abiding thought of Lee was the honor of his men, for he had determined to "cut his way through at all hazards, if such terms were not granted as he thought his army was entitled to demand". "General," said Lee, addressing Grant, and opening the conversation, "I deem it due to proper candor and frankness to say at the beginning of this interview that I am not willing even to discuss any terms of surrender, inconsistent with the honor of my army, which I am determined to maintain to the last." Grant gave fitting and magnanimous response, and the honorable terms demanded were agreed to. "The officers to retain their side arms, private horses and baggage," and "each officer and man to be allowed to return to his home," and, mark it, "not to be disturbed by United States authority as long as they observe their parole, and the laws in force where they reside".

Thus at last was the liberty of the soldier purchased with his blood.

And so the Army of Northern Virginia, never broken in battle, passed from action in history; so it perished by the flashing of the guns, while victory hung charmed to its flag, and threw upon its tomb the immortelles of Honor.

> "The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
> And God fulfills Himself in many ways."

Farewell.

"Men, we have fought through the war together. I have done my best or you; my heart is too full to say more," was Lee's utterance to the ragged, battle-begrimed boys in gray, who, when the dread news of surrender spread among them, gathered around him to shake his hand and testify their undying confidence and love. In his published address he said to them: "You will carry with you the satisfaction that proceeds from the consciousness of duty faithfully performed, and I earnestly pray that a merciful God will extend to you His blessing and protection. With an unceasing admiration of your constancy and devotion to your country, and a grateful remembrance of your kind and generous consideration of myself, I bid you an affectionate farewell."

As Robert Lee rode from Appomattox toward Richmond, he carried with him the heart of every man that fought under him—linked to him with hooks of steel forever. When he reached the fallen Capital of the dead Confederacy, and rode through its ashes and paling fires to his home, a body of Federal soldiers there, catching a glimpse of his noble countenance, lifted their hats and cheered; and as the great actor in the bloody drama stepped behind the scenes, and the curtain fell upon the tragic stage of the secession war, the last sounds that greeted his ears were the generous salutations of respect from those against whom he had wielded his knightly sword.

NOON-TIDE---A LITTLE PHILOSPHY

By the Late John L. Williams

"I will make a man more precious than fine gold."

"Their pastures shall be in all high places."
—Holy Writ.

"Nil arduum mortalibus" (Nothing too difficult for mortals).—Horace.

NO matter how long the period was in which our Earth was in chaos and darkness and getting ready for business, the time came for what to us is The Beginning. The command was given: Let there be Light, and there was Light. Out of the dark backward and Abysism of Time there arose the Dawn of the Period of Humanity. The wisdom and power of the Almighty was manifested in the divine order of the firmament: the sea and land: the lights in the firmament—the sun, moon, and stars: the moving creatures in the air and in the seas: the beasts and cattle. All things were very good: and the Earth was ready for its lord, after the divine image. And the Beautiful Pair, man and woman, were set up in Paradise.

To man, fresh from the hand of God, was given dominion: and the Earth, with all that was in it of life and wealth, was put under his feet.

The Devil knew all about the dignity and greatness of man. It never entered into his head to insult or degrade or slander him that way, by declaring him only a clod, made of dust and ashes: or a merely chemical combination. Such a low thought was beneath his dignity: reserved for a lesser intelligence, claiming descent from the ape or orang-outang—his handiwork.

According to the best and most respectable records that we have, after six days or periods God looked upon all that He had created and behold it was very good: and man took possession of his patrimony: and human history began. The Devil recognized the divine royalty of the Prince, and with all his diabolic skill, set himself to work to make man disloyal, to set him up and defy the Supreme Being. Thence came man's abasement, and lawlessness, and all human wickedness and woes. Chaos and darkness overwhelmed humanity. And the emerging of it and restoration of light and order has made our history.

The war between godlessness and loyalty, between darkness and light, between vice and virtue, between misery and happiness, between wickedness and righteousness, has been a long one fought at every point, all along the line.

Man's immortality has been denied and the truth of God's Word has been discredited. Human intellect has been sensualized and raised the defiant banner of Satan against the Great Creator.

Geology is the Bible of the disloyal scientists. Strata are its books: seams is chapters: monsters its patriarchs: skeletons its monuments: stalactites and stalagmites its chronology: and the slow marks of fire and floods its records: and the deceivableness of unrighteousness its unreasonable guide. Fortunately their ambrosial nights where their high science revels are far above the common people, who walk in the ground instead of in the air: who are the meek to whom mysteries are revealed.

According to the best light of modern civilization, human history began a little over 6,000 years ago. And it looks wonderfully like we have reached the Seventh or Sabatic period of our existence.

We began with a terrific disaster: and out of chaos and darkness have been working our way upwards.

Beyond making tents and musical instruments and things of brass and iron, and having children, nothing is recorded of early advancing lives. We are only left to infer from history that our progenitors made bad use of their brass and iron, as at last they were altogether given to violence, and all but one family were destroyed.

The first chapter, after the flood, tells of weakness and misbehavior and punishment: of daring ambitions, enterprise, confusion and scattering. And at last one man is chosen—the Father of the Faithful and friend of God—to be the witness of Divine Truth, the author of our civilization. And from Abraham have sprung all the godly of later times, as the stars of Heaven for multitude. And our history has been that of advancing Truth and Righteousness, through and over darkness and vice and wickedness. Abraham was the Dawn.

The face of the earth tells of how artificers in brass and iron and stone have accomplished great works, like the Pyramids of Egypt and Temples of Thebes and Palmyra: and equally of Idolatry and human degradation and misery and of giant forms of empire, rising, culminating and falling away.

The only plain, intelligible and sacredly preserved record of humanity is what the civilized world reveres as the Holy Bible: the Sacred Scriptures. And only in those sacred pages are to be found the rise, growth and establishment of modern civilization: which is identified with Christendom.

The First Creation was the giving of Light and the Establishment of Order.

The foundations of our civilization were laid in the writing of the Ten Commandments: our moral and intellectual Firmament.

The day-break was the consecration of the Universal Fatherhood and Brotherhood of mankind by the Lord's Prayer: the Great Seal of the Messianic Kingdom.

The Grand Sun Rise of Humanity was the Resurrection of Jesus Christ: God manifest in the flesh.

Such was the Grand Progression that culminated on Easter morning: to make an end of sin: to make reconciliation for iniquity: to bring in everlasting righteousness: to seal up the vision and prophecy: and to anoint the Most Holy: to begin the Annus Mirabilis to seal up vision and prophecy with the Anno Domini—in the year of our Lord.

For 2,000 years the Sun of our Righteousness has been rising, and by its light dispelling dark clouds of ignorance and overspreading and enlightening and humanizing the world. Not by power and might, but with the poorest and weakest ministers by the spirit of Love and Truth, overcoming all the powers of darkness, cruelty and vice.

To a calm and philosophic mind all human history is that of the Light penetrating and overcoming darkness and confusion until our century is reached and presents itself as the Day—the novus ordo saeclorum—the new order of things—the desired of all nations.

With the dark past the contrast is overwhelming: the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries before all the world as the Latter Day—the Noon-Tide of Time.

The man of our day, well bred, well taught, enlightened, thoroughly informed, well equipped and familiar with the great principles and truths of science and facts of history, is lord of creation, a citizen of the world and of all time: the fulfilment of the highest, largest dreams and prophecies of all time. And the Happy Pair, made up of such, man and woman, make a household that have no favors to ask of the divine originals. The average citizenship of the whole world is the highest that has ever existed.

The Bright Light and Inspiration. The very air of our time, is essentially Messianic and Christian: bespeaks a manhood after the Divine Image.

We are so familiar with great ideas and experiences that we hardly recognize their greatness until we look back to the past. All the light of all the past is centred on us: so that concentration is the Light we live in. All the powers of all the past are in our hands, and so Intensity is our way of studying and acting. Electricity has given us a light and heat like that of the sun. And chemical and mechanical science has given us power that seems to have no limit. Encyclopedias, digests, handbooks and formulas give us historic and scientific knowledge unlimited. They are comparable to stored electricity and liquid air —that make Aladdin's lamp to be believed.

Our privileges suggest man at his highest. We deal familiarly with all the mysterious powers and ways of Nature: the active principles of vegetables and minerals. Nature's economics are our guides; maximum and minimum, centres of gravity and force. We tear up acres of rock with our explosives, and wash down mountains with our hydralics: we make ways through the air with our wire bridges and balloons. We explore the depths of Earth and Heaven. We study the remotest star, and the ultimate atom. And we annihilate time and space. We face familiarly the possibilities of omnipotence and ubiquity —as of a divine parentage. And we are prepared to recognize as an elder brother the Son of Man—God manifest in the flesh. And He alone solves the Problem of Life.

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

II SAMUEL.

THIS second book called by the name of Samuel, is the divinely inspired complement of the first book of Samuel.

Subject.

The Subject of 2 Samuel is God's sovereign grace revealed toward Israel in enthroning and blessing the rule of David, "the man after His own heart", that is the man who obeyed God in his official acts as king (1 Sam. 13:14).

1. Chs. 1-5. God's grace and faithfulness in establishing David on the throne, first in Hebron (Fellowship) and then in Jerusalem (Foundation of peace).

2. Chs. 6-7. David bringing the Ark into Jerusalem, and receiving the promise of Christ as his eternal Successor on his throne.

3. Chs. 8-10. David's victory over all his enemies and his showing "the kindness of God" to Mephiboseth.

4. Chs. 11-21. God's marvelous grace shown in the forgiveness of David's great sin, and God's righteousness manifest in His governmental ways with David and his house.

5. Ch. 22. Song of victory, telling of David's deliverance out of the hand of all his enemies, and above all revealing the glory of Christ.

6. Ch. 23.—Christ the only true King, predicted by the Holy Spirit, and the mighty men of David's army, types of those who will rule with Him.

7. Ch. 24. The Temple site selected after David's sin of pride and ambition was judged and put away by sacrifice.

WHAT HAPPENS AT CALVARY CHURCH IN NEW YORK

By A. S. R., A Member of the Staff

CALVARY Church has always been a missionary church. We are poorer than we used to be, but we pay our apportionments and we fill our boxes. Historically, we rejoice that in 1874 the first general meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held here. But in 1925, when the Rev. S. M. Shoemaker, Jr., came from a missionary journey around the world to work out the missionary vision in a parish, a new emphasis was laid. He knew from experience, that Christ's promise to Peter implied that any layman who follows Him, can be a fisher of men, and he saw that his first job lay, not with a congregation, but with individual men and women. He knew they could be taught, not only to angle for but to land fish, for he had seen good fishing done by laymen, not only in China and India, but in England and America. He saw in a shabby old church in the heart of a city, the opportunity to do a more specific job than draw a congregation to fill the nearly empty pews. He saw it as a place where rich men and poor men, business men, professional men, mothers of families, wage earners, and all the drift wood that floats past the business street where it is situated, drunks, thieves, prostitutes; liars, selfish people, wilful people, possessive people, could find a new way of life—a way nearly 2,000 years old, but new to them.

But he saw more than that. He saw it as a place where all of these types, if won, could pass on the experience to others. He began on the nearest person. It was a hot June in an exhausted city when he came to his cure, and the organist was close at hand, so for him he cast. He landed him, and soon afterwards a stenographer, a dissipated Jew, a preparatory school boy. With this little nucleus he began his training center. The Thursday Night Group is known now in places all over the world, and in obscure corners of America. The group itself meets in an unpropitious place. While a new parish house is building, we fill pretty uncomfortable camp chairs in the old gymnasium. Last winter it was no uncommon thing to have every one of the one hundred and sixty chairs filled, and anywhere up to twenty-five more people standing. Mr. Shoemaker, under a basket-ball net, with the group in a semi-circle around him, opens the meeting with a prayer for the presence of the Holy Spirit in the place: for guidance for whoever speaks. Then cheerfully, informally, he begins. One night it may be with an analysis of the interview between Christ and the woman at the well: how He drew her out, brought conviction of sin, and how she went out to tell a whole city full. Or it may be the story of some one who had surrendered the night before, then with his eyes twinkling he asks:

"I wonder if Bill hasn't something for us tonight. It came during Quiet in staff meeting this morning this morning that he would lead off."

"That's all right with me, Sam," calls a boy of twenty-five from the back of the room.

"Guess you better come up here," says S. M. S., Jr. "Crowd's too big to hear you tonight where you are." Bill, as big and handsome and attractive a youngster as ever made a club and a team at Princeton, drops into a chair by the leader. "I've been having a great time," he says, and shows twice as many teeth as anybody ever had, as he says it. "When I remember the kind of a cuss I was four years ago, how I was so unhappy in college (although I seemed to have everything), that I got drunk just to escape myself—and think of now—!" Then he tells the story of a boy who "came through with him" the week before, the son of a missionary, by the way.

The meetings of this group are better drama than any that goes on on Broadway, but it is not held merely to interest people. The purpose is to give a chance to make real to outsiders a guided life, through stories of changed lives, and to take members of the fellowship further in their experience of Christ by witnessing as to what has happened up to date. Sometimes an old story is told, but usually the group is kept vital by the feel of a flow of life. No evening is successful if after it interviews are not held or arranged.

The other night I saw here a Bishop of our Church soon to return to China; a Mohammedan, Christian by decision, who is studying at a seminary; a secretary of a Y. W. C. A. from the Middle West; a wealthy business man from New Jersey; a charming girl with her husband from Tennessee. She had read Mr. Shoemaker's book, "Children of the Second Birth", and coveted for herself and her family the confidence and joy of the people whose stories are recorded there; a curate from a neighboring parish, discouraged because his own ministry was arid, here he might find a new hope and the motive power to reach it.

The Thursday group is not parochial. At least half those who come represent other denominations than ours. Christ didn't live and die fussing over creeds and church organization. He lived and died that men might know His Father. Somebody asked me the other day why our vestry stood for a Thursday group and a clergy and staff as much concerned to bring an experience of Christ to a Presbyterian as to an Episcopalian! We work with human lives, not with creeds, and the freedom with which the clergy of other denominations come to examine our work shows that they have no fear that our aim is to build up Calvary Parish. Practically it does do that, for people who come to New York City from a distance join us—there is never a Sunday service that does not see visitors from other churches. But though we welcome them, we urge them to go back to work in their own parishes, and we help them by sending from the Thursday group, people to testify in the groups which they start in their own parishes. The rector has two assistants, and besides the regular services, meetings, sick calls and ordinary calling, they all spend a lot of time in interviews with individuals. It is no unusual thing to see lights in the rectory study in the middle of the night, and to glimpse through the windows Mr. Shoemaker talking to some man in spiritual need. But what could three men do in a city parish? They could only scratch the surface of the work to be done, for many interviews last for hours. So they spend themselves not only in winning individuals, but in training as many of these as they can to do the job that they are doing. They challenge us to surrender our own wills and then through directed, guided living, to become fishers of men.

How can we be sure that guidance is from Him, and not born of our own wilful desire? First, it must be checked by four standards, those of absolute honesty, purity, unselfishness and love. For instance, a boy in a great medical school faced at the time of his surrender by the possibility that God wanted him free of all local responsibility, came to some of us in the fellowship to "check" his guidance. His mother had died years before in South Africa without the perfect care that he craved for her, and there had then been born a dream of a great hospital in that, her native land, which he should found. Was there too much of personal ambition here? Was he ready to see this dream unrealized, or carried out by some one else? We sat together on a fallen tree overlooking a wide stretch of country at Minnewaska, New York, where we were both attending a series of meetings of A First Century Christian Fellowship, and "checked guidance". We had quiet together and listened for what God had to say to us, and it came clearly to us as it had to others, that God wanted him to work out the healing message of Christ's power, through healing men's bodies as well as their spirits. All uncertainty gone, he went back joyful to finish his studies.

An older man, a graduate of a great university, was faced with the possibility of changing his life's work. He was the executive and personnel manager of a factory, a high-salaried official who had been able to use his position to give men changed at Calvary Mission a new chance at a job and self-respect. Ex-bums without references or creditable experiences found a chance through him. Some of us felt that here was a great opportunity to work out the Message in business; that he was needed where he was, to show what Christ could do in industritl relations; but we had to be willing to help him find God's will. He has resigned his position, after witnessing to the head of his company and widely among the employees, and now, although no longer young, he has entered a theological seminary and expects to be some day working in the ministry.

A woman with a statewide reputation in child welfare and in organized recreation and in politics, has slowly withdrawn from work of this kind, not because it is not good, and needed, but because for her the call is to deal with sin in individual human lives through sharing her experience of the cleansing power of Christ. She has to work for a better world through better human lives, now, instead of through better institutions. She was an ambitious, self-willed woman, and her present work can have none of the rewards of her old life—but after thirty-five years of compromise in order to get through organization what she wanted, she has found the greater reward of helping without compromise other women to find what she has found. She said in a meeting recently that she now knew the "answer" to life, and with it had come a satisfaction and joy that she had never known before.

I could go on endlessly telling stories: of a newsboy who still runs his newstand, but gives all his spare time to working with boys and men: of a bondsalesman who uses investments in order to make as many contacts as possible with men who need the dynamic of a religious experience; but it isn't necessary.

The guidance of the Holy Spirit isn't on trial at Calvary. We have seen it work in too many lives to call it coincidence, or chance, or human decision. We know it for what it is—God's direct contact with human life. At Calvary we believe that the call is to lay people as well as to the clergy. We know that very ordinary men can get extraordinary results, and without theological training.

The Kingdom cannot come until you and I hear the call, each of us for our own lives: and we have to answer it by our own surrendered wills, before we can make others hear it.

Leadership as the Girls' Friendly Society Sees It

The place of the leader in any organization of young people today is interpreted by Alice Simrall in the November issue of The Record of The Girls' Friendly Society. Miss Simrall writes:

"One of the immutable laws of life is that relationships change with changing experiences. A person who tries to make any tie of love or friendship a static, fixed thing, will find that he has killed the very thing he was guarding so jealously. As this is true in our personal life, so is it true in the life of an organization; and we are finding, in The Girls' Friendly Society that gradually and almost imperceptibly the relationship of the associate (the leaders) to the branch and to the member has changed in certain very fundamental ways. The conferences and meetings at the General Convention seemed to reveal these changes, making apparent the thing which had been slowly and steadily happening.

"When the G. F. S. was first organized, girls and women had little or no independence and little chance for self-expression. In those days the associates were called upon to be counsellors and friends, to plan and organize the life of the branch and, for the greater part, to do the work. They were older and more experienced women, and they not only blazed the trail and led the way, but they carried the packs as well.

"Things are indeed changed now. Girls are no longer dependent and untried. From their earliest school days they are taught to make their own decisions, to carry responsibilities, to initiate and put through new enterprises; and in the G. F. S. the girls—be they juniors or seniors—are making branch policies and putting them into effect. They know what they want and they are making those wants articulate. No longer is the associate leading the way, the girls following; but as a united band, associates and members are pressing forward together.

"This new condition is here, and sometimes we find the associate asking, "What is my place? What is left for me to do?" In some respects our meetings in Washington have crystallized this situation and have made the way plain to us. The function of the associate is no longer that of general director, chief mechanic, and carrier of the packs. She is, indeed, that much more important person, a counsellor and friend. And as she has been freed of the pressure of things to be done, she has begun to see the greater opportunity which is here: the opportunity for spiritual leadership. She is still the older and more experienced woman; and since she need no longer blaze the trail nor carry the packs, she has the time and leisure to observe and see where the road is leading, to interpret the meaning of the signs along the way, to warn of dangers sometimes, to point out wayside beauties, and to try for herself and her girls to envision the goal at the end of the road. As in the old days the associates struggled to learn to do the things through which the needs of the branch could be met, so today she is bending every effort to see ways through which she can enter into her new heritage.

"The relationship of associates to members, with all that that relationship has meant to both, has been to my mind, the greatest contribution which the Girls' Friendly Society has made to Girls' Work; unless the essential values of this relationship can be conserved, the entire character of the society will be changed.

"Therefore, we feel that the place of the associate must be re-interpreted, not as a position, but as a relationship, not as a director or as an administrator, but as a spiritual leader. The place of the associate is not gone, she has but entered into wider fields where greater and more difficult things are asked of her in the service of the King."

Our Years Are as a Tale That is Told

By B. A. M. Schapiro.

The year is swiftly waning,
The summer days are past;
And life, brief life is speeding,
The end is nearing fast.

The ever-changing seasons
In silence come and go;
But Thou, Eternal Father,
No time or change cans't know.

Oh! pour Thy grace upon us,
That we may worthier be,
Each year that passes o'er us,
To dwell in Heaven with Thee.

Our barren hearts make fruitful
With every goodly grace,
That we Thy name may hallow,
And see, at last, Thy face.

"Let the peace of God rule in your hearts, and be ye thankful; let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." —Col. 3:15, 16.

THE LIVING CHURCH ANNUAL; THE CHURCHMAN'S YEAR BOOK; THE AMERICAN CHURCH ALMANAC—FOR 1929. The combined edition of the above is published by Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wis. Cloth, $1.50; paper, $1.00.

This important publication, covering the organization and activities of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, is a very interesting volume to Church people. We note that the American Church Almanac is in its ninety-ninth year. The Churchman's Almanac is seventy-six years old and the Living Church Annual has been published forty-eight years. For eight years the three have been published together. A vast amount of information is given in a well-arranged order. The marvel is that all this material can be gathered and printed and sold at so small a price.

There are 6,237 clergy, thirty more than last year. Candidates for orders are 440 and 462 postulants, offering 900 men to replenish the ministry, or nearly 15 per cent of the total number of the clergy and more than 15 per cent of the active clergy working in parishes. This would indicate that our clergy supply is reasonably safe.

We have 8,269 parishes and missions after 131 have been recently closed. These are sufficient to care for our membership and adherents. The average would be about 200 to a parish.

The baptisms are also encouraging. The total for the year is 70,424, showing a net gain of 2,088 over last year. There was a falling off in adult baptisms, but children and infants gained 2,976 in a total of 55,760.

Confirmations reached a total of 65,288, a small increase over last year. The total communicants in the Church is reported as: 1,241,828, with baptized persons as 1,877,-813. These figures show increases of 22,887 confirmed persons and 88,771 in our baptized members.

The numbers in our Church Schools (Sunday) for some years have wavered around half a million scholars. This year the totals are 487,505 pupils and 58,477 teachers. This is not a promising exhibit. For the past ten years the Church Schools have not shown any considerable growth and it is due to several causes. The home is the chief cause, and the difficulty of enlisting capable, consecrated men and women of faith, as teachers, is another. The forces arrayed against the Church Schools are growing in power and number. It requires much faith and courage in the church to overcome them.

The whole Church contributed nearly forty-six millions in money, an increase of $1,184,213.41 over last year. Doubtless the actual amount expended by the Church was in excess of these figures.

Editorially we are told by the book that "Figures do not tell us much as to the state of the Church". This is true. The Church of ours could be a tremendous spiritual force if it were so minded. The foundations of it were laid in the faith in a supernatural revelation, and it has brought this message to us after nearly two thousand years. A simple but profound faith built it up and made it a power that has changed the world. It has given the world a spiritual vision able to transform it and bring it near to the love and self-sacrificing service we attribute to God. If the Church can continue to do this the reason for her existence is manifest.

Evangelism in the Church

S. L. Vail.

In his commendatory preface to the Hand-Book, "Evangelism in the Church" (Schaad), issued by the Commission on Preaching Missions, Bishop Gailor says:

"It is a practical application of the truth that the Church is not a 'mutual admiration society' or a mere refuge for the sinful and sorrowful, but the organized army of the followers of Christ, who are pledged by their baptism to 'fight manfully under His banner' and labor for the extension of His Kingdom."

"Mutual admiration societies" are not helps in the extension of Christ's Kingdom. The Pharisees were mutual admirers, and were Christ's worst enemies. The Church, therefore, is not to be numbered among these transgressors. We are not mutual admirers. Within the Church (as a whole) the reverse seems to be true today. But when the "Rits" and the "Prots" within our own Communion point the finger of scorn at one another and say, "You are to blame for the Church being as idle as a painted picture", it is equivalent to "the pot calling the kettle black"; for aping Rome or flirting with Pan-Protestantism can accomplish very little in the way of Church Extension, from our Standpoint, as liberal and loyal Churchmen. Let us be loyal to our own Church, with a sympathetic understanding of others, and a willingness to unite with them on every phase of Christian Social Service.

As far as we are concerned, in the services of the Church we had better stick to the Standard Book of Common Prayer, without individual attempts at improvement or enrichment, either by means of addition or subtraction. With its comprehensiveness, its historic continuity, a wonderful Liturgy, a rich sacramental worship, an appreciation for the results of modern scholarship, especially in the field of Biblical Research, our own Church has its special contribution to make to the religious life of today. "Fighting under His banner" can hardly mean fighting one another within the same fold, even if we cannot be "mutual admirers", and will certainly not aid us in making our contribution as a separate and distinct Communion.

Evangelism in our branch of the Church means reclaiming lapsed communicants, of whom we have quite a few; reaching Church slackers, whose name unfortunately happens to be "Legion"; re-enlisting the delinquent; incorporating every member into the active body of the Church, at work and in worship—in a word, the winning of souls for Christ and His cause, through pastoral work, personal effort and group organization. As a division of the organized army of the followers of Jesus Christ, who are pledged by their baptism to "fight manfully under His banner", let us fight, but not against one another. Let us fight for the great essential and foundation truths of the Christian faith "as this Church hath received the same", and let us labor unitedly and unceasingly for the extension of His Kingdom. Let us have unity in essentials, liberty in non-essentials, and love in everything—loyalty to our own historic Church— as it is—as we worship and work together.

Help China

The Rt. Rev. Logan H. Roots, Bishop of Hankow, China, from 1913 to 1922, honorary secretary of the National Christian Council of China and active in the work of the American Mission Board, who is at present in the United States, has added his voice to the non-sectarian appeal being made to the American people for generous cooperation in the effort of the American National Committee, China Famine Relief, 205 East Forty-second Street, New York City, to secure funds for relief of the suffering of the millions of men, women and children in the famine-stricken province of North China.

"Latest news from China," Bishop Roots says, "indicates that famine conditions have overtaken additional millions of Chinese, and that the present situation is much more serious than that which prevailed earlier in 1928. News published in the New York dailies is amply confirmed by direct cabled news from the China International Famine Relief Commission at Peking. Of the appalling need there can be no doubt.

"My reasons for appealing to and urging the American people to aid in relieving the serious plight of the Chinese famine victims, through American China Famine Relief, are:

"1. That the Chinese government is not only eager to have this help in the relief of its famine-stricken people, but that it is strong enough to give the necessary protection and support to famine relief measures and also to assist us substantially in this work of mercy and good will.

"2. Business men as well as missionaries have returned to China in sufficient numbers to provide foreign volunteer personnel, which is needed in addition to the Chinese personnel and the paid staff, Chinese and foreign, to supervise and carry through effective relief measures, once the funds are provided.

"3. I was in residence at Hankow through the whole of 1927. That was the most difficult time China has had for many years, even more difficult than 1900, which was 'Boxer Year'. I know of the work in famine relief in previous years from seeing others take responsibility for it and carry it through. In 1927 I went to the Hupeh Provincial Committee myself, since there were so few other foreigners available. There I saw how things worked on the inside. Almost all other enterprises were at a standstill, but even in the terrible days of April to August, 1927, the International Famine Relief Commission carried on its work, securing the active cooperation of the government. The personnel of the China International Famine Relief Commission is stronger now than in 1927, and with the assured cooperation of the government, since fighting on any large scale is unlikely, the success in 1927 should give us every confidence that famine relief and prevention measures can be effectively put though if only funds are provided.

"For these reasons I urge Americans to lay aside fears as to the possibility of effective administration in China, and give their whole-hearted support to the plan for raising a worthy sum for the relief of China's need."

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart", Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by H. L. E., of East Falls Church, Va.:

> "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee" (Isaiah 26:3).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

FROM THE BISHOP OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. Editor:

. . . . Richmond of my day was a wonderful Christian city and I thank God for my ministry there as Deacon. I may send an article on Bishop Wilmer, the devoted friend of Dr. Peterkin and my first Bishop after I became a Presbyter.

You are doing splendid work with The Southern Churchman, our family paper, from my boyhood.

James R. Winchester.

SHOULD GO TO EVERY FAMILY.

Mr. Editor:

I will take pleasure in trying to find subscribers for The Southern Churchman. I consider it a benediction to a household to have that paper—clean, inspiring and educational for there are always some items of historical interest, something to make you think, make you consider.

The Southern Churchman should go to every family. I will try to impress this as I see it. But some will not see as you see.

Very sincerely and with continued appreciation,

Wm. C. Garnett.

Dunnsville, Va., December 8, 1928.

PROTEST.

Mr. Editor:

The Catholic Party evidently has gained a victory, it has succeeded in getting the Convention to accept the Revised Prayer Book. In my previous letters to you, I said that I do not belong to either the High, Broad, Low, or Modernist Party. And I am utterly opposed to the Catholic Party.

I am becoming more and more convinced that there is no place in the American Episcopal Church (formerly the Protestant Episcopal Church) for a loyal Protestant Evangelical Churchman, who works on spiritual lines.

When I sought ordination in this Church, I supposed that it adhered to the teachings of the Mother Church of England.

But I find that I am now compelled to offer prayers for the dead, and to accept other Romish teachings. My conscience will not permit me to use prayers for the dead, so I am asking those in authority, say the Presiding Bishop, what must I do?

Just think of it, this Church which has had an existence in this big country of over three hundred years, only numbers today about one million and a half members, and this means reckoning every one who has been baptized. Out of a population of 120,000,000 American Episcopalian Churchmen number less than two millions!

The reports of the Convention are made to give the impression to outsiders, that joy, peace and unity exist in our Church. But every one knows that there is more strife, dissension, discord, and disunion amongst us, than amongst all the big Evangelical denominations combined.

What folly for the bishops, to persuade themselves that the Methodist and Presbyterian denominations, are craving for reunion with the American Episcopal Church! They had better spend their time and energy in seeking to promote unity in our own Church.

Loyal Evangelical Churchmen in England, have succeeded in getting Parliament to refuse to pass the proposed new Prayer Book. I have dared to suggest previously, that loyal Evangelicals in our own Church, should form a society for the preservation of the teachings set forth by the English Church Reformers. And at this time petitions should be forwarded to the Presiding Bishop, to inform him, that we, loyal Evangelical Churchmen refuse to use prayers for the dead, and other popish teachings. This will bring the bishops to their senses, and preserve to our Church the pure teachings of the Bible.

Instead of sending our offerings to support Pro-Roman bishops and missionaries, we could do better service by spending this money in launching a crusade to uphold evangelical truth.

I have frequently remarked, that the Popish Party in our dear Church, will succeed eventually in driving out of it every spiritually minded Evangelical Churchman. It stirs up my righteous indignation to see the Romanizers in our Church, seeking to lead us back to Rome. Can nothing be done at this time to stop these rebels in our Church, in their efforts to undo the work of the Protestant Reformation?

Minister.

YOUNG MEN AS DELEGATES.

Mr. Editor:

At the recent session of the General Convention, the Rev. Dr. Hart, of Chattanooga, Tenn., made a suggestion which received general attention and had a wide appeal.

He called to our attention that there were relatively few young men present with us as delegates. Many of the problems to be discussed related to those things which are helpful to college students, to scholars in preparatory schools, or to young people generally throughout the Church. Reports, extremely interesting in character, were read from various associations of young people, and I am sure that many of us older men in reaching our conclusions would have enjoyed and profited by first-hand knowledge given us by younger men, and given with a frank expression of what in their judgment would be best for those not so old as ourselves.

Then, too, all delegates at a Convention appreciate the benefit which comes from having a number of members who continue in their attendance session after session through a long term of years. There comes through their continuous attendance a transmission of knowledge from Convention to Convention, and an expression in the transaction of business which is extremely helpful, and to get this we usually must start with young men. Beyond this, also, a session of the Convention is a definite education for men, young or old.

Accordingly, many of us older people most cordially approve the plan suggested by Dr. Hart that a definite effort be made to bring young clergymen and young laymen as delegates to the Convention, educating them in the broadest way, placing some of the responsibility upon them, and enabling their ideas and point of view to be of influence. And so we venture to suggest that a search be made for suitable young people by the various dioceses, as opportunities may occur.

It may take some time to find young men who can spare three weeks from their work, even for a single session, and even more difficult to find those who can probably arrange to go to meeting after meeting. It is not expected that such will be immediately available in all dioceses, and, indeed, it is probably well that the infiltration of young men should not come all at once, but gradually, though we would hope continuously as a general policy.

In conclusion I might recall that many of us accept as a fundamental consideration the fact that few of us, old or young, are much interested in the enactments of conventions in which we are not represented by members of our own generation. If we definitely include a reasonable proportion of young men in the General Convention, will we not be taking an additional step towards widening the usefulness and inspiration of the Convention throughout the entire Church?

Lay Deputy from Rhode Island.

PRAYER FOR THE DEPARTED.

Mr. Editor:

Thanks for your letter. The prayer of Dr. Samuel Johnson is fine, except the last clause. Since there is not one word in the whole Bible to even suggest a prayer for those departed, and the parable of Dives and Lazarus surely does seem to strongly teach that there is a great gulf fixed between the impenitent and the saved, I feel it is most dangerous to embark on such a tempestuous sea of uncertainty. If we could help the departed by our prayers surely Christ would have made it clear to us. If the righteous do not go to be with the Lord at death, there must be some kind of purgatory or "House of Detention" on the other side. A great Bible scholar in this country said some time ago: "We are saved by faith, but rewarded by Works." I think that must be true. The thief on the cross went as safely to be with the Lord as Saint Paul, but I surely believe there was a great difference in their reward. True, prayers for the dead are always followed by prayers to the dead, and I believe one is as logical as the other, and neither one has an iota of Scripture to commend it. A wise old English Bishop once said: "Where the Bible stops teaching, it would be well for the Church to stop learning"; of course, as to the Divine Will. Amen.

A WARNING.

We are advised that a man by the name of Billie A. Peck, representing himself as a disabled veteran of the World War, and as operating under the auspices of the Veterans Sales Company, Los Angeles, California, is soliciting subscriptions for The Southern Churchman. Mr. Peck is not a representative of The Southern Churchman, and has no authority to solicit subscriptions for this paper. Subscribers are warned to have nothing to do with him and to notify this office should he approach them for subscriptions.

The Southern Churchman has a regularly accredited traveling representative, Mr. Russell A. Schlueter, a one-armed man, about thirty-five years of age. Courtesies shown him will be greatly appreciated.

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.

Reports of the Meetings of the National Council and Its Departments.

The Presiding Bishop in his address before the National Council, meeting on December 12, called attention to the newly-elected bishops for the missionary districts of Tohoku, Japan, and Nevada, and for the dioceses of South Carolina and Eau Claire, and the suffragan bishop of Long Island. He knew that the Council would want to send greetings to these newly-elected bishops, expressing the desire of the Council to cooperate with them in every way in their work.

The Field Department reported with regret the resignation of Bishop Overs as a General Field Secretary, in order that he might assist the Bishops of Western New York in the work of their diocese. The Council adopted a resolution expressing its appreciation for the service rendered by Bishop Overs, and its hearty wishes for his continued success.

The triennial meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary nominated to the Presiding Bishop Miss Grace Lindley for appointment as Executive Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary during the coming triennium. This was announced to the Council, and the Presiding Bishop expressed his great pleasure in being able to reappoint her, which reappointment was unanimously confirmed by the Council.

Miss Lindley, in presenting the report of not only the triennial meeting, but of the meeting of the Executive Board, held just previous to the Council meeting, offered, on behalf of the Executive Board, the following nominations on the staff of the Woman's Auxiliary:

Dr. Adelaide T. Case, to be Director of Education for the Woman's Auxiliary; Miss Margaret Marston, to be Educational Secretary; Miss Edna Beardsley, to be Assistant Secretary; Mrs. T. K. Wade, to be Supply Secretary; Miss Ellen I. Flanders, to be Office Secretary.

The Presiding Bishop received these nominations and made the appointments as requested by the Executive Board, which appointments were confirmed by the Council.

Mr. Spencer Miller, Jr., had been working with the Department of Christian Social Service as Consultant in Industrial Relations for the past year. The Presiding Bishop at the request of the Department, appointed Mr. Miller as a Secretary for Industrial Relations in the Department.

The Rev. Mr. Glenn, Secretary for College Work, asked for the appointment of Mr. Lea S. Luquer as a student chaplain at the University of Arizona until January, 1930. He also asked for the appointment of Miss Leila Anderson as United Thank Offering worker at the University of California until September, 1930; also the appointment of Mr. John Bryant, now a student at the Virginia Seminary, as a part-time missioner for college work. Mr. Bryant will be a volunteer worker wwithout salary. These appointments were all made by the Presiding Bishop and confirmed by the Council.

This being the last meeting of the National Council for this triennium, in order that the departments might have full membership for the first meeting in the new triennium to be held February 5, 1929, each department recommended to the Presiding Bishop the personnel to be drawn from the membership of the Council and also members at large for the coming triennium.

During the past years the Field Department has had the services of a number of rectors of prominent parishes throughout the country, who, as associate secretaries of the Field Department, have served whenever called on without salary, their services being contributed generously by their parishes. Many of these associate secretaries were reappointed for coming triennium, and some new ones were appointed. In addition to twenty-five clergy appointed to this office one layman, Mr. R. S. Barrett, of Virginia, who had served most acceptably during the past triennium, was reappointed.

Both the Field Department and the Council adopted resolutions expressing deep gratitude for and sincere appreciation of the valuable contribution made to the whole Church by these associate secretaries.

The Field Department has also had the services of others who have not held the office of associate secretary, but who have helped the Field Department as time permitted the Church's Program. Resolutions were adopted by both the Department and the Council expressing appreciation for the splendid contribution made by these men.

The Department of Christian Social Service adopted a resolution, which was also adopted by the National Council in the following form:

Resolved, That the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, believing that the Paris Peace Pact represents an important step in cooperation between the nations for the preservation of World Peace, urgently hopes that the Senate will ratify the Pact without amendments.

The Committee on Ecclesiastical Relations asked for the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas, This Church in its work in the Near East has consistently endeavored to assist the ancient Eastern Churches in maintaining and developing their religious life, and their historic Faith and Order; and

Whereas, Other communions and religious agencies working in the Near East have expressed their desire to cooperate with the ancient Eastern Churches in this same purpose; and

Whereas, It is now proposed that we should join with the said communions and agencies in a combined effort to carry this purpose into effect; be it

Resolved, That the National Council of the Episcopal Church approve the principle of cooperation with other communions and religious agencies in thus assisting the ancient Eastern Churches, and be it

Resolved, That the President of the Council be asked upon nomination by the Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions to appoint two representatives of this Church to serve on a General Committee "on Relations of and to the Churches of the Near East, including herein Egypt and Greece"; and be it

Resolved, That the Department of Missions be instructed to supervise and direct the work of this Church in cooperation with the aforesaid General Committee.

The Presiding Bishop reappointed the present members of the Committee on Ecclesiastical Relations.

He also appointed the Rev. Dr. William C. Emhardt, and the Rev. Frank Gavin, Ph. D., as representatives of the Council on Committee on Correlation of Agencies in the Near East.

Dean Chalmers, who acted as Dean of our Training Institute held in Washington at the time of the General Convention, called attention to the splendid work done by the Washington branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, and by the committee under Mrs. Bowen's direction in making arrangements for the Institute and assisting in its work. The Council expressed its appreciation to the Washington branch of the Auxiliary and to Mrs. Bowen and the Registration Committee under her direction, and all those who assisted in making the Institute the great success it was.

He also called attention to the fact that the Directors and the Officers of the Y. W. C. A. had placed at the disposal of this Institute its splendid building in Washington, at practically no cost to the Institute. The Council placed on record its sense of the deep obligation of the Church for the facilities extended to the Institute, and for the cooperation and help so freely given during the entire period of the Institute.

Mr. Glenn, in his report on College Work, announced that the National Commission on Evangelism had assigned twenty of its missioners to do work in the colleges, and also stated that the students were planning during the coming Lenten season to inaugurate a fund to be used for the support of a student worker at a college to be designated.

Miss Lindley, in reporting for the triennial meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary, presented the resolutions through which the Auxiliary notified the National Council of its readiness to cooperate in the general plan for Advance Work, and offered the Council its experience and organization for this purpose.

She also reported to the National Council that the Woman's Auxiliary would undertake to raise before Epiphany, 1930, a Corporate Gift not exceeding $100,000, the first $25,000 of which shall be appropriated for the building of a church at Santo Domingo City.

In addition to this the Auxiliary recommended to the National Council that trained women for work in colleges should be appointed under the United Thank Offering, and the apportionment of Miss Leila Anderson to the University of California, recommended by Mr. Glenn, was the first of such appointments.

The National Council has been much encouraged by the gratifying growth of the offerings made at the Good Friday services for special work in Palestine and Mesopotamia and desires as soon as funds are available, to develop plans for commending the Christian message to Hebrews in the United States. With this in view, it adopted a resolution providing for the setting aside from the Good Friday Offerings, of $5,000, after existing obligations have been cared for. The funds so allocated are to be expended under the direction of the Department of Missions. Present obligations for the work of the Jerusalem and the East Mission for the support of the educational chaplaincies maintained by the Church in the United States in Jerusalem and Mosul, call for an expenditure of approximately $27,000 per year. The Council is confident that as the important character of this work becomes better known and as wise plans for sharing Christian privilege with Hebrews in the United States are developed, the Good Friday Offering will be largely increased.

In a report from the Department of Misisons, the Council found itself confronted by an emergency situation with regard to the proper housing of the Bishop of Kyoto and his family. The present Episcopal residence, erected many years ago in one of the Southern Islands in Japan for an English Church missionary, was in 1900 transported several hundred miles and rebuilt in Kyoto. It has never been a satisfactory home and it has been responsible for much illness in the three families that have occupied the house since Kyoto became a diocese. The advice of the bishops of North Tokyo and Virginia, both of whom are familiar with the situation, was strongly against any attempt to repair the house, as being an unwise expenditure of at least $5,000. In spite, therefore, of the assurance of the Bishop of Kyoto that he would prefer to wait for a new residence until he had been able to secure funds for the purchase of land and the erection of a new building for Holy Trinity Church, Kyoto, the Council felt compelled, for the safety of his family, to make provision for the erection of a new house early in 1929; $15,000 will be required for the purpose. The Council felt that it would be seriously misrepresenting the attitude of the Church in this country if it failed to take this action.

Bishop Kinsolving's Retirement Causes Great Sorrow.

Although the probability that Bishop Kinsolving's health would not permit him to take up work again in his "Brasil Amada", the announcement of the acceptance of his resignation by the House of Bishops has caused sorrow and consternation among Brazilian Churchmen. All of the Brazilian clergy were once his "boys". All of the older communicants were confirmed by him. For nearly thirty years the ties that bound the Bishop and his people together in a great fellowship of service have been growing stronger. Now the loved leader is reluctantly compelled to let others carry on the tasks that have been his inspiration and his joy. Though the leader must step aside the work goes on.

"Estandarte Christao" (The Christian Standard), is the diocesan magazine. In its issue of October 30, 1928, the editor, the Rev. Jose Severo da Silva, voices the sorrow and affection of all Brazilians, whether of his own or other communions, who know Bishop Kinsolving:

"The Rt. Rev. Dr. L. L. Kinsolving.

A Word of Farewell and Appreciation.

A telegram from the United States to the 'Correio do Povo' announces that the House of Bishops, convened in Washington, has granted the retirement asked by Rt. Rev. Dr. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, our eminent Chief Pastor.

Therefore, this action officially withdraws from the Brazilian Episcopal Church the distinguished man who was our first bishop, and who for the space of thirty-nine years has crossed the hills and plains, the mountains and rivers of this land of the 'Gauchos', and has borne unfurled to the eyes of plainsman and mountaineer the snowy standard of the Son of God.

In the cabin of the settler, in the ranch of the herdsman, in the home of the grateful, in the palace of the opulent, wherever the love of Christ has gone through the instrumentality of the Brazilian Episcopal Church, Lucien Lee Kinsolving is esteemed and loved with an indestructible sincerity.

His honored name, as holy bishop and tireless missionary, will shine forever in the annals of Brazilian evangelization. The Brazilian Episcopal Church, which to the retiring bishop and to the venerable Dr. Morris, owes its existence, will continue, under heaven's favor, on the path which was traced for it by these renowned men.

Homage more sincere, more inspiring than this we cannot render to these two missionaries in the evening of their lives, self-devoted to doing good.

With eyes bedewed with tears, tears of gratitude and 'saudades', we bid good-bye to the good and generous, wise and loving prelate, under whose orders we have served during four decades, and shall never cease to love and admire him for his goodness of heart and the shining gifts of his spirit.

May there descend from the Father of Lights, blessings innumerable upon our beloved Bishop Kinsolving and his family."

Deputy Registrar: The Rev. Edward H. Clark, Diocesan Registrar, Portland, Oregon.

Charles Pardee,
Registrar and Secretary of the House of Bishops.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

Under the direction of the Field Work Committee of its National Council the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has undertaken a Church-wide Extension Campaign for the organization of new Chapters and increasing the efficiency of existing Chapters. The initial steps were taken on St. Andrew's Day, when meetings of Brotherhood men and other laymen interested in Brotherhood work were held in various places, but the chief efforts of the campaign will be during the Epiphany and Lenten seasons, closing on Easter Sunday.

A National Committee on Clergy Cooperation has been formed, with representatives in nearly every diocese and missionary district, cooperating with the members of the Brotherhood's National Council in visiting parishes upon request to assist in the organization of Chapters.

In connection with this campaign, at the request of the National Commission on Evangelism the Brotherhood is urging "Church Attendance Campaigns" for all parishes where practicable, it being the desire of the Commission that during January and February an especial effort be made to develop the attendance at the evening church services and to make this service of a distinctly evangelistic character. In a number of dioceses the bishops have appointed official representatives of the Brotherhood to be on the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, in order to more effectively mobilize lay interest in evangelism and coordinate the efforts of the National Commission and the Brotherhood.

A pageant on personal evangelism, "Bringing Others to the Master", has been prepared by a group of Young People's Service League leaders and published by the Brotherhood. It is planned to have this presented by the young people of the respective parishes during the Epiphany season or later, if locally preferred. Copy of this may be obtained from the National Commission on Evangelism, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, the Daughters of the King, and the Provincial Federation of the Young People's Service League of the Fourth Province.

ST. LUKE'S INTERNATIONAL HOSPITAL, TOKYO, JAPAN.

From an Address by the Rt. Rev. John McKim, D. D., at the Meeting of the National Council, December 12, 1928.

Let me express my gratitude for the effort now being made by the Church to reconstruct and endow St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo. St. Luke's is the greatest missionary institution in Japan. It does more in the way of religious education than all of our schools. It is a great humanitarian activity. It is doing a splendid work for international friendship.

As a near neighbor of St. Luke's—I lived next door to it for more than twenty-five years—I suppose I know it better than any one except Dr. Teusler. There was hardly a day when I was not there, so I know, from personal knowledge, of the tremendous good accomplished by St. Luke's.

It is emphatically a Christian institution. The staff, headed by Dr. Teusler and Mrs. St. John, as the head of the Training School, with other foreign members, as well as Japanese crowd into the chapel every day, spreading into the corridors, asking God's guidance for the day. This is at seven o'clock in the morning.

It furnishes more candidates for baptism and confirmation than almost any six of the churches in the whole diocese. Through its social service it gets into the homes and takes care of the physical condition of the children in twelve schools in that part of Tokyo in which it is situated. Its ramifications extend all through the country. If you ask a jinricksha man to take you to a certain place, he may not know anything about it. I have been embarrassed after asking a man to take me to my home, to have the man say, "I do not know where you live". But if I say it is next door to St. Luke's, he takes me there.

I urge with all my heart your continued efforts to complete this tremendous work you have undertaken. I pray God He may bless you.

Recognition of the College of Nursing of St. Luke's International Hospital by the highest tribunal in the educational world has been bestowed by a gift of $400,000 from the Rockefeller Foundation to endow the College.

For the High Schools.

The Bunyan Tercentenary Committee, of which Mr. William A. Harbison, of New York City, is Chairman, has just taken an important step, which will have a far-reaching influence on the young people in our high schools. Mr. Harbison has provided the funds to purchase six hundred vocation sets of ten volumes each to be presented to winners of an essay contest on "The Pilgrim's Progress". The editor-in-chief of these books is William DeWitt Hyde, D. D., LL. D., Ex-President of Bowdoin College, and such prominent writers as Hon. James R. Garfield, LL. D., Mary E. Wooley, Litt. D., L. H. D., President of Mt. Holyoke College, and Henry Van Dyke, D. D., LL. D., of Princeton University, have edited the various volumes.

Volume V., on the professions, has thirteen articles on the ministry, collected from a wide field with such writers as Bishop Lawrence, Dr. George A. Gordon and Bishop Greer. Splendid articles on Beecher Spurgeon, Dr. Grenfell and Russell H. Conwell, written by Phillips Brooks, Lyman Abbott, William M. Thayer and Agnes Rush Burr, appear in this volume.

Articles written by over three hundred nationally known men and women are found in these ten volumes. Gifford Pinchot writes on "Practical Forestry"; Marconi, on "Wireless Telegraphy", Mrs. Newell Dwight Hillis, on "Some Failures of American Women", and men and women equally prominent on other subjects.

The books are all ready for shipment to the larger high schools that will agree to conduct the contest, securing as many essays as possible on "The Pilgrim's Progress".

Greer Club.

Greer Club, with headquarters at Greer Court, 544 West One Hundred and Fourteenth Street, New York City, is a residence for Episcopal girl students and a Church Community Center for men and girls coming to New York to study.

Greer Club gives students a place where mail may be addressed; where friends may be entertained and where good meals may be obtained at reasonable rates.

This Club is supplying a long-felt need. Girls have come from almost every state in the Union, from Honolulu, Porto Rico, Panama, Cuba, England, Canada, and Mexico, during the eight years of the club's existence, and have studied art, music, medicine, secretarial and kindergarten work; some have taken the degrees of A. M. and Ph. D.

To keep up this usefulness it is important that a house to accommodate sixty be again opened downtown near the many schools and studios.

The Finance Committee advises that the capital must be increased before a new house can be started, and an appeal is being made for donations.

Checks should be made payable to Greer Club Association, Inc., and sent to the Treasurer, Mrs. J. Sylvester Carlson, 15 Park Avenue, New York.

All money donated is used as capital for the extension of the work. The houses are run on a paying and amortizing basis, and have always been successful, both financially and socially.

Reservations at Greer Court should be made early for the second term, as the house only accommodates nineteen girls in residence.

Greer Club was founded by Miss Agnes Emily Warren, who is now honorary president. The president is Miss Lilian Leale.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Garland's official appointments for the Christmas week included the following:

Wednesday—Christmas Party, Episcopal Hospital, 3 P. M.

Thursday—Masonic Service commemorating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Provost of the University, Dr. William Smith; address at a Masonic meeting, Old Christ Church, 3 P. M.

For the first time in many years Bishop Garland issued a Pastoral Letter to the Clergy, appealing for a generous response in the Christmas Day offerings in all the churches for the Christmas Fund of the diocese.

"We still depend on the offerings from our churches on Christmas Day," the Bishop says in his Pastoral Letter, "to pay the stipends of the beneficiaries of the Christmas Fund, most of whom could not be taken care of by the Pension Fund under its rules.

"There is, however, an increased need for contributions this year, as, in accordance with the canon passed at the last Convention, we have made provision for a pension for Deaconesses retiring from age and infirmity, who have served in our diocese for not less than ten years, which cannot be paid from funds received before June 1, 1928. I am, therefore, sending out this appeal to the churches of the diocese and hope that on Christmas Day an offering may be taken for the Christmas Fund.

"The unanimity of the action of our Convention is evidence of our deep interest in this enlarged work of our Trustees of the Christmas Fund and the present appeal is one that I am sure will meet with a generous response and particularly from the women in our congregations.

"I hope that you will give your people an opportunity to make such an offering and will explain its purpose.

"Checks should be drawn to Arthur V. Morton, Treasurer, and marked 'The Christmas Fund'."

Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop.

Gift to Diocese.

More and more is being realized the truth that the future of the Church as well as the salvation of the nation lies in the Christian education of youth. Mr. A. Felix du Pont has given full evidence of his grasp of this fact in the announcement on December 22, of his gift of $1,050,000 to the Diocese of Delaware for a church boarding school for boys. This gift includes a tract of three hundred and fifty acres of land, situated just outside of Middletown, between two lakes, considered the most ideal location available for such a school.

The charter is being applied for by a directing committee chosen by Mr. du Pont, and comprises, Allen Henry, Walter J. Laird and Bishop Cook.

The corporation will constitute the trustees of the school and they will select the headmaster and the faculty and also direct the building program.

Five hundred thousand dollars is expected to be used for buildings and equipment and $500,000 for endowment.

The entire subject has been carefully examined. Headmasters of Church Schools were consulted at the General Convention and all agreed that there was a great demand for a moderate-price church boarding school for boys in this part of the East. There are few, if any, such schools between New England and Maryland.

Headmasters of numerous important Church schools have been invited to a conference to be held in Wilmington January 4. While there is no intent to restrict the membership to boys of the Episcopal Church, nor from families of the Episcopal Church, the purpose of the school is frankly that of maintaining one in which the religious element in education will be emphasized and the teaching so directed as to train and influence the student body to become efficient in Christian service.

Several other persons may be interested in the founding of the school later. Mr. du Pont is a vice-president of the du Pont Company. He is a vestryman of St. John's Church, Wilmington.

Bishop Cook writes: "It is the gift of a devoted Churchman to the cause of Christianity through his Church. We feel that the spirit as well as the munificence of the gift will greatly strengthen the diocese and be reflected in the life of the Church itself."

Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, Bishop.

Elections to Standing Commitee. . .

At a meeting in November of the standing committee of this diocese, the Rev. S. C. Beckwith was elected to the important office of president of the standing committee, which office was left vacant by the elevation of the Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas to the bishopric. Mr. Beckwith has for the past twenty-two years been rector of St. Philip's Church, Charleston.

At the same time the Rev. H. D. Bull, of Georgetown, was elected a member of the standing committee to fill the vacancy caused by Bishop Thomas' elevation.

The other members of the committee are: the Rev. F. W. Ambler, of Summerville; the Rev. W. S. Poyner, of Florence; the Rev. Homer W. Starr, of Charleston, and Dr. William H. Eggleston, of Hartsville; Walter Hazard, of Georgetown; R. W. Sharkey, of Florence; William Boykin, of Hagood, and O. T. Waring, of Charleston. Mr. Sharkey is secretary of the committee.

The Bishop's Appointments.

Having filled thirteen appointments so far this month, at different churches, Bishop Thomas will preach at two more churches in December, and for January his appointments are numerous, and include attendance at the convention of the Woman's Auxiliary, at St. Philip's Church, Charleston.

Consecrated at St. Michael's on November 30, Bishop Thomas' first service of confirmation was at Christ Church on the morning of December 2. In the evening he preached also and administered the rite of confirmation at St. Luke's Church. The remainder of his December appointments and those of January follow:

December 9—St. Jude's, Walterboro; Sheldon, McPhersonville, and Atonement, Walterboro.

December 16—Holy Apostles', Barnwell; Heavenly Rest, Estill, and Holy Communion, Alendale.

December 17—The Cross, Bluffton.

December 21—Calvary, Charleston.

December 23—St. John's, Florence.

December 25—Christmas Day, St. Michael's, Charleston.

December 30—St. Helena's, Beaufort, and Holy Trinity, Grahamville.

January 6—Advent, Marion, and Christ Church, Mullins.

January 9-10—Convention Woman's Auxiliary, St. Philip's, Charleston.

January 13—Redeemer, Orangeburg, and St. Matthew's, Fort Motte.

January 20—St. David, Cheraw.

January 27—St. Paul's, Bennettsville, and Dillon.

Seventy-fifth Birthday.

St. Mark's Parish, Palatka, Florida, celebrated its seventy-fifth birthday on Wednesday, December 12, and fitting ceremonies, covering a period of two days, were shared by the congregation with the general public. The commemoration began with a Celebration of the Holy Communion at ten o'clock Wednesday morning, the present rector, the Rev. Francis B. Wakefield, Jr., being the celebrant.

The Anniversary Commemoration Service was held on Wednesday evening and consisted of Evening Prayer and Confirmation. A congregation of about four hundred persons taxed the capacity of the old church. Ten persons were confirmed, bringing the total number of confirmations for the year to thirty. The choir, consisting of twenty voices, was composed of representatives of the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Roman Catholic choirs. In addition to the bishop of the diocese, the Rt. Rev. Frank A. Juhan, D. D., who preached the sermon and confirmed the class, those assisting were the Rev. L. F. J. Hindry, rector of Trinity Church, St. Augustine; the Rev. A. G. Harrison, of the Penny Farms, and the Rev. F. Stuart Hyatt, rector of St. Mary's Church, Green Cove Springs.

Thursday afternoon, at the church, a pageant depicting the founding of the parish and some of the high spots of progress since that time, was presented. The members of the original congregation, including the first Governor of Florida, the Hon. W. D. Moseley, were represented in costume appropriate to 1853, by some of the older communicants of the present congregation. In four instances the parts were taken by actual descendants of the founders. The rector of the parish represented the Rev. Henry B. Whipple, who, in 1853, presided over the meeting at which the parish was organized and, who six years later, became the first Bishop of Minnesota.

The same evening the parish entertained at a reception for the members and friends of St. Mark's. The Rev. Melville E. Johnson, student rector at the University of Florida, was the principal speaker.

Christ Church, Pensocola, the Rev. G. Hendree Harrison, D. D., rector, has just completed a successful Teacher Training Institute under the leadership of Miss Annie Morton Stout, of the educational staff of the Province of Sewanee. Some twenty-five teachers took examinations for N. T. credits.

Gift to General Church.

The collections at the Christmas Eve midnight service and the Christmas Day services of St. James' Church, Richmond, were presented as a Christmas gift to the General Church to help pay off the debts incurred before the present "pay-as-you-go" plan was adopted.

Christmas.

"Watchman, tell us of the night,
Traveller, lo! the Prince of Peace,
Lo! the Son of God is come."
Watchman and traveller journey on together.

Then the shepherds were seen sleeping in the fields when the angel of the Lord and all the heavenly hosts appeared, bringing them the glad tidings of great joy, and they arose and followed to the manger in Bethlehem. There was Mary and Joseph and a shining light from the manger cradle. The three kings of the Orient in resplendent dress came from far to humbly kneel and present gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh.

The members of the Young People's Service League acted the little pageant in the chancel of St. James' Church, Richmond, on Sunday night before Christmas. Dr. Gibson, the rector, read the Christmas story, and the choir sang the descriptive hymns. It was a simple, reverent, beautiful service in celebration of Christ's approaching Birthday.

Miss Betty Gray Harrison, last year's president of the League, took the part of the Virgin Mary. Harley Duane was a faithful Joseph. Others who took part were: Harry Hodges, Sydney Buford, James Fauntleroy, George Williams, Walter Johnson, Henry Froehling, Bristow, Kearney Vertner, and the Misses Ann Brooke, Katherine Hoofnagle, Mary Wilson Turner, Marion West, Louise Woodward.

Mission.

The Church of the Resurrection, Richmond Hill, had recently a ten days' mission conducted by two cadets, Greenwood and Bugg, of the American Church Army. There was a celebration of Holy Communion every morning, at 6:30 and 10 alternately, and a song service and address every evening. The rector, the Rev. Arthur R. Cummings, says of the missioners: "They have been very successful in the apartment house calling. . . . They have found many new families. . . . Great blessings come from the lives of these two young laymen consecrated in loving service to the Master and their fellowman. . . . We shall miss them as they go forth to others fields and shall not forget them."

Service for Deaf Mutes.

A special service for deaf mutes was held at St. Ann's, Brooklyn, on a recent Sunday afternoon. The Brooklyn Daily Eagle says: "By means of the sign language some forty deaf mutes "heard" the sermon and prayers . . . and listened to, or rather watched, the "silent choir" render several hymns with nimble fingers and quick, expressive gestures. As the Rev. J. R. Peckham, assistant to the rector, read aloud the sermon from the pulpit, its author, the Rev. John H. Kent, deaf pastor of St. Ann's Church for the Deaf, Manhattan, stood beside him and interpreted his words to the deaf mutes by the sign language." It was in St. Ann's that the first services in Brooklyn for the deaf were held, forty years ago.

COLLECT FOR THE EPIPHANY.

O God, Who by the leading of a star did manifest the only begotten Son to the Gentiles, mercifully grant that we, who know Thee now by faith, may after this life have the fruition of Thy glorious Godhead, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE STAR THAT SHONE IN EASTERN SKIES.

F. B. Stone.

A Star once shone in Eastern skies
And led the Wise Men from afar;
And when they come to Bethlehem,
Above the house there stood the Star;
Rejoicing greatly at the sight,
They worshipped Thee and blessed Thy light.

O'er every home in all the world,
O may there shine Thy star,
That all may know Thou dwellest there,
Those near and those afar;
Rejoicing greatly at the sight,
May worship Thee and bless Thy light.

In every child of Thine, dear Christ,
O may there shine Thy light,
That all may know Thou dwellest there,
And drivest out the night;
Rejoicing greatly at the sight,
May worship Thee and bless Thy light.

The Sorrow of the World.

I have often thought that one of the most alarming features of our existence in the world today is the apparent multiplication of those diseases by which the human body is liable to be attacked; and reflecting thereupon we may actually permit ourselves to wonder what people died of in the old days before appendicitis, meningitis, influenza, and a hundred other ailments of the modern world had been discovered. I speak in profound ignorance and under correction, but I suppose that the true answer to that question would be that they died from precisely the same causes, but that the causes were not known. Medical science has succeeded in these last years in diagnosing, cataloguing and assigning a name to nearly all the ailments which afflict our mortal frame, and the result is an apparent, though not, one hopes, a real increase in the number of those ailments. The index, if I may so put it, has been greatly enlarged, but the volume of the book remains the same.

When, however, we turn our attention—if we ever do turn our attention—to the diseases that afflict, not the bodies, but the souls of men, we shall find that this process of classification has been curiously reversed. Here the size of the catalogue has not been increased, but actually diminished in modern times. We suffer, it would seem, from more diseases, but not from so many sins as our fathers before us Let me hasten to explain this rather cryptic utterance. If you should study the devotional literature of the early Christian Church, or of the Middle Ages, you would find mention of certain sins, spiritual maladies definitely so-called, the very names of which are now forgotten. It may well be that in those days, when the fate of a man's soul was regarded as a much more important matter than the condition of his body, this business of spiritual diagnosis was carried a little too far. Just as today in this age of science there are many people who know too much and certainly think too much about their physical health, so in that bygone time, which we call the age of faith, there were doubtless some who thought too much and knew too much about their spiritual health. Nevertheless, the fact remains that you cannot abolish a spiritual disease by forgetting all about it, any more than you can create a bodily disease by giving it a name.

I say that St. Paul called it "the sorrow of the world", but in later Christian writings it acquired another name. The casuists of the Middle Ages called it "accidie". They even went so far as to enumerate its symptoms, and they wrote it down as one of the seven deadly sins which might destroy the soul. "Accidie," or in the Latin Acedia. Have you ever heard of it? Perhaps not, but I rather think we have all seen it and known it in other people, and that most of us have suffered from it a little ourselves. In the devotional literature of the Middle Ages, and of still earlier times, there are frequent references to this curious topic, and in order to explain its meaning perhaps you will allow me to read quite briefly one or two passages in which the word "accidie" occurs. Our own poet Chaucer writes of it in these terms:—"Accidie or slouth maketh a man heavy, thoughtful and wrawe. Envy and ire make bitterness in heart, which bitterness is the mother of accidie and benumbeth the love of all goodness. Accidie is the anguish of a troubled heart. Of accidie it cometh that a man is annoyed and encumbered for to do any goodness, for accidie loveth no bisiness at all."

The very name of this affliction is now forgotten under the sun. It has disappeared from the catalogue of sins, though possibly it has reappeared in other catalogues which are of greater interest in this generation. The physician may call it neaurasthenia, and the psychologist, thinking perhaps of something a little different—though I doubt if St. Paul would have known them apart—may discourse to us about the "inferiority complex". Anyhow, the thing itself, call it by what name you choose, is with us still, not an invention of the medieval casuist or the modern psychoanalyst, but a real thing, bitterly and tragically real, as real today, perhaps more so, than it was a thousand or two thousand years ago, for today as yesterday the sorrow of the world worketh death.

The sorrow of the world, accidie, melancholia, mental depression, a nervous breakdown, the inferiority complex—what's in a name? Not much, perhaps, though I am bound to say there may be something in the last. Indeed I have always felt that the psychologists really did make a discovery: they got upon the track of truth when they invented that curious phrase. Its weakness is that it suggests an ailment peculiar to those persons who occupy what we call an inferior position in society or in the world, and it is not that at all. At least I think not. I imagine that the high and lofty may suffer from it quite as much as the meek and lowly, for the roots of this disease may be very deep below the surface. Inferiority! the sense of being underneath things and not on the top of them, of carrying, always carrying a load, and not being ourselves carried or lifted up by any belief, by any enthusiasm, by any hope. The burden of a life which is never consciously realized as anything but a burden. Or again, the sense of failure, of not doing things so well as other people do them, failure to achieve, failure to be of any use, of any importance to anybody, the consciousness of not being wanted very much, anywhere or any time. And worst of all, yes, definitely I think, the worst of all, the consciousness of not being loved.

"The sorrow of the world worketh death." Today we speak of it as a disease, a pathological condition. Yesterday it was called a sin, one of the seven deadly sins. I am not going to tell you that St. Thomas Aquinas was right in this matter and that Professor McDougal or the nerve specialists of Harley Street are wrong. I cannot bring myself to speak with harshness of any human grief which is genuine and real; and I know well that this grief is, or can be, the most intensely real thing in all the world. Also I am persuaded that it is utterly impossible, in any given case, to probe the secrets of a troubled spirit or a broken heart. They may be physical, they may be hereditary, they may be due to causes, any one of a thousand causes, over which the sufferer has little or no control. And even if they are, as we sometimes say, imaginary troubles, who can analyze the imagination or pass sentence upon it for good or ill? The heart knoweth its own business, and God forbid that I or any man should judge with condemnation the anguish of another soul. Only I would ask you to remember that there is a difference, there must be a difference between the sorrow that is bound up with and arises out of our care and love for other people, the sorrow, for example, of a great bereavement; there only with self—self-aggrandisement, self-depreciation, self-pity or self-love. And can we be quite sure that those old students of human nature, who really did know a good deal about the secrets of the soul, were altogether mistaken when they described the first as godly sorrow, because it had in it the spirit of life and of love, and when they called the second the sorrow of the world because it had in it only the seeds of destruction and of death?

But however that may be, it is, as I have said, a certain fact that this condition—call it a disease or call it a sin, as you prefer—is a common thing, commoner perhaps in the strange complexity of modern life than it ever has been before. There are a great many people all about us in the world today who suffer, some of them to the point of agony, from the sorrow of the world that worketh death.

It may be their own fault, but it is not much use telling them that if we have nothing else to say. And what else can we say? What is the remedy of this disease, the absolution of this sin? It is hard to know, but there is one thing which can be said without offense and without fear of contradiction. It is true, isn't it, that those who are sharing or even thinking a little about the troubles of other people are better able to bear their own?

To think of others! And to think of God! Of God who surely has provided a remedy for the inferiority complex, as well as for the sorrow of the world, if it is really true that He so loved the world, that He set so high a value upon human life—every human life, even yours and mine, regarding them not as inferior and useless but as so important, so essential to the fulfilment of His own eternal purposes and love—that He gave His only begotten Son. Think of God—revealed, portrayed in Jesus Christ and casting all your care upon Him; remember that He careth, even though nobody else does care very much. He careth eternally for you.—From a sermon preached in Westminster Abbey by the Rev. R. A. Mitchell.

THE CHALICE.

E. G. Wallis.

I, who for many moons would not look up,
Now pray Thy bounty, O Infinity.
Ask bread and wine of life, on which to sup,
Breaking my fast at Thy sweet charity.
So sated with the fare provided me
By idle months, devoted to time's killing,
Thirsting for springs no mortal eye may see,
Yet lip may taste, I crave so long unwilling—
To pour out from my soul as from a cup,
Envy and greed and every vain distress,
Small beer of vanity and selfishness,
Or darker brew of hate—and all these spilling
Upon the ground, to Thee once more lift up
My heart—an empty flagon for Thy filling!

An American's Ascent of Mount Nebo.

"If I don't find the Ark I'll put the first automobile on top of Nebo," said Dr. A. F. Futterer, president of Edendale Bible Institute, Los Angeles, Cal., who for two years has been engaged in research work in Palestine, trying to find the lost Ark in Nebo. Those who heard the above remark, and had visited Nebo, said: "It can't be done." Dr. Futterer made the ascent without preliminary surveying of the road. He piloted his way through untried rock piles, and at nine A. M. on September 8, stood up in his automobile on top of Nebo waving the Union Jack together with the Stars and Stripes amid a bewildered tribe of wild Bedouins, many of whom had never before seen an automobile. They crowded around it, children climbed upon it, while from the hills around groups of Bedouins could be seen gazing with wonder at this new arrival upon old Nebo. At various stages along the way, while removing rocks and blazing a new trail for the car, Dr. Futterer took moving pictures.

The Mayor of Madaba, the nearest town to Nebo, came later on horseback to Nebo with city officials to congratulate Dr. Futterer. He presented to him a signed letter with official seal stating this to be the first car that ever scaled the heights of Nebo. The mayor stated that he would now apply to the government for a permanent road to open up auto tours to Nebo, thus saving about sixty miles detour.

"Nobody but a pioneer auto-trail-maker paving the way to the greatest historic mountain of Nebo, can realize what inspiration and peculiar sense of victory there was in parking the first auto on Nebo heights for the sake of the many thousands of Bible lovers who will surely follow," says Dr. Futterer. "Moreover, as a Bible representative, I felt it my duty to open up this new auto trail to this great historic mountain, which I certainly believe holds the lost Ark of the Covenant in one of its many hidden caches. I also believe that a properly equipped expedition to excavate Nebo will follow soon. I am satisfied that my work here has been a great success; the future will prove it."

The Bedouin chief of Nebo prosented Dr. Futterer with his robe to take to America, as a token of friendship and approval. His last word while shaking hands was "Wahad", meaning he was in sympathy with him in his future Nebo exploits.—Jewish Daily Bulletin.

The Supreme Adventure.

How bravely Jesus speaks of His death! There is no tremor in His voice. The son of man shall be glorified. The passage quoted above is a commentary on this last word glorified.

Consider the principle at the heart of it. It is universal. In nature it is forever as Jesus said—life disappears to make room for new life. Any amateur gardener knows how the old dahlia root must perish to give birth to the new and to sustain it. A gladiola bulb exhausts itself in producing a host of tiny offspring. So it is all the way through the story of nature's principle of reproduction. In the higher levels of life it is not otherwise. A mother gives her life for her children, and there is nothing more honored among men than woman's sacrifice for the race. This is the principle that permeates the life and death of Jesus. The only thing new about it is Christ Himself.

Consider its secret. "He that loveth his life." Love is the strongest force in the world. It is destructive or constructive according to its objective. If a man seek his own glory, interests, and dividends to the exclusion of God and his fellowmen, his soul will die to all that is just, holy, and true. "Hate" is a strong word, but if the soul is to grow, if life is to be a blessing then self-denial becomes imperative. Love embraces the world. It gives and forgives, and dies if need be in the interests of another. Love is the secret of higher life.

This has been demonstrated. Christ died for others. He gave His life like the seed, and it has entered into the hearts of others who have served their fellows in His strength.

He was lifted up to die and all the world is being drawn to Him. It could not be otherwise for God's eternal law of sacrifice is ratified in His Cross.—Dr. Robert MacGowan.

A Picture and a Poem.

Dante Gabriel Rosseti was both a painter and a poet. Not only was he a painter and a poet, but he was a great Christian and his mastery of the arts became the servant of his Christ-like life. The combination of poet and painter are beautifully illustrated in his treatment of the woman who was a sinner, about whom we read in the New Testament. The painting he made is of a young woman passing up the street in all the attractiveness of worldly society. Careless and thoughtless and with a light heart she passes along, her spirit untroubled and her mind undisturbed in her career of selfishness and sin, when suddenly at a window that looks out upon the street she beheld the face of Jesus in all His loving sympathy and tender compassion. She could not forget that look. Just as a look from the face of Jesus changed the heart of Peter, so did one sight of His blessed face master her and wring repentance from her heart.

As if the poet could not express all that he wished to express in his painting, he gave a fuller explanation in exquisite poetry:

"Seest thou not my bridgegroom's face,
That draws me to Him?
For His feet my kiss,
My hair, my tears He craves today,
And O! what words can tell
What other day and place,
Shall see me clasp those blood-stained feet of His.
He needs me, He calls me, loves me,
Let me go."

—Dr. H. T. Kerr, in Presbyterian Banner.

"TILL HE COME."

We come to meet Thee at Thy Holy Board,
Where Thou dost strengthen us with food divine;
Deign Thou to welcome these Thy guests, O Lord—
Break Thou for us the Bread and pour the Wine.

We gather round Thy Table, each a guest,
At Thine own bidding—glad to meet Thee here;
Glad to obey our Master's loved behest,
And thankful for the tokens we revere.

Thine is the love which gives the holy food
And Thine the hands which spread the sacred feast;
We come as sinners, but in contrite mood—
All to receive—unworthy of the least.

May each succeeding link bind us in one
To Thee our Lord, whose life for us was given;
So shall we keep the tryst, until Thou come,
Until we join the marriage feast in Heaven.

—Rev. A. J. Treloar.

"It Can't Be Done."

The Can't family is very large and those who say a thing can't be done are very numerous. Many things that seem difficult and even impossible can be done if we face them with force and determination. Many lives that are miserable failures are those who gave up to the can'ts.

A Negro seemed very much depressed and his companion asked what the trouble was. He replied: "Dat specialist what zamined me done and told me I'se got de high blood pressure what de white folks has. He told me I got to eat stewed chicken and stay in outten the night air, and you know, nigger, it can't be done!"—Richmond Christian Advocate.

IF WE BELIEVED IN GOD.

If we believed in God, there would be light
Upon our pathway in the darkest night

If we believed in God, there would be power
To foil the tempter in the sorest hour.

If we believed in God, there would be peace
In this world's warfare, ever to increase.

If we believed in God, there would be joy
Even in tears, that nothing could destroy.

If we believed in God, there would be love

Lord, Christ, be near us, that, beholding
To heal all wounds and lift the world above.

CHOOSE A STAR.

Annette Patton Cornell.

Life is a quest.
Choose a star—
  Follow it to the end;
And share your light in the firmament
  With a tired, way-worn friend.

Journey with faith,
Do not fear.
  Steadily tread the ground;
But keep your eyes on your chosen star—
  Think what the Wise Men found!

The Porcupine.

Delightfully cool it was that September afternoon in the forest. On the soft moss, in the deep shade of the great oak trees, lay the forester and the little boy. They were lazily studying the world of fluttering leaves above them. Already they had counted twelve different kinds of birds, when the little boy cried: "See that bird's nest, 'way over there where the sky shows through—in that big elm tree! It's a regular whopper!"

Aided by the little pointing finger, the forester found the spot; and a smile crept into his eyes as he said: "That nest! If you can guess what kind of a nest that is, I'll—I'll—"

"Will you tell me a story if I do?" put in the boy eagerly.

"Yes; I'll tell you a story."

Immediately the little boy began to guess. And he guessed the names of all the birds ne'd ever heard about. But every time the forester shook his head.

"Whatever kind of a nest can it be?" puzzled the little boy. Then very sud denly he sat up.—What was happening?

The nest was climbing down the tree.

"Why," gasped the little boy, "it's—it's a porky! Not a bird's nest at all!"

"It's a porcupine, all right," agreed the forester, "but you never would have guessed if it had stayed still."

"But I guessed—and you promised. So go ahead, please."

"If I must, I must," sighed the forester. Then he started right in. Mr. and Mrs. Porcupine were singing up in the old elm tree one winter's day."

"Singing!" laughed the little boy. "Porcupines can't sing!"

"Yes, they can. And a fearful racket these two made of it, I can tell you. Up and down the scales they squealed and grunted—no melody, no tune; nothing but noise. Yet not one among all the creatures in the forest threw anything at them—no, not even an acorn. They weren't angry; they were glad. When a porcupine sings, you see, it means just one thing. It means that spring is coming—spring with plenty to eat and relief from the fearful, biting cold. No wonder the forest folks had a regular jubilee at the very thought!

"And before many days had gone by spring did come to the forest. And then early in April along came Jim—Jim Porcupine.

"But no one knew anything about Jim—except of course Mr. and Mrs. Porcupine and Jim himself. His coming was kept a deep, dark secret. And little Jim—he was kept hidden away in the darkest corner of their home in the old hemlock tree. Indeed, until he was two months old he never saw the great green forest at all, except through a crack in the old tree.

"Sometimes, through this crack, he would see a huge bear go lumbering by; or a lynx; or maybe a deer, with a tiny fawn. Once he saw a weasel glide along the ground and capture a wood mouse.

"'Mother,' he cried timdly one day, 'how do you dare go out of this safe home of ours, when there are so many great fierce creatures in the wood? You can't walk fast at all. Why don't they eat you?'

"'Stand back, little Jim, and see!' exclaimed Mrs. Porcupine.

"Far back in the corner went Jim; then he looked eagerly at his mother.

"'Watch carefully, little Jim; watch carefully,' urged Mrs. Porcupine.

"'I'm a-doing it; I'm a-doing it!' cried Jim, jumping up and down in his excitement.

"Then he saw a strange thing. Mrs. Porcupine, placing her head between her short little legs, suddenly turned into a round, bristling ball. Out of her soft brown fur, long quills sprang in every direction. Little Jim could see the sharp barbs on each one of them. No wonder the other animals let her alone!

"'O Mother! Could I do that?' he squealed delightfully. 'Come out of it, and tell me quick!'

"Lifting her head from the ground and letting her quills subside, she answered: 'Pretty soon, little Jim, pretty soon. Just a while longer, and you'll be safe to go where you please.'

"After that morning Jim could hardly wait until his quills were full grown; every day he'd have his mother look at them.

"Aren't they long enough yet?" he'd inquire, anxiously.

"And one fine morning his mother answered: 'Yes, little Jim, they're ready at last.'

"Then, pushing him gently through the doorway, she made a deep bow to the towering trees and cried: 'Great forest, this is little Jim; little Jim, this is the great forest.'

"With a loudly beating heart, Jim stepped forth into the wide, fluttering greenness he had watched so long. Down to the shadowy little pond he wandered, where the lily pads grew. Ah, how delicious they tasted! He climbed the elm trees and had a feast on their tender green shoots. So very good they were that he kept on eating them, too—couldn't seem to stop at all.

"One day he saw Mr. Weasel gliding along a branch of the tree he was in. Bristling into a ball of spikes, he waited; he was not afraid. But Mr. Weasel was not after him at all; he was far too wise to tackle a porcupine. Some poor, defenseless baby squirrels suited him much better. And he got them, too. Jim heard their cries. He started angrily toward the weasel, but Mr. Weasel, like a redbrown streak of lightning, slipped down the tree and disappeared.

"But he appeared again that same afternoon. Jim was down at the lily pond talking to a little frog. He was asking him questions about the forest. The little frog always had an answer ready. And Jim, no doubt, would have grown very wise—if it hadn't been for one thing. The answer, which the little frog gave so readily to every question, was always the very same—just three words: 'I don't know.'

"It sounded so funny, 'I don't know', 'I don't know', 'I don't know', popping out so very promptly and surely every single time that Jim kept right on asking questions. Besides, he was really curious. Did the little frog know anything? Or did he not? It made a splendid game.

"Little Frog," he asked at last, "what makes you so very, very green?" Then, reaching for a luscious young lily pad, he waited for his answer.

"But this time it didn't come. What could be the matter? He looked up. Little Frog was gone. Mr. Weasel sat in his place, smacking his ugly lips, through which one tiny green leg was disappearing.

"'Sorry to interrupt your interesting conversation,' he leered. 'But I was mighty hungry.' Then, grinning cruelly at the angry little porcupine, he sped away into the bulrushes.

"This pleasant little joke of Mr. Weasel's didn't make Jim love him any more, you may be sure. That poor little frog! Never again could he say: 'I don't know.' I was very sad. Did he know anything? Or did he not? Alas, Jim would never know now. It certainly was very provoking—leaving things up in the air that way. And from this day little Jim was always trying to think of some way to get rid of Mr. Weasel.

"But what could a slow-footed little porcupine do to a weasel? Why, before Jim could get his short little legs to carry him a yard, Mr. Weasel was always gone — somewhere — anywhere. It was very confusing and maddening. Little Jim had to stop every time just where he was—all wound up and no place to go! And the weasel—well, he thought it was the funniest thing he had ever heard of, the very funniest. A porcupine trying to interfere with him! Ha! ha! ha! That was a good one.

"There came a time, however, when Mr. Weasel didn't laugh. No, indeed. He couldn't. And this is how it came about:

"In a nest near the top of the great poplar tree lived three baby robins. Jim was very much surprised every day when he saw they were still alive. Ever since the three blue, speckled eggs had first appeared, he had been watching the nest. Now he was beginning to hope that the robins would really grow up, without Mr. Weasel's discovering them at all. Indeed, they really were learning to fly already. As Jim watched the tiny, tiny birds fluttering their wings, he suddenly saw Mr. Weasel in the next tree. He, too, was staring at the young robins—staring greedily.

Fortunately, the mother bird returned just then to her nest, and Mr. Weasel, after watching a long time, went away. He didn't want to fight; not he. Quite well he knew he could come back some other time, when the nest would be unprotected. He preferred to do things quietly and peaceably every time.

"Jim also knew that the weasel would come back, and he feared the three robins were doomed. But that very afternoon those bright little birds learned to fly. And off they went, leaving the nest quite empty. Jim saw them go. Right then and there he had his big idea.

"And this is what he did. He climbed down the old tree, where he had been munching away at the twigs and bark; and as quickly as his clumsy little feet would let him, he climbed up into the poplar tree—straight to the empty nest, then he did a queer thing. He pushed the nest off the branch and—settled snugly in its place.

"'Now, Mr. Weasel, I'm ready for you,' he remarked. Then, letting his fur and quills drop about him until he looked very much like the old nest, he waited eagerly.

"By and by Mr. Weasel came gliding along, gliding along. This was his great chance—no mother bird in sight, now. He must hurry, though. With eyes glowing greedily—ah, these juicy little birds—he shot up the tree, sprang along the branch and landed—on Jim, Jim with every barbed quill ready, and his tail lashing furiously till it rattled.

"How Mr. Weasel ever climbed down the tree again is a mystery, for the whole under side of his body was stuck full of quills. Indeed, he looked very much like a porcupine himself, upside down. But, though he got away, he never, never was seen in that forest again.

"And all the forest folks rejoiced greatly—nobody loved Mr. Weasel. They all thought Jim must be a brave porcupine; and little Jim himself—he knew he was; a very brave one, a regular hero, in fact."

As the forester finished his story, the little boy exclaimed: "It must be fun to be a porcupine!"

"I wouldn't care to be one," declared the forester emphatically. "I couldn't lie on my back and look up into the green trees like this, if I were a porcupine."

"No," agreed the little boy, smiling, "not unless you wanted to feel like a pin-cushion, anyhow."—The Continent.

THE CHRISTMAS CARAVAN.

High in the heavens the sun—
And drive none by one,
Three camels from an Eastern land
Cast shadows on the sand.

Deep in men's eyes unrest;
Deep in their hearts a quest;
And myrrh weighs down the saddle-hold,
And frankincense and gold.

Clear in the holy night
The gracious moon walks white,
But three swift camels from afar
Follow a moving star.

They pass the folded sheep,
They pass dark herds asleep,
To kneel at last, their journey done,
Before God's little Son.

Out in the World.

"Little grasshoppers should stay at home," said Mother Grasshopper one morning, looking at her children.

Little Tommy Grasshopper and little Johnny Grasshopper and little Daisy Grasshopper all nodded Yes, and turned somersaults on the grass by Mother Grasshopper's side, but little Baby Grasshopper sulked by himself behind a mullen-stalk.

"I'm not a little Grasshopper," he whispered very softly, so Mother Grasshopper should not hear him. "I am old enough to go out in the world all by myself." And when he thought Mother Grasshopper was not looking, he hopped a little farther away. Still she did not appear to be watching; no, she was busy showing Daisy Grasshopper, Tommy Grasshopper, and Johnny Grasshopper just how to place themselves for a high jump. So Baby Grasshopper reached the third mullen-stalk safely, and as he peered around it he saw that Mother Grasshopper was not even looking in his direction.

He hopped and hopped until he was so far away he couldn't see Mother Grasshopper, or any of his brothers and sisters. He could see all around him, way up over his head, only grass and weeds and flowers.

By and by Baby Grasshopper felt he must see where he was, so he climbed a big stalk he saw near him. Up and up he climbed, and he was almost at the top when he lost his balance and fell. bump! so hard that he had no breath left to cry.

At last he picked himself up and began to go on. "I won't go back to Mother Grasshopper," he said, although he ached very hard. "I will go on."

All at once pounce! went something and caught him in its sharp claws; but because that something was only a kitten and she opened her paws to see what she had caught, Baby Grasshopper had a chance to jump away.

He had barely touched the ground, however, when he jumped again, just in time to keep from being stepped on by a foot that belonged to a little girl who had come to the field with her kitten to pick daisies. He was so frightened this time that he did not stop to see where he was going and landed in the golden heart of a big white daisy.

"Oh!" cried a soft voice, which sounded as loud as thunder to poor Baby Grasshopper. "Here is a little bit of a Baby Grasshopper!" and he found himself all at once in the dark, held tight down on to the daisy.

Then he was gathered into something soft. It was still dark, and he felt himself being carried on and on, until at last the tight hold loosened.

"See, mother," cried the little girl, "here is a Baby Grasshopper. I caught him in my handkerchief. I will keep him in a box."

"Poor Baby Grasshopper!" said mother softly, "out in the grass and flowers and the sunlight and all the gentle little breezes, then carried home by a big giant to live in a dark prison, and in a day or two die, wanting the light and air and flowers."

Two tiny tears rolled down the little girl's face. "Mother, I didn't think," she cried. "I'll take it right back. I will," and off she started with her poor little prisoner.

All at once Baby Grasshopper found himself back on the big daisy, and the little girl ran away and left him.

As soon as he recovered his breath he climbed slowly down the stalk and

"TIDEWATER TALES"

A book into which is gathered the folklore, traditions and history of Tidewater Virginia. Written in a delightful informal style by Prof. William C. Garnett.

The President of a College in South Carolina writes in part: "My wife and I have been reading with great interest, 'Tidewater Tales', written by Prof. Garnett. I have never read a work of this kind the style of which I have found more attractive, simple and yet elegant, interesting but never monotonous. I have found the greatest pleasure in reading it, and I am delighted that you called my attention to it."

A prominent representative of a Publishing Co., and a lover of books, writes: "You have built a monument to yourself, and long after the green sod grows over you, this book will be read by our children and children's children. I could read 'A Fox Hunt 'Fo de War' every week in the year and get a thrill each time I read it." One of the most prominent merchants in this section of Virginia writes. "To know the author of 'Tidewater Tales' should guarantee the sale of this work."

A prominent attorney in Washington, and himself a writer, and well-known lecturer, writes in part: " . . the charming description of the old homes, the history and traditions, and the true-to-life stories in local color, combined to delight me, and enticed my memory to run down the corridors of the past."

A profesor in one of the Virginia Universities writes: "You have put posterity in your debt by presenting so skilfully to them characters that have passed to the beyond. The story of that old Virginia negro in Louisiona touches me deeply."

started back home just as fast as he could hop.

Mother Grasshopper was still teaching Daisy Grasshopper, Johnny Grasshopper, and Tommy Grasshopper how to jump, but she smiled behind their backs as Baby Grasshopper crept quietly behind her, and she heard him say softly to himself, "Little Grasshoppers had better mind their mothers and stay at home, where they belong." And that's just what Baby Grasshopper did.—Children's Leader.

The Boy on London Bridge.

One evening I was crossing London Bridge to get a train for Brighton. In the gloom I noticed ahead of me the strange little figure of a boy walking with a crutch. I could just make out the withered leg dangling limply against the stem of the crutch as he plodded his way homeward. Dear little fellow. He must have been a match-seller or maybe he sold newspapers at some street corner to earn a scanty living. As I walked behind him I felt so sorry for the little chap out in the rainy night, for it was long after ten o'clock. How hopeless and terrible it seemed to me!

Behind me I heard some one coming. He was running, and I heard the squelchy sound of bare feet in the puddles. It was another boy. He passed me in the ring of light from one of the darkened lamps. Truly his was as comical a figure as the boy's ahead was sad. The barefooted youngster had on a pair of trousers that had been made for a man. The trouser legs were all folded up to give him freedom for his feet. On top of this he had a huge jersey folded up almost to his chin. The sleeves were tucked back almost to his shoulders.

"What a little ragmuffin," I thought, "and as wild as a boy can be, I'll warrant."

There now, he has got alongside of the crippled boy. The little ragmuffin stopped, "Is he going to harm the cripple?" I hurried up to within a short distance and heard:

"Say, kiddie, are you going my way? Where d'ye live? Down by the 'Elephant and Castle?' You're tired, I'll bet. Let me see you home."

Down he slithered on his knees and hitched the little cripple up on his back.

So, I thought, boys and girls can show us how to be unselfish.—Selected.

HIGH PRAISE—WELL DESERVED

The Bishop of London has made striking use of some of these parables in his latest book "Joy in God". The Bishop in one reference says, "I was reading to-day to the choir boys of the Chapel Royal a charming little story out of a book called 'The Golden Windows'." He proceeds to tell the story. Again, when speaking to the girls of St. Paul's School, the Bishop says, "I was very much struck with a beautiful story in a book called 'The Golden Windows'. I should like to leave this as my last picture on your mind". Then he told them "The Wheatfield", one of the many gems the book contains. Price, cloth, $1.50.

SANFORD, N. C.

Our present church building is undesirably located in a mill section. It is a small, unattractive building, and we cannot grow until we move. We are endeavoring to build a new edifice in the residential section of the city, and now have the walls about six feet above the ground. As we have only about 18 or 20 communicants, it is absolutely necessary for us to secure help from our friends, in order to construct a building, that will be worthy of the name of our dear old church.

WILLIAM ARMISTEAD COCKE.

WILLIAM ARMISTEAD COCKE, son of the late Edmund R. Cocke and Lucia H. Cocke, of Oakland, Cumberland County, Va., died at Stuart Circle Hospital Saturday, December 29, 1928, aged 40. He is survived by two brothers, Edmund R. Cocke, Jr., and Nelson P. Cocke, and three sisters, Elizabeth R. Cocke, Edmonia M. Cocke and Mrs. W. C. Gardner. MEMORIAL ON THE DEATH OF JAMES CASKIE

Senior Warden of St. James' Church, Richmond, Va., Adopted at Special Meeting of the Vestry Dec. 26, 1928.

James Caskie, who departed this life on the nineteenth day of December, 1928, had been a member of the congregation of St. James' Church since his baptism by Dr. Joshua Peterkin, who was his godfather. He served on the vestry continuously from April 4, 1893; was elected Junior Warden in the fall of 1914, and continued to hold that office until October 3, 1922, when he became Senior Warden to succeed Mr. E. B. Addison.

By reason of his character, his judgment, and his loyalty to the highest ideals, Mr. Caskie was an example to all who knew him. He exhibited in a rare manner the characteristics which cause a man to be described as a "Christian Gentleman". A valued friend and adviser, on the Vestry of this Church no one showed a greater devotion to its welfare nor a greater interest in all the activities of the congregation, and no one rendered greater service. With a reverence for the past, he was ever ready to accept whatever new ideas and new plans for the work of the congregation promised an improvement, provided always there was no suggestion of departure from the foundation of Christian faith on which the Church is builded and in which he daily lived.

His friends have lost one who greatly endeared himself to them and who responded without fail in those moments when real friendship gives what nothing else can supply. The congregation and the Vestry will miss his companionship and his counsel, but what has come into our lives from association with him and to St. James' Church from his wise guidance will remain with us always and with St. James' Church so long as it endures.

To his wife and his family we tender our deep sympathy, and the Registrar is directed to send to Mrs. Caskie a cpoy of this memorial.

DR. MERCER P. LOGAN.

Sewanee was shocked Saturday, December 1, 1928, to learn of the sudden death of DR. MERCER PATTON LOGAN, Dean of the DuBose School at Monteagle, Tenn. Dr. Logan's death occurred Saturday afternoon shortly after he had left Nashville en route to Sewanee, and was caused by a sudden attack of heart failure. Before the train had reached Murfreesboro, he had succumbed.

Dr. Logan was a man loved by all who knew him. He was a man of wide understanding and human sympathies. He was, further, a man to whom the surrounding community always looked for understanding and leadership. He was gifted in being able to see the good in people, and in being able to treat their shortcomings in a way free from criticism. He was remarkably well-fitted for the position which which he held at the DuBose School, and his loss will be felt there especially.

Dr. Logan was born near Roanoke, Va. He was educated for the ministry at Roanoke College and the Virginia Theological Seminary at Alexandria. He has been rector of several important parishes and has been Dean of the DuBose School for the past five years. Dr. Logan took an active interest in the civic welfare of every city in which he was a rector. He founded, and has been its Dean since its foundation, the Summer Training School for Church Workers at Sewanee.

The funeral services were conducted from St. Ann's Episcopal Church in Nashville, of which Church Dr. Logan was a former rector, last Monday afternoon. Bishop J. M. Maxon was in charge of the services. Burial was in Mt. Olivet Cemetery, Nashville.

Dr. Logan is survived by his wife and the following daughters: Mrs. Preston S. Brooks, Jr., Sewanee; Mrs. John R. Jackson, Nashville; Mrs. F. F. Milsaps, Monroe, La.; Mrs. Joe Glover, Charleston, S. C., and Mrs Cooper Stockell, Nashville.

New Year's Services.

A one-hour "Watch-Word" service from 11 P. M. to midnight will be held on New Year's Eve (Monday night), at St. James' Church, Madison Avenue and Seventy-First Street, New York. Just before the stroke of midnight the office of "Compline" will be said. The "Watch-Word" for the New Year will be given by the Rev. Dr. Frank Warfield Crowder, rector of St. James. Special organ numbers will be rendered by G. Darlington Richards, organist of St. James, and Miss Frances Newsom, soprano, will sing solos, in addition to anthems by the vested choir of men and boys. On the morning of New Year's Day there will be a Communion service with music at 11 o'clock.

The Rev. Dr. J. M. Magruder, of Lexington, Ky., has been serving during December as supply rector at St. Michael's Church, Charleston, S. C.

A cable received December 26 from Monrovia announced the arrival of Bishop Campbell and the Rev. R. T. Dickerson.

The Rev. Joseph M. Waterman, rector of the Church of the Resurrection, Baltimore, Md., has received and accepted a call to Trinity Church, Parkersburg, W. Va. Mr. Waterman leaves Baltimore about the first of January.

ORDINATIONS.

In Trinity Church, Litchfield, Minn., on the Fourth Sunday in Advent, December 23, 1928, Bishop McElwain advanced Mr. Elmer Milbrook Lofstrom to the diaconate; the Rev. William E. Harmann was the presenter, and the Bishop preached the sermon.

The Rev. Mr. Lofstrom will continue his studies at Nashotah.

An ordination in the Chapel of Church Missions House is a rare event. One took place on St. John the Evangelist's Day, when the Rev. Claud Hill Leyfield was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Murray. Mr. Leyfield came originally from Baltimore and was the Bishop's candidate. He has recently been serving as assistant in St. Paul's Church, Albany, a further link with the Missions House as the rector, the Rev. A. R. McKinstry, was formerly corresponding secretary in the Field Department. Mr. McKinistry presented the candidate. Mr. Hobbs preached the sermon. Mr. Leyfield continues at St. Paul's, Albany.

"That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying,

What mean ye by these stones?

Then ye shall answer them, these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever." Joshua 4:6-7.

JUST as Joshua commanded the twelve men, one from each tribe of Israel, to take from the bed of the river Jordan, where the feet of the Priests stood firm, each man a stone and with these stones build a monument to commemorate the passing over Jordan—So, as our loved ones pass from our immediate presence over Jordan, should we select the most perfect, the most beautiful and the most lasting stone for the monuments we erect to commemorate their beautiful virtues and accomplishments.

Specify WINNSBORO GRANITE

"The Silk of the Trade"

Its flawless beauty, stalwart strength, and great durability, combined with its adaptability to design make it the ideal monumental stone with which to perpetuate the memory of life's greatest virtues.

Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty, because they contain more deleterious elements, such as water, lime and iron. These elements tend to disintegration and discoloration.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument you purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B. H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below.

OUR BIBLE

THE WORD OF GOD

"The Word of God is supernatural in origin, eternal in duration, inexpressible in value, infinite in scope, regenerative in power, infallible in authority, universal in interest, personal in application, inspired in totality. Read it through, write it down, pray it in, work it out, and then—pass it on."

THE TIME TO TRUST

"O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee."—Ps. 84:12.

The time to trust
Is when you cannot trace;
When darkness hides God's face
And settles on your way—
Trust then.

"Who walketh in darkness? Let him trust in the name of the Lord."—Isa. 50:10.

The time to trust
Is when there's danger near
And when the heart, through fear,
Would falter, or would fail.
Trust then.

"What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee."—Ps. 56:3.

The time to trust
Is when some earthly stay,
Or strength, has slipped away
And left you insecure.
Trust then.

"They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever."—Ps. 125:1.

The time to trust
Is in defeat's dark hour.
E'er then Christ has the pow'r
To give you victory.

"Underneath are the everlasting arms."—Deut. 33:27.

The One to trust
Is CHRIST—not self, nor friend.
Man's aid must have an end
Of pow'r, or will, to help.
So trust CHRIST evermore.

"Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord JEHOVAH is everlasting strength." "I will trust and not be afraid."—Isa. 26:4; 12:2.

"Cast all your care upon Him, for He careth for you."

I recommend you to ground your life on the law of excellence. Make excellence the governing idea, not only in your labor, but in yuor leisure as well. Learn to enjoy yourself by doing things excellently. Believe me, there is no form of enjoyment at all comparable to that. I know the difficulties; I know the obstructions and the inhibitions which make it difficult to practice the law of excellence in the world as it is now arranged.—L. P. Jacks.

"There was a man, though some did call him mad,
The more he cast away, the more he had."

—Bunyan.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

We feel that we are greater than we know.—Wordsworth.

"Stir up the flame that is within you."

When one gives himself to the Lord all lesser giving becomes easy.—Expositor.

I have read in Plato and Cicero sayings that are very wise and beautiful; but I have never read in the works of either of them: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest."—St. Augustine.

Amos R. Wells tells the story of a poor woman in the depths of Central Africa who was drinking in the story of Jesus Christ as a mission told it to her. At last she broke out in exclamations of joy: "Oh, that is the one who came to me so often in my prayer, I could not find out who He was."

"The future belongs to the men and women of the great venture. According to your faith—that is, according to your venture—so shall it be unto you."

Be still, my soul! thy God doth undertake
To guide the future as He has the past;
Thy hope, thy confidence, let nothing shake;
All now mysterious shall be bright at last.

What was it Robert Louis Stevenson said? Worn with disease down there in the South Sea Islands, he said: "Life is an affair of cavalry." What he meant was that life is a thing to be dashingly used and cheerfully hazarded in the service of men.

Philip findest Nathanael, is a good motto for every one who has been found by the Master. One drop of rain, and then another, and at last a mighty, rushing stream. One soul, and then another, and at the end, the Kingdom of our God!

"The real blessing of which the Master speaks in the Beatitudes is, in its very essences, spiritual. True happiness depends more on a man's character than on this condition, more on what he is than on what he has."

"What can I spare? we say,
Ah, this and this,
From mine array
I am not like to miss.
And here are crumbs to feed some hungry one,
They do but grow a cumbrance on my shelf—
And yet Our Father gave His Son,
Our Master gave Himself."

—Frederick Langbridge.

There is a life deep hid in God
Where all is calm and still,
Where, listening to His holy Word,
One learns to trust, until
All anxious care is put away
And there is peace profound, alway:
Grant us Thy peace, O God!

—Henry W. Frost.

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 12, 1929. No. 2.

CONCERNING SMITH COLLEGE

St. Agnes Episcopal School

Alexandria, Virginia

December 15, 1928.

The Editor of The Southern Churchman:

In an editorial on "Education" in The Southern Churchman for December 15, several statements are made about Smith College which would be misleading to any one who did not know the facts. I am taking the liberty of sending you a marked copy of a bulletin issued by the Alumnae Association, which I trust may correct to some extent the information you have received.

May I say also that President Neilson is honored and loved by those who know him and that the college is fortunate in having a man of such qualities as its head.

Marguerite E. Chapman.

The bulletin enclosed and referred to in the above letter is a printed document of more than a thousand words, addressed to "The Alumnae of Smith College", dated Northampton, Massachusetts, the home of the college, February 1, 1928, and signed by the five officers of the Alumnae Association. Evidently it was issued because of viciously sensational stories in yellow newspapers based on the mysterious disappearance of a young woman student, but it includes a general defence of the college and special comment on the obscene questionnaire presented by students to students in 1924-25. In this part of the country the impulse of the average citizen whose sister or daughter was asked to answer such a questionnaire would be to fill with buckshot any man responsible for it. The bulletin says, however, that the questions were prepared and submitted "by the students themselves to themselves in one senior section in advanced sociology", that the professor concerned "regretted having permitted it" and that it did not come to the notice of President Neilson until months afterward.

It is impossible to avoid the thought that a tree is known by its fruits. If senior students of a college for young women had minds so filled with filth and moral poison as to ask themselves, for instance, whether, if married, they would feel that they had the right to indulge themselves with lovers, it looks as if they had been taught that the Commandments were not to be regarded nor taken as guides for conduct and that the decencies of civilized society were not binding.

Doubtless very fine women with beautiful characters and of splendid usefulness have come from Smith College. The old fables of virgins and pure wives walking unscathed through fire and unsoiled through showers of dirt and the familiar fairy story of the girl whose words dropped from her lips as beautiful jewels are illustrated daily in our womanhood. The fact to which The Southern Churchman tried to direct attention—in connection with the intrusively prominent part taken by the faculties and graduates of Harvard, Smith and Wellesley in defense of two Italian murderers, thieves and Anarchists—is that there are colleges and universities, especially here in the South, which do not flaunt sympathy with lawlessness, irreligion and anarchy. They do not train girls to disappear mysteriously, would not permit nor tolerate foul and filthy suggestions to young impressionable women, do not send out Anarchists nor perverted, hideous criminals, morbid suicides, torturers and murderers of children, nor blatant enemies of law, property rights, decency, government and Christianity.

The bulletin of the Alumnae Association in defence of Smith College tells us President Neilson, Scotch born, has been a citizen of the United States twenty-two years. In the more than thousand words the words "church", "Christian", "religion" do not occur. President Neilson's biography in "Who's Who", says he was instructor in Bryn Mawr, Columbia, Harvard—where Felix Frankfurter, foremost defender of the Italian Anarchists against the Massachusetts' jury, judge and governor, by whom they were sent to execution is a shining and cherished light—and the University of Paris; that he is author of "Origin and Sources of Courts of Love" and other books, member of four clubs and holder of five degrees. It gives no church membership or association or religious connection. If he has any, he seems to be ashamed of it. Most of the persons described in "Who's Who" give their religious affiliations frankly.

The bulletin avoids mention of the prominent participation of the college authorities and graduates in the attempt to prevent punishment of the Anarchist murderers and thieves, but denies that the college is a "hotbed of radicalism, atheism and immorality". The institution, we are told, "makes thrilling contributions to culture and citizenship". We are not told whether the endeavor to defeat the laws and authority of the State in behalf of murder, theft and anrchy is included among these thrilling contributions. The Soviet government of Russia, which sent out Christmas Day by radio derisive burlesques of the Gospel accounts of the birth and life of the Saviour, repeated by loud speaker near every church, assumes that it made thrilling contribution to culture and citizenship. The bulletin argumentatively asks whether sixty-nine alumnae would be likely to continue as members of the faculty of a college teaching "atheism, radicalism and immorality", but as the endowment, left by will of Sophia Smith, is $35,000,000 and the number of students, at last report, was 1,999, and the instructors, all liberally paid, were 197, this question, in light of the mental activities and lines of thought of the seniors, as revealed in the questionnaire already referred to, is hardly convincing.

We believe that Smith College and Bryn Mawr College are dangerous places.

Loyalty of alumnae and alumni to Alma Mater is natural, beautiful and admirable. It should not blind us to plain facts. One of these is that those of us who have sons and daughters we hope to make useful and honorable men and women, should be very earnest and thoughtful in providing for them "education". It is for us to take careful care that they are educated in the foundation doctrines of the Christian religion, which is common sense sublimated, and the real controlling power of this country and of the world. Unpretentious institutions, like those which have given us some of the best of our Presidents, are all about us, some of them under church auspices, others independent but directed by religious influence and example. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Aside from religious considerations and regarding only general conditions, we are in process of reaction from the fever of a great war and, in this country, of sudden and unexampled rush of prosperity and wealth. The great underlying, silent but always, in the last tests, governing majority of the American people is making itself felt for reestablishment and restoration of decency, propriety, piety, which are its heritage and part of its instinct. The boys and girls brought up now to obey God, to respect the Ten Commandments and follow the example and precepts of Christ will be with the overwhelming, ruling power of the next generation. The fancy taught, foul thinking, speaking and writing, indecently speculative, pretentiously advanced and actually coarse and common and cheap and superficially trained, who mistake blasphemy for brilliancy and indecency for progressive thought, will be thrust aside to permanent oblivion, as has happened to their like in generations past.

"Deep in thy heart, before its powers are yet by sin enslaved, be thy Creator's glorious name and character engraved." When we see Smith College and Bryn Mawr College, apparently, sacrificing the simple Christian faith for Modernism and other false isms and substituting silly theories for the truths of our Bible, we are not surprised at some of the output of those two colleges.

Langbourne M. Williams.

Since the above was written Professor Harry Elmer Barnes, of Smith College, has thrust himself to the front, furnishing The Associated Press, for the newspapers of the last Sunday of 1928, with additional information to Christian parents of the kind of instruction and training young women receive at that institution. "Sin has been relegated by science into the limbo of ancient superstitions," the professor announces. He is at the head of the sociological department of the college, advanced students of which submitted to fellow students a questionnaire so obscene, vulgar and coarse as to scandalize the country. Many acts hitherto branded as sinful, the professor concedes, may be socially harmful, but they should be characterized as immoral and criminal. Theology must be supplanted by mental hygiene, he says. Man is but "a temporary chemical episode", with no future after leading this life and no responsibility to anybody but himself and his fellow man, and that responsibility only according to his own conclusions. The ancient Greek ideal of "serenity and self-confidence" he decides is far better than the Christian teachings.

This kind of belief explains fully the active interest taken by the faculty of Smith College in saving from punishment and exalting into heroes the Italian Anarchists, murderers and thieves. They had serenity and self-confidence, were judges of their own conduct, recognized no law nor authority above their own ignorant and stupid conclusions. Do any of us wish our daughters trained to that standard and code of personal ethics?

THOSE WHO NAMED THE CHURCH

So far as can be learned, the names of the Episcopalians who met in semi-secret Convention at Chestertown, Maryland, November 9, 1780, and decided on "Protestant Episcopal", as the name of the American branch of the Church of England, never have been published. De Courcey W. Thom, of Baltimore, became interested in the subject from reading the articles in The Southern Churchman on the early Conventions of the Church. By diligent and persistent investigation he obtained the full list of all the clergymen and laymen composing the memorable and historic little assemblage, finding it in the Journal of the Ninety-third Annual Convention of the Church in Maryland, held in St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, May 31 and June 1 and 2, 1876. One name was illegible, but with tireless patience, Mr. Thom succeeded in obtaining that also. He kindly furnishes this list to The Southern Churchman, as follows:

The Rev. Samuel Keene, rector St. Luke's, Queen Anne's.

The Rev. Wm. Smith, D. D., rector Chester Parish, Kent County.

The Rev. James Jones Wilmer, rector Shrewsbury Parish, Kent County.

Colonel Richard Lloyd, vestryman St. Paul's Parish, Kent County.

Mr. James Dunn, vestryman St. Paul's Parish, Kent County.

Mr. John Page, vestryman St. Paul's Parish, Kent County.

Mr. Richard Miller, vestryman St. Paul's Parish, Kent County.

Mr. Samuel Wickes, vestryman St. Paul's Parish, Kent County.

Dr. John Scott, vestryman Chester Parish, Kent County.

Mr. J. W. Tilden, vestryman Chester Parish, Kent County.

Mr. St. Leger Everett, vestryman Chester Parish, Kent County.

Mr. James Wroth, vestryman Chester Parish, Kent County.

Mr. John Kennard, church warden Chester Parish, Kent County.

Mr. Sturgess, church warden Chester Parish, Kent County.

Mr. Christopher Hall, vestryman Shrewsbury Parish, South Sassafras, Kent County.

Mr. George Moffett, vestryman Shrewsbury Parish, South Sassafras, Kent County.

Mr. William Keating, vestryman Shrewsbury Parish, South Sassafras, Kent County.

Mr. George Moffett, Jr., church warden Shrewsbury Parish, South Sassafras, Kent County.

Mr. John Brown, vestryman St. Luke's Parish, Queen Anne County.

Mr. Downs.

Mr. William Bordly.

Mr. Van Dyke.

Col. Isaac Perkins.

Mr. Charles Groom.

Mr. William Keene.

Mr. James Hackett.

The last seven names are those of men having no official position in the Church, but bracketed in the report as "certain respectable gentlemen". The word "respectable" at that time had much stronger meaning than now, conveying the idea of persons entitled to and receiving the special respect and deference of their communities.

Mr. Thom, continuing his researches with admirable perseverance, which wins for him the gratitude of all interested in Church history, ascertains that of these unofficial members of the first of all Church Conventions, Mr. Bordly lived about twenty miles south of Chestertown; Mr. Perkins near that place; Mr. Groom, north of Chestertown; Mr. Keene in or north of it and close by; Mr. Hackett ten to fifteen miles south.

It will be seen that the gathering was strictly local. It really was held for local purposes. The proposed name, it is said, was suggested by Dr. Smith, but the resolution was offered by the Rev. James Jones Wilmer, rector of Shrewsbury Parish, Kent County, Dr. Smith being in the chair. The text of the momentous resolution was: "That the Church of England, as heretofore known in the Province, be now called the 'Protestant Episcopal Church'." It was adopted unanimously.

According to Tiffany's Church History, the name was adopted because a name was necessary for the petition the meeting was called to prepare for the Maryland General Assembly for right to organize to raise funds, by sale and rental of pews and otherwise, to keep churches in repair and provide for their support. The name was accepted and adopted everywhere, says Tiffany, by the American branch of the Church of England "as indicative and expressive of its leading peculiarities; Episcopal as distinguishing it from the presbyterial organization which virtually characterized all other Protestant ecclesiastical bodies, and Protestant as distinguished from the Church of Rome, whose regimen also was Episcopal". The title was first used officially by a representative body of the Church in a "declaration of rights and liberties" issued by the clergy of Maryland assembled at Annapolis in 1783, immediately after the definite announcement of peace with Great Britain.

THE RURAL CHURCH AND SOCIAL SERVICE

James F. Plummer, Archdeacon of South Alabama

ONE ought to be able to speak with some of the authority of experience who has served in the rural work for twenty years, both as rector of a strong, self-supporting rural parish and, for the past ten years, as minister-in-charge of groups of rural and suburban Mission Churches.

Before the creation, by the General Convention, of the Rural Work sub-department of the Department of Social Service, our country interests were an inconspicuous and little-valued phase of the Church's life and the clergy engaged in it were very generally assumed to be those who lacked fitness for worthier places. Now, it is coming to be recognized as an interest and obligation vital to the Church's growth and influence.

The purpose of this article is to suggest that, for the further development of this new and larger recognition, the General Church shall give classification to Rural Work in the National Council as of the nature of Missions and Church Extension, rather than as merely Social Service.

One wonders why it has been so classified. It is true that there are, principally in the East, a few definitely rural parishes, self-supporting and centers of community influence, but rural work as a whole is, with us, predominantly a part of the Domestic and Diocesan missionary interest of the Church.

It is, of course, true that the rural worker is no less in duty bound to serve men's social needs than his urban brother. His opportunities and facilities for rendering this service, however, are usually far less, limited as he is by non-residence at all but one of his group of Mission Churches and by the conspicuous condition that the Episcopal Church is almost always represented locally by a very small minority.

Our Rural Churches as such are usually further limited by the efficient organization of modern social activities by State and County and the Federal Government, such as County Farm and Medical Agents, Health Nurses, etc., and by the great voluntary organizations of the Red Cross, Boy and Girl Scouts, etc. The field that remains for organized social activity in country places under the Church's aegis and control is very small. It is our rural worker's privilege gladly to welcome and to seek opportunity of cooperating with these great agencies, but he is usually compelled by the logic of events to recognize that his place is a very subordinate one, especially in communities where he is non-resident.

Having these considerations in mind, it is with deep concern that one sees the distinctive place of our Church and her tried and tested methods deprecated and set aside and objectives proposed instead which might seem to miss the very raison d'etre of the Protestant Episcopal in country places. "Empty churches," for instance, the work of an eminent Churchman who has been more than once honored by General Convention as an exponent of her ideals and policies for country work, deprecates in strong terms the "subsidizing of small minority groups in rural communities, considers it an imposition upon the stronger centers to ask them to go on making sacrifices to provide these subsidies and sees no hope for improvement of religious conditions in the open country except in "Community Churches".

The section on The Rural Field in the General Church Program for 1929-30-31, just from the press with the imprimatur of the National Council, seems to echo this opinion when it says (pages 10 and 11), "In many communities the Protestant Churches are fairly jostling one another in a competitive scramble for members and the central or national boards often unwittingly assist in this fight for existence. In fact, one out of five rural churches receive missionary aid and more than half of these subsidized churches are in active competition with other subsidized churches". And, in the next paragraph it goes on: "The community offers great opportunity for Community Social Work; for the country people must have an opportunity for more abundant life than the average farm offers today."

One wonders why the word Protestant is employed. Does it exclude us? The slightest familiarity with the subject forbids such a thought. And, as for that which is commonly assumed to be the opposite of Protestant, none need to be told that, wherever the Roman Catholic Church is represented, this condition described as a wild scramble applies equally to her representatives, to put it mildly. And, while I think I may claim for our own communion, in general terms, a larger and more tolerant attitude in this inevitable competition, whether in city or country, it is true in this diocese that not only one out of five, but all our rural groups are subsidized by the diocese and are, willy-nilly, having forced upon them an active competition for a place in the community's religious life.

Let us discuss, then, this shift of emphasis to "Community Churches" as the sole remaining hope for religion in the country. Such churches, in any frank acceptance of the term, must be so organized and conducted as to include all the individuals composing the community who are of a mind to worship. We hear of Community Churches, seeking to meet this requirement announcing a program of pure theism, in order that they may include the Jew, for instance, who has considered and rejected his Messiah. We hear of others, not going so far as this in their broadness, but omitting all phases of Church government which are not purely congregational; all sacraments, all teaching which might run counter to the opinions of this or that sectarian (among whom, of course, they class us). What is left after this process may be more appropriately characterized as jelly-fish than as the Body of Christ.

An experience of my own, some years ago, may be typical. In a community owned and controlled by a great corporation, the company determined that it would solve its own employees' social problem in its religious aspect by creating under the company's patronage a Community Church and its plan was accepted in a mass meeting. A very capable War Community worker, a Congregational minister, was duly installed and I called upon him with friendly and brotherly inquiry as to how I and our very promising Mission in this place might cooperate with him. Very courteously—and I suppose inevitably—I was told that our best cooperation would be had by our fading out of the picture.

"But," I said, "we cannot do this without authorization from our Bishop and Board of Missions. If I am to present to them your proposal, I must have something to tell of your plan of operation." His reply was, "I can tell you that in a very few words. Our method will be to meet together for prayer and praise and preaching the Gospel and to try to forget all the rest".

"There are a few things further, however, which you will not be able to forget," I rejoined. "What is to be your purpose in preaching the Gospel? Will it not be to persuade your hearers to embrace the Gospel and to give our Lord their allegiance if they have not already done so?"

"Certainly it is!" he replied heartily.

"Then," I said, "we will suppose that, at the conclusion of your first sermon here next Sunday, a man comes to you and tells you that he has been moved by your appeal and wishes to act upon it. Will you baptize him?"

He realized, of course, that whichever method of Baptism might be employed, there would arise division in this community and his amazing reply was, "Well, perhaps".

I pressed further questions as to whether our hypothetical convert would be made a member of the community church solely, as to what course he would pursue in transferring this man when he should move to some other community, etc. The incident, it may be hoped, is a demonstration of the weakness of the community church idea, per se. Our Mission and all the others disappeared under the frown of the company. This first community pastor remained for a few months only, was succeeded by several equally brief tenures, until in the end the community church became, in effect, a denominational organization. Its remainder to this day is a community Sunday School, with preaching at night by ministers of whatever persuasion at five dollars per. No missionary activity or offerings; of course, no sacraments except as some non-resident missionary to this community church may administer them on his individual responsibility.

If space permitted, I might add my observation of other experiments at community church within the territory which I serve. In no case has the experiment failed either to prove so disappointing to its own organizers as to be abandoned, or else to be taken over by the strongest denomination represented in the community. And that has never been the Protestant Episcopal Church.

St. Paul wrote to the Church in Corinth, referring to certain perplexities and weaknesses that had arisen which might in some details be compared with those of rural work today: "I say again, let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little." The writer of this paper does not presume to put himself alongside the great Apostle, while he employs his words, to boast himself a little. In September, 1918, resigning the rectorship of a city parish, he accepted responsibility for all the rural and some of the suburban work within the limits of the Convocation of Mobile: seventeen places in all. Now, ten years later, there are two additional rural clergymen in this field, who have taken over all except the eight places which he continues to serve, their work going forward with enthusiasm and success, under God's blessing.

From the first, this group has furnished an honorable proportion of persons baptized and confirmed: in two of the ten years, ten per cent of all those confirmed in the diocese. It has returned in offerings for all purposes substantially more than the subsidy it has received for the support of its minister, so that even in money, it has been an asset and not a liability. Its minister-in-charge has never found it possible to "leave the Word of God and serve tables" in any formal and official connection with Community Social Service activities. He declined on one occasion a tentative invitation to become pastor of a projected community church, with the condition laid down that "he should not preach anything peculiar to his denomination!" He has sought loyally to set forth the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church, preaching to the best of his ability the pure Word of God and all things that are of necessity requisite to the same in country places, and duly administering her sacraments.

This is not at all to say that the serving of tables has been omitted. In this, individuals of our people are leaders in Red Cross, Near East Relief, Community Chest, etc. In one section of this field, Mrs. Macy, who is widely known in the Church as formerly Deaconess Sands, is serving as a United Offering worker in many phases of social as well as religious activity.

Let the Church beware of teaching her people in her strong centres that it is an unworthy thing to subsidize her rural churches. Let her beware of shifting the emphasis, which gives her her rightful place in every community, upon her real Catholic heritage, her orderly ways, her really broad and yet loyal tolerance and shifting it to a new emphasis (tempting to the discouraged, no doubt) upon community organization and activity, which, after all, is but ancillary to the Church's objective as the Kingdom of God.

When the automobile and improved roads increase the possible range of the individual worker's activities, this is no time for deprecating his non-residence in places which he might serve with the cooperation of local laymen and laywomen. The lines between town and country are rapidly melting away, in Church affairs as in others. Discriminations such as I have deprecated should also melt away.

ROBERT E. LEE

By the Late John W. Daniel, LL. D.

Retirement, Counsel and Acceptance of the Situation.

HAD the paroled soldier of Appomattox carried to retirement the vexed spirit and hollow heart of a ruined gamester, nothing had remained to him but to drain the dregs of a disappointed career. But there went with him that "consciousness of duty faithfully performed", which consoles every rebuff of fortune, sweetens every sorrow, and tempers every calamity—and now it was that he proved indeed what he once expressed in language, that "Human fortitude should be equal to human adversity". Once on the Appomattox lines agony had tortured his lips with the words, "How easily I could get rid of this and be at rest. I have only to ride along the lines, and all will be over". But he quickly added, "It is our duty to live, for what will become of the women and children of the South if we are not here to protect them?" And as the thought of his country was thus uppermost and controlling in the awful hour of surrender, so it remained to the closing of his life. Ere the struggle ended he had disclosed to a confidential friend, General Pendleton, that "he never believed we could, against the gigantic combination for our subjugation, make good our independence, unless foreign powers, directly or indirectly, assisted us". But said he, "We had sacred principles to maintain and rights to defend, for which we were in duty bound to do our best, even if we perished in the endeavor". And now that this belief was verified, he declared: "I did only what my duty demanded. I could have taken no other course without dishonor. And if all were to be done over again, I should act in precisely the same manner". And when those about him mourned the great disaster, he said, "Yes, that is all very sad, and might be a cause of self-reproach, but that we are conscious that we have humbly tried to do our duty. We may, therefore, with calm satisfaction, trust in God, and leave the results to Him".

Lee thoroughly understood and thoroughly accepted the situation. He realized fully that the war had settled, settled forever, the peculiar issues which had embroiled it; but he knew also that only time could dissipate its rankling passions and restore freedom; and hence it was he taught that "Silence and patience on the part of the South was the true course"—silence, because it was vain to speak when prejudice ran too high for our late enemies to listen—patience, because it was the duty of the hour to labor for recuperation and wait for reconciliation. And murmuring no vain sigh over the "might have been", which now could not be—conscious that our destinies were irrevocably bound up with those of the perpetual Union, he lifted high over the fallen standards of war the banner of the Prince of Peace, emblazoned with "Peace on earth and good will toward men".

The President and Congress of the United States made conditions of pardon and absolution. They were harsh and exacting. The mass of the people affected by them, of necessity, had to accept them. Therefore, he would share their humiliation. Accordingly, he asked amnesty. But his letter was never answered. He was indicted for treason. He appeared ready to answer the charge. But the government now revolted from an act of treachery so base, for his parole of Appomattox protected him. Thus he was reviled and harrassed, yet never word of bitterness escaped him; but, on the contrary, only counsels of forbearance, patience and diligent attention to works of restoration. Many sought new homes in foreign lands, but not so he. "All good citizens," he said, "must unite in honest efforts to obliterate the effects of war, and to restore the blessings of peace. They must not abandon their country, but go to work and build up its prosperity." "The young men especially must stay at home, bearing themselves in such a manner as to gain the esteem of every one, at the same time that they maintain their own respect." "It should be the object of all to avoid controversy, to allay passion, and give scope to every kindly feeling." "It is wisest not to keep open the sores of war, but to follow the example of those nations who have endeavored to obliterate the marks of civil strife, and to commit to oblivion the feelings it engendered."

"True patriotism sometimes requires of men to act exactly contrary at one period to that which it does at another, and the motive that impels them, the desire to do right, is precisely the same. The circumstances which govern their actions change, and their conduct must conform to the new order of things. History is full of illustrations of this. Washington himself is an example of this. At one time he fought against the French under Braddock; at another time he fought with the French at Yorktown, under the orders of the Continental Congress of America, against him. He has not been branded by the world with reproach for this, but his course has been applauded." These were some of the wise and temperate counsels with which he pointed out the duties of the hour.

Jefferson Davis.

Nor was he lacking in faithful remembrance of the President of the Confederacy, who for months and months after surrender lay sick and in prison, and who seemed to be singled out to undergo vicarious punishment for the deeds of the people. "Mr. Davis," truly said General Lee, "did nothing more than all the citizens of the Southern States, and should not be held accountable for acts performed by them, in the exercise of what had been considered by them unquestionable right." None are more conscious of this fact than those against whom Jefferson Davis directed the Confederate arms; and that he yet, nearly twenty years after strife has ceased, should be disfranchised in a land that vaunts its freedom, for so doing, is a grievance, and a grief to every honorable Southern man. He himself is honored by this significant mark of hostile memory. He cannot suffer by the ignoble act. Only they who do it are deeply ashamed. And that it is done, only shows the weakness of representatives who have not read the very title page in the book of human nature, and who, vainly conceiving that an insult to one man can be fruitful of any public good, only illustrate the saying of Madame de Stael, "That the strongest of all antipathies is that of second-rate minds for a first-rate one", and that other maxim of Edmund Burke, that "great empires and little minds go ill together". When Marc Antony, the great Triumvir of Rome, who conquered Egypt, was himself overthrown by Octavius Caesar, he gloried dying that he "had conquered as a Roman, and was by a Roman nobly conquered". If the spirit of those brave soldiers of the Union, who, while the fields of battle were yet moist with blood, saluted Lee, had guided the conduct of the civilians to whom their valor gave the reins of state, it would have been for us Confederates who achieved great victories, and were in turn cast down, to have gloried likewise, that we in our time had conquered as Americans, and were by Americans nobly conquered. But when we recall that our honored and faithful President is disfranchised simply because he was our chief, and bravely, ably served our cause, the iron enters our souls and represses the generous emotions that well up in them. And we can only lament that shallow politicians have proven unworthy of the American name, and are not imbued with the great free spirit of a great free people. We have not a thought or fancy or desire to undo the perpetuity of the Union. For any man to pretend to think otherwise is proclamation of his falsehood, or his folly. But we intend to be free citizens of the Union, accepting no badge of inferiority or dishonor. And by the tomb of our dead hero, who was true to his chief, as to every trust, we protest to mankind against this unjust thing; an offence to our liberties and to our manhood, which are not less sacred than the grave.

And we waft to him, our late Chief Magistrate, in his Southern home, our greetings, and our blessings; and as the years grow thick upon him, we pray that he may find the unabated confidence and affection of his people, some solace for all that he has borne for them; and in the strength that cometh from on high, a staff that man cannot take from him.

Meditations of Duty.

While General Lee thus sustained and cheered his countrymen, the problem soon began to press, what should he do with himself? And had he been in any sense a self-seeker, the solution had been easy, for many were the overtures and proffers made to him in every form of interested solicitation, and disinterested generosity. Would he seek recreation from the trials which for years had strained every energy of mind and body, and every emotion of his heart—the palaces of European nobility, the homes of the Old World and the New, alike, opened their doors to him as a welcome and honored guest. Would he prolong his military career? More than one potentate would have been proud to receive into his service his famous sword. Would he retrieve his fortunes and surround his declining years with luxury and wealth? He had but to yield the sanction of his name to any one of the many enterprises that commercial princes commended to his favor, with every assurance of munificent reward. And indeed, were he willing to accept, unlimited means were placed at his disposal by those who would have been proud to render him any service.

But it had been the principle of Lee's life to accept no gratuitous offer. He had declined the gift of a home tendered to him by the citizens of Richmond during the war, when Arlington had been confiscated, and the refuge of his family, the "White House", had been burned—expressing the hope that those who offered the gift would devote the means required "to the relief of the families of our soldiers in the field, who are more deserving of assistance, and more in want of it than myself". And now when an English nobleman presented him as a retreat a splendid country seat in England, with a handsome annuity to correspond, he answered: "I am deeply grateful, but I cannot consent to desert my native State in the hour of her adversity. I must abide her fortunes and share her fate." And declining also the many positions with lucrative salaries which were urged upon his acceptance, it was his intention to locate in one of the Southside counties of Virginia, "upon a small farm where he might earn his daily bread" in cultivating the soil, and at the same time to write a history of his campaigns; "not," as he said, "to vindicate myself, and promote my own reputation, but to show the world what our poor boys with their small numbers and scant resources had succeeded in accomplishing".

But circumstances, then to him unknown, were bringing an event to pass which turned over a new and unexpected leaf in his history—an event which made a little scion of knowledge, which had been nurtured through the storms of the Colonial Revolution, a great and noble University, and which now has associated in the glorious work of education, as in glorious deeds of arms, the twin names of Washington and Lee.

Liberty Hall Academy.

It was nearly a century after the settlement at Jamestown, that Governor Spotswood of Virginia, at the head of a troop of horse, first explored the hitherto unknown land beyond the mountains, and upon his return from the expedition, the Governor presented to each of his bold companions a golden horse-shoe, inscribed with the legend: "Sic jurat transcendere montes", as a memorial of the event; a circumstance which caused them to be named in history, "The Knights of the Golden Horseshoe". In August, 1716, these adventurous spirits first looked down from the heights of the Blue Ridge upon the beautiful Valley of Virginia—a virgin land indeed, tenanted only by the roving red men. Glorious must have been the thrill of joy that quickened their hearts, as the tempting vision lay spread before them, as their eyes ranged over the fields and forests of this new land of promise in its summer sheen—a land watered with many rivers, and especially with that beautiful and abounding river, "the Shenandoah", which the Indians named "The Daughter of the Stars".

But prophetic as may have been the glance that saw in the fruitful valley the future home of a great and thriving people, slow were the footsteps that followed the pioneers and occupied the hunting-grounds of the receding Indians. For in those days immigration was not quickened by steam and electricity, and early tradition had pictured the transmontane country as a barren and gloomy waste, infested with serpents and wild beasts. But erewhile the reports of Spotswood and his men went far and wide, and the Star of Empire beamed over the Alleghanies. And along in 1730 and 1740, we find the spray of the incoming tide breaking over the mountains—the sturdy Scotch-Irish, for the most part, with some Germans and Englishmen, pouring into the Valley from Pennsylvania and Eastern Virginia, and from the fatherlands over the water. Not speculative adventurers were they, with the ambition of landlords, but bringing with them rifle and Bible, wife and child, and simple household goods—home-seekers and home-builders, who had heard of the goodly land, and who had come to stay, and who built the meeting-house and the school-house side by side when they came. Rough men were they—ready to hew their way to free and pleasant homes—but in nowise coarse men, for they were filled with high purpose, and religion and knowledge they knew should be hand-maids of each other. And showing their instinctive refinement—where the corn waved its tassels and the wheat bowed to the wind, by their rude log huts in the wilderness there also the vine clambered, and the rose and lily bloomed.

In 1749, near Greenville, in Augusta County—and Augusta County was then an empire stretching from the Blue Ridge Mountains to the Mississippi River—in 1749 Robert Alexander, a Scotch-Irish immigrant, who was a Master of Arts of Trinity College, Dublin, established there "The Augusta Academy"— the first classical school in the Valley of Virginia. Under his successor, the Rev. John Brown, the Academy was first moved to "Old Providence", and again to "New Providence Church", and just before the Revolution, for a third time, to Mount Pleasant, near Fairfield, in the new County of Rockbridge.

In 1776, as the revolutionary fires were kindling, there came to its head as principal William Graham, of worthy memory, who had been a class-mate and special friend of Harry Lee at Princeton College; and at the first meeting of the trustees after the battle of Lexington, while Harry Lee was donning his sword for battle, they baptized it as "Liberty Hall Academy". Another removal followed, in 1777, to near the old Timber-Ridge Church; but finally, in 1785, the academy rested from its wanderings near Lexington, the little town which, too, had caught the flame of revolution, and was the first to take the name of that early battle-ground of the great rebellion, where

> "The embattled farmers stood
> And fired the shot heard round the world".

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart"—Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. A. H. Hohnan:

> "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter" (St. John 13:7).

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

II SAMUEL.

Purpose.

THIS book of 2 Samuel was written to foreshadow Christ as God's King, the Man of His choice, David's Son, and therefore David's Heir, yet to rule on David's throne in Jerusalem (Matt. 1:1; Isa. 9:6, 7; Ps. 8:4-8).

It was also written to teach us how Christ, enthroned as Lord, can and does lead His people into victory and blessing in the heavenlies (1 Peter 3:15 R. V.; Eph. 6:10-18).

1. Chs. 1-5. God, who cannot lie, will surely establish Christ, as David's Son, on His throne in Jerusalem, in spite of all the confusion and disaster caused by the rule of the Antichrist, whose advent is drawing nigh (Luke 1:31-33; Titus 1:2; Acts 2:29-31; Ps. 89:2-4).

In spite of all the self-will in our hearts, Christ will yet win by His love the absolute control as our Lord (Phil. 3:20, 21; 1 John 4:19; Rom. 12:1, 2; 1 Cor. 15:58).

2. Chs. 6-7. The placing of God's throne, the Ark, in David's capital, brought to him the blessing of the knowledge of God's gracious will.

When we honor the Lord by giving Him possession and control of our hearts, by His Spirit, He will fill us with the knowledge of His will, and guide us into all the truth (John 7:17; Col. 1:9; John 16: 13-15; Rom. 8:14).

3. Chs. 8-10. God will put down all of His and Israel's enemies and will show "the kindness of God" unto the believing remnant of Israel (Isa. 43:14-21; 54:1-10; 60:12; Zech. 14:1-3, 12-15; Rev. 19:11-21; Jer. 31:31-34).

When we learn to know our Lord as the One through whom we are more than conquerors, then we enjoy the kindness of God by sitting at the King's table as His sons (Rom. 8:37, 17, 28, 32).

4. Chs. 11-21. Great as is the grace of God, which forgives our sins for Christ's sake, the moment we confess, the fact is unchanged that "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap", debts must be paid, broken laws, physical and spiritual, have a penalty (1 John 1:9; Gal. 6:7, 8; 1 Cor. 3:17 R. V.; 1 John 5:16; 1 Peter 2:11).

5. Ch. 22. We, as well as the remnant of Israel, will sing the praise of our Rock and Deliverer, because all victory over the enemy is of Him by His Word and Spirit (Ps. 119:11; Eph. 6:10-18; Isa. 12; Ps. 72:12; 34:6; 32:10, 11; Heb. 2:14-18).

6. Ch. 23. When Christ, the Son of David, the Son of God, rules over Israel, He will make them princes and kings, greater than David's mighty men (Isa. 32:1; 61:3-6).

But God has made us, in Christ, kings and priests, who may now enjoy His strength to do mighty deeds of valor, even to love our enemies and pray for those who despitefully use us. What a mighty victory that gives us over Satan! (Matt. 5:44; 2 Cor. 12:9, 10; Rom. 5:3).

7. Ch. 24. When all our ambitions and pride have been judged and forgiven we will rejoice in the Lord as our Shepherd and will dwell in His house forever (Ps. 23).

Queen Mary as a Wife

An Appreciation: By Dyson Hague, Toronto, Canada.

When our King, then Duke of York, chose for his bride his sweetheart Princess Mary, there was great delight in England, and the leading newspapers in England voiced the feeling of a myriad hearts when they said it was a most happy arrangement and would have a far-reaching effect upon the future of the realm. She was an English Princess, not German, and England was well pleased, because England knew that the young Princess would make a splendid wife and mother, and, if it ever came to pass in the future, a splendid queen. They were married in the Chapel Royal on the sixth of July, 1893, and when the wedding bells rang and she took the hand of her husband and said, "I, Mary, take thee, George, to be my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish and to obey, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I give thee my troth", there can be no doubt that in the very depths of her soul she resolved to be his true helpmeet, and took as a sacred trust from God that sacred relationship of wife. How nobly she has kept those vows the whole world knows. Her latest biographer said: "No woman more completely immersed herself in the needs and the welfare of the man she had married than did Queen Mary, nor with greater dignity. There was no compromise in this immolation; no shifting of responsibilities with the shifting of power. First and always she was his wife, by his side in anxiety and despondency, consoling him greatly, ambitious for him, with mind, heart and soul; ready for his service at any moment. She shirked nothing. As in public, so in private, she was proud to be always in the shadow of the man she had chosen to serve." When one thinks of it, what a magnificent summary that is of what a true wife should be, and can be. A woman; a wife; whose heart prayer is, "Oh, that I may do him good and not evil all the days of my life". A woman who gives her love, her womanly tact, her brains, her whole life with its manifold endowments to just being everything to her husband that is noble and pure and wise and good. A wife who is his better half; not the inferior, but the equal; not necessarily the stronger or the wiser or the truer or the abler or the firmer, but just the better; one who by the indescribable power of her cheerful spirit, her swift and sympathetic insight, her sunny cheerfulness, is Heaven's best gift to man. Perhaps the finest thing said in the Bible about a wife is Proverbs 31:11: "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her." And if ever there was a woman and a wife who seems to have been possessed of that noble quality of truthfulness and reliability, it was our gracious Queen Mary. She has been the stay and confidence of her husband from their wedding day. She trusted him with fullest confidence, and he, with fullest confidence, trusted her. Her ambition has been to please him more than any other person in the world. And the nobility and beauty of her Christian character has indeed made her to him God's angel; guarding him, guiding him, and sheltering him "in that fierce light which beats upon a throne". And so from the day she was married she made that little kingdom over which she ruled, "Home, sweet home", a really English home, where their lives with lofty ideals of life and duty began in the fear of God and prayer, and where there shone upon the face of a queenly woman the light of duties beautifully done. What an example she has been and is to the girls and fiancees and wives of this land! Oh, that our young women and wives would look upon marriage as the most sacred of all trusts, human and divine. Oh, that they would realize that its happiness and hope, its power and far-reaching influence depend upon its sacrificial unselfishness, its unreserved devotion, and the power which comes from on high. Oh, that they would pray, as they clasp each other's hands with high resolve upon their wedding day, that they may be to husband and home a daily inspiration, a strength in the hour of trial, a steadying force in the day of anxiety, and in the dark day a light as the sunshine, indispensable to his happiness. Oh, that they would, in their love of the Lord Jesus, the Bridegroom of the soul (John 3:29), so inspire and beautify their husband's life that they would say as Michael Angelo of his beloved wife:

"For oh! how good, how beautiful must be
The God that made so good a thing as thee."

A Pastor's Christmas and New Year's Message

My Dear Friends:

A Blessed Christmas is this Season's wish of your pastor for you: because it includes all that is best in "Merry Christmas", and all that is holy in our Church's greeting at this Bright Season. May yours in Church and home be a full realization of all that a loving Father can bestow on you in association with His own best Gift of His Son. Accept this Gift once more this day on your knees, penitently.

Seek Him in His House today. Then know your share He intends you shall have of "great joy to all people".

The New Year will bring gifts to you. Secrecy was in fashion before Christmas. Questions went unasked—they would not be answered. At last the Day came, and mysterious bundles were opened, curiosity satisfied. Love wrapped them up the children knew, and tried to be patient. A well wrapped New Year is before you. You ask no questions—they would not be answered. Suppose you knew 1929 as well as you know 1928? Suppose? Now, believe Love wrapped up its gifts, and will unfold them one by one. From a Heavenly Father you will receive each morning His gift, a Day, filled with His Blessings, to be filled by you with grateful service. What will you do with His daily gift? Will you grasp each for self: or carelessly neglect what seems so small? Will you cheerfully use each one He gives for Him, doing its duties no less gladly than you welcome its mercies? Your daily life is answering this question. God offers grace to live it. You are living it either for self or for God.

"For Christ's Sake." So we pray. Christ intercedes (1 Tim. 2:5), and human desires reach the Throne of God. "For Christ's sake." So we come with wounded consciences we cannot heal: but the Physician can and does. "For Christ's sake" do we serve? Consciously? We should. We are not worthy to serve in ourselves. "Who am I, O Lord God?" (2 Sam. 7:18) cried David, hearing of honors from God to be his. "For Christ's sake" we should live daily. His Eye is ever on us: His Presence closely with us. Worship Him, believing He will draw nigh to us as we to Him. Obey and serve under the consciousness of His near oversight. Trifling excuses will halt and die on our lips. Empty pews will not be found in St. Stephen's. Purses will easily open. There will be neither thoughtless days nor prayerless nights. Why? Our life is lived "for Jesus' sake", in the lights of His Eye, and warmth of His Love.

A Life worth while is one lived under the Divine approval. Its standard is not of the community, but of Holy Scripture. Submission to the Lord's will takes out of it the cross of self-will. Daily obedience brings the happiness of a dutiful child in the Father's home here. Faithful use of God-given opportunities in life's pathway, brings the success of a useful life for God and neighbor. May all this be true in St. Mark's parish is the New Year's wish of

Your friend and pastor,
Kensey Johns Hammond.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions. No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

APPRECIATED.

Mr. Editor:

. . . . I have very much appreciated your opposition to the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church. May you be much blessed and used in your efforts.

THE AFTERMATH.

Mr. Editor:

The General Convention of 1928 has passed into history. As a body the Convention played safe. What with teas, excursions, golf, the delegates had a wonderful time in a social way. It soon became evident that the resolution to eliminate the Thirty-nine Articles was loaded with dynamite—so the Bishops—a prudent folk—quietly put it away where it will continue to sleep undisturbed. The outstanding event that carried with it a sense of spiritual power was the Corporate Communion of the women and the presentation of their offerings—here was Christianity in action. To be sure, there were mutterings of discontent at the centralizing policy of the National Council, and this feeling is not confined to the women.

Another event in the proceedings of the Convention has the promise of far-reaching possibilities for good or of deep disappointment. Is the gracious approach of the Episcopal Church towards two of the larger sister communions a gesture or a purpose? The Protestant Churches may be a little chary about receiving overtures a second time that mean nothing but a few pleasant words; and they certainly will not feel in a yielding mood if they are told that their ministrations are "invalid" and their religion "decadent". Because now comes the Anglo-Catholic Congress with ceremonies and teachings that again emphasizes what Bishop Randolph used to say, viz.: that in the Episcopal Church there are not so much two schools of thought, but two religions. A monk of a certain religious order has discovered that the doctrine of the seven sacraments is taught in the Thirty-nine Articles. A "Mass of the Holy Ghost" is celebrated in a certain church in New York with alien ceremonial. The Protestant communions may well ask: We are invited to a reunion with whom and with what? Is it with a somewhat awkward imitation of Romanism, when the real thing is close at hand? Or, is it with a Church that is loyal to the Reformation, which is our common heritage and our common glory?

A prominent English Bishop has said in effect that the Anglo-Catholics should try to get rid of the Thirty-nine Articles and to extend the practice of reservation. Protestant England repudiated this program; and the Hon. Mr. Wickersham has said that the Washington Convention was essentially Protestant. And herein lies the hope for the future of our communion. Now, in this Church, Reservation, Benediction, the use of the "Blessed is he that cometh" in the communion service, also certain unauthorized ceremonies, are illegal. Let us see whether the Anglo-Catholics will obey the law.

Book Reviews

THE COMFORT OF THE CATHOLIC FAITH: By the Rev. Frank M. Clendenin, D. D. Longmans, Green & Co., New York, London, Toronto.

An innoculation of a mild soothing syrup of the "Comfortable Gospel of Christ" variety that is calculated to spoil the patient for the real thing. Our day requires a Spirit-filled faith like that which pulsed through the veins of the early Christians. The book would be better were it less comfortable and more Catholic. F. C.

TALKING WITH GOD: By Harvey Farmer. Bible Institute Colportage Association, 843 North Wells Street, Chicago, Ill.

A book filled with useful and suggestive comments drawn from the life of Enoch. A word of friendly suggestion—the reviewer believes that our meditative writings would be more widely acceptable if the authors remembered that they are writing for the Twentieth Century. For example "fain" and "well-nigh" fail to impress with the sense of vigor and reality that ought always accompany true spirituality. F. C. . .

THE AMBASSADOR, YALE LECTURES ON PREACHING FOR 1928: By the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., LL. D. Cloth. Pages 211. The Macmillan Company, New York City.

Himself a preacher by instinct and training, Bishop Freeman brings to his task the enthusiasm of his burning soul. We can well imagine the joy with which he poured out his heart to his audience of already made, and to-be, preachers. Glowingly, through his chapters on the Credentials, Fitness, Assignment, Equipment, Loyalties, Technique, Perils and Opportunities of the minister of Christ, he leads us until we rise erect with the consciousness of the greatness, the dignity, the sacredness of the Christian ministry.

The thought lying deep in the mind of the Bishop is that we have no apology for our calling. We are ambassadors. Behind us is the royal behest; within us is the royal impulse; in our message the dynamics of the risen Lord wait for expression. The odium attached to the ministry, greatly exaggerated by heartless critics, may be said to result from a failure of the man of God to recognize his divinely appointed office. Spurgeon once admitted that his most effective work had been to persuade about three hundred young men not to enter the ministry. He claimed that if they had the call of God, he could not hold them back; if he did succeed, they were not of the stuff of which ministers should be made.

Those of us who know Bishop Freeman's earlier years, are well persuaded that he then became enamored of a passion for souls which no power on earth could cool. For it was of God that he gave up his earthly prospects, little dreaming at the hour what God had for him in subsequent times. And it is this fact, coupled with an intense desire to make himself as efficient as is within his power, that swept him along, while other men, who lacked his vision, diligence and inspiration, lagged behind. It is into these avenues of soul and heart that the Bishop would lead his hearers and readers. Nothing is worthwhile that does not take out of us something that will enable God to put something better in. When Dean Alford pleasingly called to a body of divinity students, "Young men, preach only what you have suffered", he touched the core of the question of the call to service. All this Bishop Freeman has known and would instil into the minds of his auditors.

One finds difficulty in determining the most striking chapter of this timely book for preachers. Each has its significant message and winsome appeal. Father Taylor, well known as a lover of men, who was wont to preach along the shores of Boston City, once accosted a young fellow with a likely face, asking if he went to church. The response was, "I cannot go much, for I am a sailor. But I do like to hear a good sermon". "And what," asked Father Taylor, "do you think is a good sermon?" The prompt reply was, "When the minister takes something warm out of his own heart and puts it into mine". This, Bishop Freeman has done. K. M.

Urgent Need for Housekeeper.

A night letter from Dr. Grafton Burke informs the Department of Missions that Mrs. Norwood, the housekeeper of the Hudson Stuck Memorial Hospital, Fort Yukon, has broken down and must be relieved immediately. He asks that a successor be started on her way to Fort Yukon with the understanding that from Fairbanks she would have a three-hundred mile airplane journey to Fort Yukon.

The hospital is full, the nurses are working night and day—the need is urgent.

The Rev. A. R. Parson, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, will take pleasure in giving additional information.

Indians' Church Burned.

A message to the Department of Missions announces the burning of St. Elizabeth's Church at Wakpala on the Standing Rock Reservation, South Dakota. No details have as yet been received, as the place is a rather isolated one, but the loss is probably total.

St. Elizabeth's is one of the largest of the Indian congregations, with one hundred and seventy-seven communicants, and has always taken great pride in giving the full missionary quota and more. It is the church in which the Rev. Philip Deloria ministered for many years. The church was built under the direction of Bishop Hare, and was one of the places that he held most warmly in his heart.

Bishop Burleson is now on his way to Honolulu, at the request of the Presiding Bishop, to confer with the Council of Advice with regard to matters needing the guidance and assistance of a bishop.

The high cost of building affects South Dakota as every other part of the country, and the new church will probably cost $10,000. It seems certain that Bishop Burleson's friends will desire to have that amount waiting for him when he returns from Honolulu early in February.

The Department of Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, will be glad to give additional particulars as received.

A Red Letter Day for the Brotherhood.

December 31, 1928, was a red-letter day in the history of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, for on this day the national organization completed the task of wiping out the old debt incurred following the demobilization of its large war work program ten years ago, and at the same time developing an adequate basis of financial support by members and friends of the Brotherhood to take the place of the annual appropriation of $40,000 until recently given to the Brotherhood by the National Council of the Church.

The fiscal year of the Brotherhood closed on December 31, with the old debt completely wiped out, all current expenses paid, and no obligations outstanding. Although carrying a much larger program of Chapter extension and evangelism than heretofore, the operating expenses of the Brotherhood during the past year have been substantially reduced and the income increased.

The credit for this achievement, according to Leon C. Palmer, the General Secretary, the Brotherhood, is due to the vigorous efforts of Council members, especially the former General Secretary, G. Frank Shelby, who labored strenuously to this end, and to the recently appointed Finance Committee headed by Walter Kidde, of Newark, N. J. The leaders of the Brotherhood express deep gratitude to those whose generous contributions made this achievement possible. From now on all contributions to the Brotherhood will go to current expenses and advanced work.

During 1928 there was a net increase of twenty-one per cent in the membership of the Brotherhood, a substantial increase in the number of boys reached in its leadership training camps, and a very marked growth in its educational and evangelistic program.

Russian Vesper Service at Cathedral.

A most unusual service was held in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York the evening of the Sunday after Christmas. It was Vespers in Slavonic, according to the rites of the Russian Orthodox Church. The choir was the world famous Kedroff Quartette. The purpose of this service was to call attention to the needs of the Russian Theological Seminary in Paris, the only Russian Seminary at the present time in the world. Because of illness, Bishop Manning could not come, nor could Metropolitan Platon, who was ordaining a Bishop in Detroit that day. The service had been planned for a later date, but suddenly, because of the engagements of the Kedroff Quartette, it had to be on the thirtieth. Although but three days' notice was given, all seats in the Cathedral were filled, including the choir stalls. Beside the Cathedral clergy there were present, vested, in the sanctuary the Rev. Drs. Emhardt, Burgess and Lau, of the Foreign Born Americans Division, and the Rev. Dr. H. Henry Spoer.

Archimandrite Benjamin, representing the Metropolitan, officiated, assisted by two priests and a deep-voiced deacon standing about the high altar. Because the Cathedral altar stands a few feet from the wall the officiants were able to encircle it according to the proper Orthodox ceremony.

The four famous Russian singers, the Kedroff Quartette, stood in the center just in front of the altar rails. They faced the altar throughout the service. Not only was their devotion manifested in their voices, but in their attitude as well. That four men in Tuxedos, standing back to the congregation in the center in front of the sanctuary, could look devotional seems incongruous, and yet many that saw them remarked on this. Such is the simplicity and reality of Russian piety.

Before the service one of our Cathedral clergy told of Bishop Manning's regrets at not being able to be present and his interest in the Russian Seminary in Paris, and one of the Russian clergy expressed Metropolitan Platon's regrets and blessings and gave a brief account of the meaning of the service. The service lasted about an hour. It consists largely in the singing of hymns and canticles and responses with an occasional prayer by the officiating priest, and litanies by the deacon. The four principal hymns, set to music by Russia's great composers, were Psalm 103, the Hymn which is translated in our Hymnal, "O Brightness of the Immortal Father's Face!" the Nunc Dimittis, and the Lord's Prayer, the last to a setting composed by the Kedroff's. It is impossible to express in words the perfection of the singing and its devotion.

The offering was taken by the ten ushers who themselves are Russian exiles, including several of the nobility. The chief usher was Mr. Alexis R. Wiren, Director of the Russian Student Fund in America and son of the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian Navy during the war who was murdered by the Bolsheviks.

Since the war the Soviets have abolished all Russian Theological Schools. Therefore, the exiles under Metropolitan Evlogie, head of the Russian Church, outside of Russia, in Europe, established in poor quarters, No. 93 Rue de Crimes, Paris, St. Sergius Theological Institute. Its students come from all classes of Russian society, young men who have gone through almost unbelievable experiences and as a consequence have devoted themselves to the service of the sacred ministry. The life of these theological students is full of privation. The expenditures per person amount to only about $20 a month. Many students have to take turns at one text book. During the summer recess they find employment as servants and laborers. This Seminary is the future hope of Russia.

This Russian Vesper Service was sponsored by the following: Mrs. Frederic Cunningham (sister of Bishop Lawrence), R. Fulton Cutting, Mrs. Tatiana Dechtereva, William Chauncey Emhardt, Mrs. Joseph I. France, Prince and Princess Serge Gagarine, Prince and Princess Serge Obolensky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Mr. and Mrs. William Jay Schieffelin, Albert Shaw, Alexis R. Wiren, and Mrs. George Zabriskie.

Contributions for the Russian Theological Institute in Paris may be sent to Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, who will forward the amounts to the American Committee.

Retirement Benefits.

Retirement benefits similar to those the Church Pension Fund has established for Episcopal Church clergy have been provided through contract with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, for lay employees of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Announcement of the pension plan has been made by Lewis B. Franklin, Vice-President and Treasurer.

All lay employees completing at least one year's service with the Missionary Society, on or after January 1, 1929, the effective date of the pension plan, will receive substantial pensions, based on both past and future service, payable at the normal retirement ages of sixty-three for women and sixty-eight for men. The benefit for past service will amount to one and one-half per cent of the employees' 1928 salary, multiplied by the number of years prior to January 1, 1929, while the total pension based on service after that date will represent one and one-half per cent of current salary for each year of completed service.

Prior to the normal retirement ages, however, retirement may be arranged for an earlier date by mutual agreement.

The entire cost of the retirement plan is being defrayed by the Missionary Society.

Soochow Academy.

Soochow Academy is open and running smoothly. For the present the number of students is limited to one hundred. Mr. McNulty writes that he feels almost lost with so small a school when he has been accustomed to having three hundred and fifty boys to look after. So far as the spirit of the school is concerned, he says:

"It has never been better, either on the part of the faculty or of the students. We can but try to have a model small school, and plan for the future. No school in Soochow, nor in this part of China outside Shanghai, so far as I have heard, is quite like it. The other missions in Soochow are watching us with, it seems to me, a good deal of sympathy as being the only school that has taken the stand definitely for religion and education as going hand in hand in these parlous days of goodness knows what. Five of the boys who in September entered as non-Christian have asked to be prepared for baptism."

"We are happy, and tremendously interested in working out the problem before us. If we do not 'make good', at any rate believe in us enough to know that we shall try our best."

Association of Agricultural Missions.

This is on the whole an agricultural world, and for that reason foreign mission boards have found it worth while to maintain an Association of Agricultural Missions. The Association held its ninth annual dinner and conference on December 6 and 7 in New York City. The general theme was "The salvation of the billion rural people in the world—Are the mission boards doing their duty"? The dinner brought together many interesting personalities, introduced by Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones, of the Phelps-Stokes Foundation. Among them were Dr. Warren H. Wilson, President of the Association; Dr. Kenyon L. Butterfield, who reported the emphasis on rural work which he noted at the Jerusalem Conference; the Rev. Hilda Ives, a Congregational minister from Maine, who talked not about agricultural work, but about the scheme of "larger parishes", making a fervid plea for an interdenominational community church, serving several towns or villages with a diversified staff, which her experience has found good in Maine; Professor O. S. Morgan, of Columbia, who reported experiments in using American agricultural methods in the Near East; the Rev. Brayton C. Case, a Baptist missionary, superintendent of an agricultural school in Burma; Dean J. H. Reisner from Nanking; Mr. William Heath, of the Sam Higginbottom Association in India; Mr. and Mrs. W. Pliney Keys, of Portuguese East Africa; Dr. John Henry House, probably the patriarch of all such missionaries, as he has spent more than fifty-six years in the Near East. The Church Missions House was represented by Dr. Davis, Mr. Parson, Mr. Foreman, Mr. Leidt and others.

A list of one hundred and eleven agricultural missionaries serving under nineteen foreign mission boards, includes, under the Episcopal Church, the Rev. Messrs. H. A. Donovan and W. J. Reed, of Liberia; Morton Chu, of Shanghai; Mr. Riley, of the Willard Straight Agricultural School, Jolo, P. I., and Mr. Arthur V. Wiggins, of Liberia.

Italian Conference.

A notable conference held in New York City, December 13 and 14, was called at the request of the Italian clergy by the Foreign-Born Americans Division. Eleven out of fifteen of our active Italian priests were present. After Evensong at the General Theological Seminary, they dined at the hotel where they were quartered and spent the evening informally together. The next morning there was Holy Communion at the Seminary and then breakfast in the refectory. Bishop Lloyd presided at the formal morning session of the Seminary, and Dr. Burgess in the afternoon at the Church Missions House. The whole conference did much to weld together and encourage the Italian clergy.

Most of the time was taken with the exchange of experiences on matters vital to pastoral care, including the Nation-Wide Campaign and evangelism. Bishop Lloyd and the officers of the Division were deeply impressed with the devotion and wisdom of these priests and with the heroic work they are doing. There was also a discussion—in which the few non-Italian priests present were allowed to take part—of the opportunities for reaching Italians in our ordinary parishes and how the Italian-speaking priest could help in this.

St. Stephen's College Receives Gift.

St. Stephen's College, Columbia University, located at Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y., announced recently a gift of $100,000 for general endowment from Mr. Edward F. Albee, President of Keith-Albee-Orpheum. Mr. Albee has in former years built a dormitory for this college, costing $135,000, and two family houses at a cost of $25,000.

This gift is the first unit of twenty-five gifts of $100,000 each, which St. Stephen's College is seeking during the winter, to enable it adequately to develop as a college of the university. On July 1 last this old college, in operation since 1860, became a member of the university with equal status to that of Columbia College and Barnard College.

The committee in charge of raising the $2,500,000 needed, most of which is for faculty salary improvement, consists of Dr. Henry Darlington, Mr. Oliver B. James, Mr. Joseph P. Day, Mr. Haley Fiske and Mr. Albee, with Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler and Warden I. Bell as ex-officio members. There will be no professional campaign organization employed and every dollar given will go wholly to the college.

ENGLAND.

Dr. Lang in the House of Lords.

The late Primate, Archbishop Davidson, watched his successor take the Primate's seat in the House of Lords. Dr. Lang, with his sponsors, the Bishops of London and Southwark, wore the lawn and black of episcopal dress. When he presented his Writ of Summons the new Primate did not bend his knee to Lord Chancellor as the temporal peer must when bidden to sit in the Upper Chamber. The reason was, of course, that the Church comes before the Woolsack, and the Archbishop of Canterbury is above even the Keeper of the King's Conscience.—Church of England Newspaper.

Dr. Temple Elected.

Dr. Temple, Bishop of Manchester, has been elected Archbishop of York to succeed Dr. Lang. The confirmation of his election took place at 2:30 P. M. on January 2 in his old church, St. James', Piccadilly. The enthronement service is to be January 10.

On December 15 at a special celebration of the Holy Communion, to which all the clergy of the Diocese of Manchester were invited, the bishop bade farewell to his fellow workers.

Dr. Temple referred to the common call of each to fulfil the purpose of God in various spheres and in various ways. True unity cannot be found by trying to agree, but only in the readiness to go to school with Christ, and by the exercise of a discipleship in which all our time and energy and gifts are surrendered to Christ. Faithfulness does not mean that we shall necessarily see the first-fruits of our labors, but it does mean that God will do His work if we will do ours. Parties are not to be feared, for, indeed, they are necessary, but partisanship in which the unity with those who share our views is valued more highly than the deeper unity underlying all service in their ministry, is a thing to be dreaded. Such was the farewell message of the bishop, whose greatest achievement, perhaps, has been the promotion of peace and goodwill. The measure of his success has been due to a readiness to appreciate the sincerity of all those with whom he has worked, and to the boldness with which he has spoken at all meetings of the positive contribution that has been made to the life of the Church by the various parties within it.

Significant Additions to St. Mark's Church, Mount Kisco.

St. Mark's Church, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., has just entered upon a new era of development with the beginning of its extensive building development.

This church, which is one of the most beautiful in the East, was designed by Bertram Grosvenor Goodhue, the architect of St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas' Churches, New York, who regarded it as one of his masterpieces. His spirit has been carried on by his associates in the new drawings which are now about to take concrete shape.

The plans call for an extension of the south aisle of the church, to correspond with the existing aisle on the north side, which will add about one hundred and twenty seats to the present capacity of the building. With the growth of this section of Westchester County this added accommodation is becoming essential. At the head of this aisle a Children's Corner, with its own altar and font, will join the existing structure at the south of the pulpit.

On the north side of the church a parish house is designed to join the existing wing of the building. It will contain space for the Guild and workers, class rooms, guild rooms, a choir room, a moving picture projector room, kitchens, pantries, and a large auditorium, with an unusually big stage. Beneath the auditorium are dressing rooms, locker rooms for boys and girls, and a full size play room and basket ball court. This play room is reached from a separate entrance at the extreme north of the building, so as to be isolated from the activities that may be going on in other departments.

The work is being done by the firm of Thomas O'Reilly and Son, who have just completed the new Church of the Heavenly Rest in New York City, and it is anticipated that it will be completed by the summer of 1929. The total cost will be in excess of $200,000. This sum was raised by an intensive campaign, participated in by the entire congregation, which was held during two weeks, last June. No outside help was employed in procuring this money, and the success of the campaign was due to local committees under the leadership of the staff of the church. The clerical staff consists of the Rev. Canon H. Adye Prichard, D. D., rector; the Rev. S. Raymond Brinckerhoff, B. D., assistant, and the Rev. Harold B. Thelin, of the General Theological Seminary.

When these improvements have been finished, St. Mark's Church bids fair to be one of the most complete and beautiful in any country parish.

Worship in New Church.

The congregation of St. Stephen's and Incarnation Parishes, worshipping for the first time in the new church, recently erected at Sixteenth and Newton Streets, on the Sunday before Christmas, were happy to have a permanent church home after occupying temporary quarters for so long a time. The church was dedicated on Christmas Day, when Bishop Freeman preached the sermon. At this time, a window of unusual interest was also dedicated. It was given to the church by the workmen who were engaged in the construction of the new building, and the donors in a body attended the dedication service, on Christmas Day. The window is stained glass, and depicts the activities of the building trades. The upper panel shows a bricklayer and a man carrying bricks up a ladder. The center panel shows Jesus Christ, learning the trade of carpentry. The lower panel depicts a smith at work at the iron trade.

The building is of brick and the design is early English Gothic, with the walls laid in what is known as the old English garden bond. The new church will seat about 1,200 people and is almost entirely new in its furnishings, with the exception of the pews and choir stalls. These have been rebuilt and finished to correspond with the color scheme of the church. A new Gilgen organ will be installed in the new building also.

At the Cathedral.

The Rt. Rev. Norman S. Binsted, Missionary Bishop of Tohoku, Japan, who was recently consecrated in St. Alban's Church, was the preacher at Washington Cathedral on the Sunday before Christmas at 11 A. M. The preacher at the eleven o'clock service on Christmas Day in Washington Cathedral was the Very Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl.

Star.

A large electrically illuminated star, five feet from point to point, has been shrining forth from the apse of Washington Cathedral during the Christmas season, and may be seen at night from almost any point in Washington. This star was erected by the workmen engaged in the construction of the Cathedral, as an expression of their appreciation of the religious importance of the Cathedral undertaking.

Headquarters.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington has permanent office headquarters at Diocesan House as a result of the action of Bishop Freeman and the Rev. D. Wellington Curran, who gave a room on the third floor of Diocesan House for this purpose.

British Tribute to Cathedral.

At a dinner of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, given in November at the Willard Hotel in honor of the Chronicle Group of Newspapers, London, England, Sir George Armstrong, Editorial Adviser of the British journalists, gave the striking and unusual tribute to the Washington Cathedral undertaking:

"I, in company with my colleagues, yesterday had the privilege of visiting your Cathedral and we had the inestimable privilege of being conducted over that Cathedral by your Bishop. I think I am right in saying for us all that it was the most impressive spectacle that we have witnessed in our tour, and the thought that arose in some of our minds was that this wonderful Cathedral, standing on its massive foundations built in a way which could face thousands of years to come, might one day be the Valhalla of the English-speaking races. The day may come when Westminster Abbey, by reason of its age, may gradually crumble in the dust, and when that day comes, perhaps, who knows, this great Cathedral, which is slowly rising from its foundations, may stand as the center of civilization of the English-speaking world. That, at any rate, is a thought which you will allow is devoid of any national prejudice, but it is a thought which must inevitably arise in the mind of any man, who will not permit himself to be swayed by mere national feelings, but who is able to judge the world and humanity from that large standpoint and from that wide point of view which is necessary amongst us all, if we are to bring to humanity happiness and contentment in the future years."

Noon-day Preaching.

The technique of noon-day preaching was studied during the week by clergymen from ten states assembled at Washington Cathedral for one of the many conferences sponsored by the College of Preachers, the unique educational institution associated with the Mount Saint Alban edifice.

The Rt. Rev. Granville Gaylord Bennett, Bishop of Duluth, directed the studies. He was assisted by the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, Bishop of Washington. The sessions took place in the memorial wing of the Cathedral Library with devotional exercises held in the Bethlehem Chapel and the Chapel of the Resurrection.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. L. Brent, D. D., Bishop.
Rt Rev. D. L. Ferris, D. D., Coadjutor.

Dr. Brown Formally Greeted By Church.

"I came to Buffalo to spend the best years of my life in what I consider a great adventure."

These words were the introduction to Dr. Wyatt Brown's response to nearly a score of loyalty pledging promises made during a dinner planned as a formal welcome to Dr. Brown as the new rector and the Rev. Francis F. Lynch, as the new curate, of St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo.

Ten church organizations united in pledging Dr. Brown and Mr. Lynch "unswerving loyalty and devotion" in making the "new chapter in St. Paul's history the greatest in its history", in the words of Dr. Charles A. Jessup, rector emeritus. Charles B. Curtiss, president of the Cathedral club, presided.

Dr. Brown told of the reasons that had prompted him to give up a larger pastorate in Baltimore, Md., to become rector of St. Paul's and outlined his policy in his new charge.

"When I came here during Lent the last two years and saw the location of St. Paul's Cathedral, in the heart of the downtown section, I felt that if a man prayed earnestly enough, he would be bound to gather some who needed Jesus Christ," Dr. Brown declared.

"There are men around town who are not interested in God. Some of them we can't get, because they are never alone with God. We must get those who are alone. It is when a man is never alone that he loses God. Then he becomes interested in manifold things, and forgets that he has a soul."

Mr. Lynch paid a tribute to Dr. Brown, with whom he said he had been associated for eight years, saying that Dr. Brown possessed four necessary qualifications of a good rector. These qualifications were said to be Dr. Brown's capabilities as a priest, pastor and prophet and the magnetism of his personality.

Quoting Julius Rosenwald as having said that movies, motors and magazines had changed the world, Mr. Lynch declared that with a message and a method, St. Paul's would add another great chapter to its history.

Dr. Jessup said that he had discovered two additional reasons why he had resigned, which he had not known when he handed in his resignation. One of these reasons was Dr. Brown. Dr. Jessup said, and the other was Mr. Lynch.

The new leaders of St. Paul's were welcomed by Dr. Jessup for the parish as a whole, by Charles R. Wilson for the vestry, by Oliver H. P. Champlin for the guild of ushers, by Dr. G. G. Pritchard for the Young People's Bible Class, by Harry A. Faulkner for the Cathedral Club, by John E. Miller for the Church School, by George Gosling for the choir, by Wilford J. Miller for the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and by William H. Chapin for The Chimes, the parish publication.

Three former curates of St. Paul's were present to represent other parishes in the city. They were the Rev. Chas. D. Broughton, of the Church of the Ascension; the Rev. David L. Leach, of St. Mark's, and the Rev. John Borton, of Grace Church. A letter of regret was received from the Rev. James C. Crosson, rector of St. Mary's-on-the-Hill.

Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. E. T. Demby, D. D., Suffragan.

Christ Church, Little Rock.

Actual construction on the new parish house for Christ Church, Little Rock, the Rev. W. P. Witsell, D. D., rector, has commenced and the building has been promised to be completed by the contractor by the third of May. One very pleasing feature in connection with the preparation for the construction was the sale of the parish bonds at a premium. The pledges of funds to bear the expenses of the building run through a period of three years. It was, therefore, necessary to issue bonds to secure cash to pay all bills immediately. Five of the strongest financial institutions of the city made earnest bids.

Another act of progress has been registered in Christ Church in the appointment of Mrs. F. L. Eaton as Educational Secretary in charge of the Church School and all young people's activities. Mrs. Eaton is an unusually capable woman and possesses great enthusiasm for this part of the Church's work and has already justified her appointment.

The Rev. Harold E. Holt, assistant secretary of the Social Service Department of the National Council, held a social conference in Little Rock throughout the week of November 4 to 11. The conference is felt to be a real contribution to the social service ideals and work of the community.

The Rev. Warren W. Way, rector of St. Mary's School for Girls, Raleigh, N. C., preached in Christ Church, Little Rock, on Sunday, December 2.

The Advent Corporate Communion of the Men and Boys' of Christ Church was held the First Sunday in Advent at the early service with special music by a choir of men and boys and with excellent attendance.

All organizations in the parish are full of activity and it is generally felt that the parish is now closing one of the most eventful and fruitful years in its long and honorable history.

The Annual Convention of the Diocese of Arkansas will convene in St. John's Church, Helena, on Wednesday, January 16. The time of meeting was changed by the last Convention from May to January.

Bishop Coadjutor William Mercer Green, of the Diocese of Mississippi, is expected to attend the Convention; and he will speak on the subject of Rural Work. Bishop Green has accomplished wonderful things in Mississippi in the Rural Field.

In Camden, Arkansas, on the last Sunday evening of the old year, a union service was arranged, and held in the Methodist Church in the interest of higher education. The program was carried out by the visiting college students, under the direction of the Ministers' Association. The rector of St. John's Church, being Chairman of the Association, was in charge.

The subjects upon which the students spoke were as follows: "Why I want to go to college." "What I expect to get out of college." "How college has broadened my spiritual horizon." "How I expect to make my life count when I complete my college work." And then a judge of the city spoke from "What I missed by not going to college".

Another annual event came off in St. John's Church on the first Wednesday evening of the New Year. It was a Union New Year Service. This was originated by the Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, the rector of St. John's Church.

It was a special service. Therefore all the ministers had part in the service of worship. The sermon was preached by the Baptist minister, the lesson read by the Methodist minister, and the Psalm by the minister of those who call themselves the First Christian Church. There was a prayer by the Presbyterian minister. The service was held in St. John's Church.

The church is usually crowded at these services, and it is pervaded by the spirit of Christian fellowship.

On Christmas Eve St. John's Church School had a Christmas tree. The pupils brought gifts for the very poor of the city to be distributed by the paid agent of the Board of Charities of Camden. The number of such gifts were an average of about four per pupil.

The Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, of Camden, arranged a Christmas Service for St. Mary's, El Dorado, on the Sunday evening before Christmas, as this was their only opportunity for having a Christmas Service. They have been without a minister since September.

Two beautiful brass vases were presented to St. John's, Camden, as a memorial to Leon Howell, who entered Paradise in March, 1924, by Mrs. Leon Howell and her sister, Mrs. Rogers.

SPRINGFIELD.

Rt. Rev. John C. White, Bishop.

The Gateway Field.

The Rev. T. G. C. McCalla, by appointment of the Bishop, assumed charge of the Missions in what is described as The Gateway Field in the southern end of the diocese, January 1, with residence in Centralia. In addition to the care of St. John's Church in this city, there is also embraced in this field the work at Carlyle, Salem, Nashville and Mt. Vernon. This field has been vacant since August, at which time the former clergyman, the Rev. Robert Y. Barber, left to take up work in the Diocese of Quincy.

A Number of Interesting Developments.

As the year 1928 came to a close there were a number of interesting developments, which were a result of the diocese's work during the past year, among which could be noted the following:

By recent appointment of the Bishop, Mrs. Theo. F. Gerould, of Centralia, is the Director of Religious Education for the diocese. Mrs. Gerould has given some time to the study of Church School and Young People's Work generally, and is proving herself to be an able successor in this work to Miss Nellie Smith, who served so acceptably during her residence in the diocese.

The diocese is also enjoying the help and leadership of another full-time worker in the appointment by the Bishop of Miss E. M. Whitley, of Springfield, as the Bishop's Representative for Women's Work in the diocese. Miss Whitley is incidentally the President of Springfield's Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary. Miss Whitley gives all her time to the development of women's work in the diocese, and is proving to be a great help in strengthening this growing part of the Church's Work.

Not only is the women's work of the diocese being strengthened as indicated above, but one will gather from the following that the men are also somewhat mindful of their obligations to the Church. Through the interest and help of the Church Club of the diocese a gift of at least $500 is nearly all in hand to present to the Bishop for the new church building for St. Gabriel's congregation at Woodriver. At the Synod in May the Church Club undertook to put a sum of money into the hands of the Bishop for this purpose. This has been the second definite financial help which the Church Club has rendered to the Bishop since its formation at the Synod meeting in 1925. Two years ago it furnished the Bishop with most of the money with which to purchase the land for the congregation of St. John's, Herrin.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

"The Sewanee Messenger" is one of the latest publications in the Church, and it is the organ of the "Woman's Auxiliary of the Provincial Conference of Church Workers Among Colored People of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Province of Sewanee". The editor is Mrs. Adelaide L. Brown, of Savannah, Ga., wife of the Ven. J. Henry Brown, Archdeacon for Colored Work in the Diocese of Georgia. The little paper is to be published bi-monthly and will record the activities of the colored members of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Fourth Province. Among the complimentary letters published in the current issue, which is the second number, is one from the Rev. W. B. Crittenden, secretary for colored work of the Field Department of the National Council.

Like many others engaged in publicity work, the editor makes a plea to those who are doing regular work to send in their news that others may benefit thereby. The missionary spirit and intent of the little publication are evident and interesting items are given on the recent General Convention in Washington. It is recorded in the last issue that twenty-two members of the Colored Auxiliary were present at the triennial and one delegate from Liberia among the group. Subscriptions to the paper may be made to Mrs. Adelaide L. Brown, 422 West Bolton Street, Savannah, Ga.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. W. R. Bowie Declines.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., has declined the call of the Diocese of Pennsylvania for the position of bishop-coadjutor. He gave as his reason the fact that he had not yet completed the work he hoped to accomplish at Grace Church, New York City.

"It was only five years ago," he wrote in a letter to Dr. Foley, chairman of the notification committee, "that I left another parish and another city with which almost all my ministry had been identified, and came here to Grace Church in New York to face what I knew were considerable difficulties and a very large opportunity. I know that in these five years I have not yet rightfully mastered the difficulties nor opened for this parish the doors of opportunity which wait here for the Kingdom of God."

Dr. Bowie was the third man to be elected to the office of Bishop Coadjutor of Pennsylvania, which was authorized by the last regular convention of the diocese and carries with it the right of succession to the bishopric. He is the third man to decline the honor. Both Dr. Henry Knox Sherrill of Boston, and the Rt. Rev. Edward M. Cross, missionary bishop of Spokane, Wash., previously had been elected and had declined the post.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

St. John's Hospital Dedicated.

The new St. John's Hospital, Brooklyn, probably the finest achievement of diocesan cooperation in the history of the Diocese of Long Island was opened for inspection on December 28 and 29, and was dedicated by Bishop Stires on the twenty-ninth. There were thousands of visitors during the two days, an invitation having been sent to every one of the fifteen thousand subscribers to the building fund campaign of October, 1927. The service of dedication was impressive, and a touch of pageantry was added by the procession, from the old hospital to the new, of the medical staff, about thirty in number, in academic gown, cap and hood. The service began in the beautiful new chapel (Walter Gibb Memorial) which was consecrated a year ago. Here Bishop Stires offered prayers of thanksgiving, and a Te Deum was sung by the choir of St. Mary's Church, Brooklyn. Then the procession, consisting of crucifer, marshalls, physicians in gown, lay officers of the corporation, and the clerical members of the corporation, vested, followed by the Bishop and his chaplain, moved into the central lobby of the new hospital. Here Justice Callaghan, chairman of the building committee, presented the keys of the new building to the Bishop as President of the Board; Mrs. Divine F Burtis, President of the Woman's Board, presented the furnishings and equipment; and Dr. Henry T. Hotchkiss, President of the professional staff, pledged a continuance of their loyal cooperation. Bishop Stires responded in a brief address, and offered prayers of dedication. After this the Bishop, accompanied by the clergy and representatives of the lay officers and of the medical staff, passed from floor to floor of the building, offering prayers in the various departments.

After the dedication, a dinner was served to one hundred and fifty guests in the nurses' new dining room in the hospital.

The hospital is exceptionally fine in its plan, its construction, and its equipment. With the children's beds and the basinnettes, the total capacity is two hundred and thirty-two. It is well endowed, and it is possible to charge moderate prices and to give free service when needed.

Dr. Bauman Lowe, organist and choirmaster of St. Bartholomew's Church, Brooklyn, died at his home in Elizabeth, N. J., on December 26, after an illness of but a few days. The choir, which he directed for the last eighteen years, was recognized as one of the best in the diocese.

The funeral was held at St. John's Church, Elizabeth, the Rev. Dr. Townley, rector of St. Bartholomew's officiating, assisted by Rev. Dr. Hubbard, rector

DISARMAMENT.

O Thou, whose birth we celebrate
With loving thought and generous deed,
Cast out from human hearts the greed
That changes charity to hate.

Keen is the strife in shop and mart:
Men haste to hoard up more and more,
And oft they steal the scanty store
Of those who have the poorer part.

The vision of the ancient seer
The pride of nations will not brook;
The ploughshare and the pruninghook
Are not yet wrought from sword and spear.

Still are the peoples of the earth
Too prone to learn the ways of war,
And they who fain would close the door
Of Janus' temple stir men's mirth.

Oh, may the follies of the past
Bring wisdom to the coming years,
That men may lay aside their fears
And own the Prince of Peace at last'

—Frederick W. Old.

An English Poet-Vicar.

It was on one of those lovely days which made early October memorable in 1926, that I saw Herrick's village and church for the first time. I walked to Dean Prior along typical Devonshire lanes, winding between high banks crowned by blackberry and hazel bushes, or fringed with ferns growing in the ditches and walls. There were no signposts, and I passed the turn to the village unknowingly—but this proved a gain, for it led me to a scene which Herrick himself would have watched with pleasure. Having been put right by a cottager, who was standing in a garden filled with Michaelmas daisies, I turned back, and as I passed the wood which sloped steeply above one side of the lane, a tall young gamekeeper strode by, uttering a musical, whistling call. Then from the meadows on the right, and on the woodland paths, resplendent cock pheasants and their more sober hens came flying, fluttering, running, for the corn which he scattered while he went swiftly through the wood—as though they had been so many barndoor fowls, instead of Herrick's "precious Pheasant".

Dean Prior lies on the southeastern slopes of Dartmoor, within a few miles of Totnes, of historical associations, and not far from Buckfast and its restored Abbey on the other side. It is a curiously scattered village—the main part of the small parish being nearly a mile from the church and vicarage. The high road from Exeter to Plymouth, which now skirts them, lay farther away when Herrick came in 1629 to take possession; and the vicarage has been altered and enlarged since he lived there and wrote his thanksgiving for

A little house, whose humble Roof
Is weather-proof; . . .
Low is my porch, as is my Fate,
Both void of state
And yet the threshold of my doore;
Is worn by th' poore
Who thither come and freely get Good words, or meat. . . .

But the village with its gardens, and its orchards glowing with yellow, carmine, and crimson apples, is little changed since Herrick walked among its thatched cottages and sang the praise of Cherry Ripe and "apricocks"; or of those lovely lasses who were probably two-thirds the creation of his fancy. The occupations of the people, too, are much the same—mainly agricultural, but including a few followers of the weaving industry introduced by the monks of Buckfast, long before Herrick's day. Now there is a considerable motor traffic through the village, linking it with towns and railways; but it is easy to imagine that when Herrick left London and his comrades—above all, his "master", Ben Jonson—for this remote parish in the West, it must have seemed an exile indeed. His life thenceforth would be so different that he felt impelled to take his "Farewell to Poetry". But his Muse was too much a part of himself for that resolution to hold; some of the best poems of the "Hesperides", and probably most of the "Noble Numbers" were written at Dean Prior. There is evidence in his verse that his lot and his rustic parishioners sometimes irked him. But there is more abundant proof of his sympathy and pleasure in all the village rites and festivities; of the observant love which he had for flowers and beasts and all the simple circumstances of country life.

Herrick was remarkably frank, yet so temperamentally imaginative and of such various moods, that to try to reconstruct his character or his story from his own outpourings is a dubious task. No tradition or him or his work now remains among the people of Dean Prior, but his latest biographer, Professor Moorman, quotes an interesting paper from the Quarterly Review of 1810 which shows that, a century ago, Herrick's poems were still repeated there. The writer had found one old woman, then in her ninety-ninth year, who knew more about the poet than any one in the neighborhood, for her mother had worked for his successor in the vigarage, and had passed on the legend of his pet pig "which he taught to drink out of a tankard"; and of the occasion when Herrick threw his sermon at the congregation in vehement anger at their inattention. Though unable to read and quite unaware that his poems were famous, the old woman was in the habit of using some of the "Noble Numbers" as her daily prayers, and, in particular, of saying the "Litany to the Holy Spirit" as she lay in bed. An old metrical prayer still survives on Dartmoor which might from its imagery have been written by Herrick, and is at least worth quoting:

In Thy garden here below
Water me that I may grow:
When the Grace of God is given
Then transplant me into Heaven.

Though Dean Prior was so far from Herrick's former haunts and the patrons of his art, of whom Mr. Endymion Porter was one of the chief, he never lost touch entirely with the Court nor ceased to be an ardent Royalist through the dark days of the Civil War. When, in 1647, his notice of ejection reached him, he gladly left the dull confines of the drooping West, and set out for London, saluting it as the "blest place" of his birth.

fram'd to please
All Nations, Customes, Kindrews, Languages!

He had waited long to publish his beloved manuscript poems, and this was his opportunity. But when the "Hesperides" and the "Noble Numbers" appeared together in 1648, they were received without enthusiasm by the public. Not till the nineteenth century did Herrick secure the wide recognition and poetic immortality for which he had hoped. This comparative failure of his lifework must have been a bitter disappointment—for he was too true a poet not to be confident of his lyrical inspiration. Probably it was as a man saddened by public and private affairs that Herrick, after the restoration of the Stuarts, went back to Dean Prior vicarage, where his faithful old housekeeper—the "Prew" of his poems—awaited him. It seems that his Muse had now taken her farewell of him: for the only lines he wrote during this second period were those on the monument of Sir Edward Giles and his wife in the south aisle of the parish church:

No trust to Metals nor to Marbles, when
These have their Fate, and wear away as men:
But Vertue Rears the eternal Monument
Times, Titles, Trophies, may be lost or Spent:
What more than thees can Tombs or Tomb-stones Pay?
But here's the Sun-set of a Tedious day:
These Two asleep are: I'll but be Undrest
And so to Bed: Pray wish us all Good Rest.

Herrick had written many epitaphs on himself in earlier days, but this one on his former neighbors and friends at Dean Court, stood till lately as his own memorial also; for no tomb-stone bears his name, and only the parish register records that

Robert Herrick, Vicker, was buried
ye 15th day of October, 1674

The old church of Dean Prior is built of grey stone and pine trees like sentinels on two sides. The great trees which overtop the battlemented tower at the west end may have been there in Herrick's time; perhaps he was laid in ihs unknown grave in clear autumn sunshine such as lit up the pale walls when I stood within them the other day. In January, 1926, a chancel window was given by a few "Lovers of Dean Prior and of Robert Herrick, Poet". The main subject of the design is the Nativity, on which Herrick dwelt so often in his poems. Above, a choir of angels hold a scroll with the words

'Tis He is borne. Whose quickning Birth
Gives life and lustre, publike mirth
To Heaven and the under-Earth.

from the "Christmas Caroll sung to the King in the Presence at Whitehall"—which is so lyrical, even to the eye, that one seems to hear the singing-boys' trebles soaring upwards in the Palace and the wistful stringed accompaniment. The figures of St. George and of King Charles I fill the outer lights on either side; and in the lower part of the left one, Herrick is shown kneeling at a faldstool as though joining in the Shepherds' worship. Various flowers mentioned in his poems are introduced below the central Figures, and the Red Rose of England fills the smaller traceries. Every detail of the design has some relation to the poet who spent thirty years of his life in Dean Prior and wrote many of his most exquisite lyrics there—those which are essentially English in feeling and form.

Robert Herrick, even in his devoutest mood, is never the poet of a deep spiritual experience. If we find poignancy in his verse at times, it is due to his consciousness of Beauty that must die

And Joy whose hand is ever at his lips
Bidding adieu.

He was unaware of the "trepidations of the spheres" felt by Donne, and of such mystical visions as Henry Vaughan's. But I think his simple faith and warm heart would have rejoiced to hear the old woman murmuring his lines as her prayers; and to find his name on the new window in his old church.—Muriel Kent, in the American Church Monthly.

THE BRAVEST BATTLES.

Annette Patton Cornell.

Three doctors came to look at Bea today.
While they examined her we could but wait,
In dread their consultation was too late;
And, thinking of her babies, had to pray,
That God would grant her great desire to stay
With them and with her faithful, anxious mate.
Three gravely shaken heads did not abate
Our fears. But when I went in where she lay
She said, "How sweet you look in that new hat".
Arrayed in softest blue with dabs of pale,
Pink rouge upon her cheeks to hide pain's toll,
She graciously conversed of this and that.
The bravest battles are not fought in hail
Of bullets, but on ramparts of the soul.

True Disciples.

When mankind comes to its completion in Christ it wll be able surely to rejoice in every triumph of God in this world, and at the same time be filled with love and tenderness for the most hateful of those who work against God.

What is the passage in the New Testament to set alongside the song of Deborah: "So let all Thine enemies perish, O Lord!" Turn to the great New Testament and hear the prayer of Jesus on the Cross: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Between that barbaric cry over the destruction of God's enemies and this infinite compassion of our Saviour, what a vast difference!

Not until we have come to the place where we shall absolutely rejoice in every work of Christ, with that testimony which comes only with our complete dedication, and, at the same time, having nothing in ourselves but that pity and desire to help even the worst of men, not until then do we show ourselves to be true disciples of the Master. —Phillips Brooks.

"From Greenland's Icy Mountains."

In 1733 Moravian missionaries went to Greenland to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and although they worked with much devotion, up to the year 1738, they had made no converts. One reason, as they believed afterwards, was this, that they thought it necessary before declaring Jesus Christ to instruct the people in the doctrines of natural religion.

One day a man, called Kajarnak, of the most evil character, entered a missionary's hut, and by accident, as it were, heard him read the story of Jesus' sufferings. How far removed, one would say, was the mystery of the Divine Sacrifice from the ideas of this Greenlander, infamous for his cruelty! But just because he was so great a sinner, and this was so great a salvation, there was a pre-established harmony between Christ and Kajarnak.

"How was that?" he asked. "Tell me that again, for I too wish to be saved." He too! Quite right, Kajarnak; 'tis thy privilege, for thy salvation is also in the nature of things, and for Kajarnak Christ had died. "These words," the missionary said, "penetrated through my very marrow and bones." Less than a year afterwards, Kajarnak, his wife, and two little children were baptized, and became the first-fruits of Greenland unto Christ. As he was the first of the Greenlanders to be in Christ, he was the first also to be in glory, for two years after his baptism he died in great peace, comforting his wife and his family. So Christ satisfied a savage Greenlander.—Rev. John Watson, D. D.

The Things Prepared.

To the tiny babe the room in which it was born is all of its world—four walls and a few faces, and it cannot make very much of them. When some one goes out the door, I suppose it wonders where he goes. It cannot imagine what lies beyond—the sweetness of the sunlight, the stirring of the wind, the glory of the heavens. So with us in this world. We cannot imagine what lies beyond in that great unseen real world, something wonderful, we think. "Now are we the children of God and it doth not yet appear what we shall be" for "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared" in the wonderland of the hereafter.—Dr. H. A. Porter.

NEW YEAR'S: 1929.

Charles Nevers Holmes.

Sands of time are flowing, flowing,
Golden moments, rare and bright,
And another year is going,
Going, going from our sight;

We are watching, we are dreaming,
Dreaming o fthe days gone by,
Days with pain and pleasure teeming,
In the Year about to die.

Hark! The bells are ringing, ringing,
Jubilantly far and near,
Voices joyously are singing,
Singing, singing sweet and clear;

In a mighty chorus swelling,
Swelling over sea and earth,
Everywhere glad tidings telling
Of another New Year's birth.

For the Young Folks

RULES FOR DAILY LIFE.

Begin the day with God;
Kneel down to Him in prayer;
Lift up thy heart to His abode,
And seek His love to share.

Open the Book of God,
And read a portion there;
That it may hallow all thy thoughts,
And sweeten all thy care.

Go through the day with God,
Whate'er thy work may be:
Where'er thou art—at home, abroad,
He still is near to thee.

Converse in mind with God;
Thy Spirit heavenward raise;
Acknowledge every good bestowed,
And offer grateful praise.

Conclude the day with God;
Thy sins to Him confess;
Trusting in the Lord's atoning blood,
And plead His rightousness.

Lie down at night with God,
Who give His servants sleep;
And when thou tread'st the vale of death,
He will thee guard and keep.

The Mirror.

King Bardolph was probably the handsomest monarch who had ever ruled over the fine and prosperous country of Carsovia. He was tall and dark and broad and upright. His black hair was thick and curly, his eyes blue, his teeth white, his complexion ruddy, and his strong legs were as straight as fir-trees.

In his throne-room, facing the throne, was a very bright, clear mirror; and although he was by no means vain, King Bardolph would often stand in front of his mirror, and regard with much satisfaction his very comely reflection.

But as the years rolled on the king grew lazy. He gave up his hunting and his riding, he walked no more, he breakfasted in bed and then turned over and took a nap until noon. When he did go out, he lolled in his fine carriage and yawned.

After leading this indolent life for some time, King Bardolph came one morning and stood before his splendid mirror. As he gazed at his reflection he started back with horror. What could be wrong with the mirror? Looking back at him from its smooth, polished surface was a fat, blotchy, red-faced man, with puffy eyes, a mottled nose and a rounded stomach.

"Bless my buttons!" gasped Bardolph, "what a horrid-looking fellow! The mirror must be bewitched, for I'm sure that can't be me. I may be a trifle plump, but that creature is hideously fat and certainly eats too much. Now I don't eat too much. Let me see, what did I have for breakfast? Dear, dear, dear, what was it now? Er—six eggs, seven sausages, half a chicken, four rolls, some butter and some honey. Now that's not too much for a King. No, it certainly can not be me.. Some wizard has bewitched the thing." And pulling a little doubtfully at his lips, he rang a bell.

When a footman entered, King Bardolph said, "Take this mirror up to the store-room, bring another and put in its place."

Upon the morrow King Bardolph hurried over his breakfast, and then walked up to the new mirror as quickly as his breathlessness would allow. As he saw the same horrid-looking fellow gazing back at him, he raised his clenched fists above his head and bellowed madly.

At that moment Diplo, his wisest and most trusted counsellor, entered the throne-room.

The King beckoned him, and when he was come to the mirror, King Bardolph said, pointing at the image in the glass, "Diplo, is that me"?

"Is that I, your Majesty means," ventured Diplo.

The King stared at him in angry puzzlement for a moment, and then he smiled and said, "Yes, of course, my wise Diplo, but kings make their own grammar. What I wish to know is, am I like that?" and he flicked an impatient finger toward the mirror.

Diplo smiled. "Certainly not, Your Majesty," he replied.

"Then what is the matter with the thing?" asked the angry monarch.

"The glass is faulty," replied Diplo, "Come with me, Your Majesty," he continued; and taking the King by the arm, he led him to a little window in the topmost turret of the palace.

Diplo pointed out over the blue distant hills. "Over there, O King," he said, "the Sorcerer Mohrab, in the long ago, hid the Mirror of Truth. The man who wishes to see himself as he really is must seek this magic mirror himself, and, having found it, may look within and learn the truth."

"I will set off in my carriage tomorrow, after breakfast," said Bardolph.

"That would be useless," replied Diplo; "he who seeks the Mirror of Truth must seek it afoot. Moreover," went on Diplo, "it is only to be found one hour after dawn. Thereafter for the remainder of the day and night it is invisible."

The King sighed deeply. "Ah, well," he said presently, "What must be, must be: tomorrow I will arise betimes and seek this magic glass."

And so, upon the morrow, King Bardolph arose from his silken bed before the dawn, and upon unaccustomed feet searched the hills. But he sought in vain, and returned wearily homeward.

Diplo met him and said, "Do not lose heart, O King; you shall find, if you will seek; try again."

And so upon the morrow, and for many morrows, for weeks and indeed for months, King Bardolph sought and sought upon the distant hills, in the fresh cool dawns for the magic mirror.

At the end of six months he was once again fine, slim, handsome, straight and ruddy. Diplo came to him and said, "Your majesty, I dreamed a dream last night, and in it I thought that the Sorcerer Mohrab came to me and told me where the Mirror of Truth lies hidden. Tomorrow I will come with you and show you the place."

And so upon the morrow the two set off together. Diplo found it difficult to keep pace with the King's swift strides, but at last they reached the hills, just as the red face of the sun climbed over the misty peaks. The King stood staring at the beauty of the dawn. He seemed to have forgotten his errand, forgotten Diplo, forgotten everything.

A cry from the ground startled him to awareness. He looked down, and there at his feet crouched Diplo, pulling from under the bushes a fine shining mirror.

Diplo sprang to his feet, and crying triumphantly, "The Mirror of Truth", held it in front of the King.

The King stared into its smooth, polished surface. He saw within it the loveliness of the eastern sky, and the splendor of the new-come sun. But he saw also a fine, handsome face, with ruddy complexion and crisp curly black hair."

"At last!" he cried, " the Mirror of Truth: I knew I was like that." Then taking the mirror from Diplo, he turned it around and looked at its back. In the middle of the ebony was a long jagged scratch.

King Bardolph looked wonderingly, at the scratch for a long time, and then he said slowly, "Why, Diplo, my old mirror had a scratch on its back like that."

Diplo laughed softly. "No doubt, Your Majesty," he said; and then, after a little pause he went on, "for this is your old mirror."

"Then how in the world did it get here?" asked the astonished King.

"I got it from the store-room before we started," replied Diplo, "and carried it here under my cloak."

"You sly dog!" cried Bardolph, not knowing whether to be angry or to laugh, "then there is no such thing as a Mirror of Truth?"

"On the contrary, Your Majesty," replied Diplo with a wise smile, "all mirrors are Mirrors of Truth; and all mirrors now will show you the same reflection as the one you are holding."

"Diplo," said the King, as they made their way back to the palace, "you deserve a reward for your cleverness: what shall it be?"

"A walk with Your Majesty," replied Diplo, "to the hills each dawn, as long as we both shall live."

"Granted!" cried King Bardolph with a great laugh.

The King kept his word, and in some of the very old history books, you may find them spoken of as Bardolph the Merry Monarch and Diplo the Chuckling Counsellor.—The Children's Play-Hour Book, Longmans.

He was only a boy to his mother, yet he was going away from the home to live and work in the distant city. He was glad to go, eager to leave the watchful care of the home, but his mother felt as if she could not let him go alone, not even sure that he was consciously taking God with him, though she had tried, as best she could, to lead the boy to Him. 'Twas only a day or two before he was to go and the mother longed to find the right message to give to him before he should leave her.

One day when he came in toward eevning, his mother said to him, "John, down in the H——— store there is hung a wonderful picture that I should like much to have you see. Will you go down tomorrow and see it?" "Oh, mother," said the boy, "what do I want with a picture? I don't care about it and I don't want to take the time to go."

"Son," said the mother, "in a little while you will be where I shall not be asking you to do things to please me. I should like you to do this for me."

"Well," answered the boy, "if you put it in that way, I suppose I must go." And so he went.

He was directed to the room where the picture was hung and opened the door to enter. But he stepped back. On the platform at the front of the room was a man praying. He waited for a time and then opened the door again, but still he was at prayer. When he opened it the third time and found it still the same, he decided to enter and investigate. Then he found that the man at prayer was the picture he had come to see. It was the Christ in Gethsemane, a very large, life-size picture, wonderfully lighted and framed in black velvet. Eagerly he went forward and studied the picture which could thus mislead him. That was a fine face! But it seemed very full of care. Why? His mother had told him that the Christ was not afraid to die, that He had done no wrong. Why then did He look so worried?

After a time he went out but he wanted to see the picture again, and he wanted to ask some questions about it. So he said to his mother, "I should like to see that picture again. Will you come down with me tomorrow?" And with a glad heart the mother went to the gallery with the boy. This time he went toward the picture with his hat off and with quiet step. Silently they stood and looked at it, and then he asked the question which seemed to him so important, "Why does His face look so worried, and why do His hands seem to be pleading?" "Son," said the mother, with a silent prayer, "He had only been a teacher for three years and there was so much He wanted to teach and to do. But now He was to die and leave much of it undone. I think He was worried for fear the work would not be done, for even the men whom He loved and trusted were asleep when He needed them. I think He wondered if people all down the years would do the work that He could not do. He was thinking of that, I am sure, as He prayed."

For a long time the boy stood there, his hands moving one over the other and his face sinking low and lower as his eyes looked steadily into the face of the man at prayer. Then he straightened his shoulders and quietly said, "Oh, Man of Galilee, if there is anything you left undone that I can do, you can count on me."

And he went out to live like the Christ.—Canadian Churchman.

The Bird That Sold Its Wings.

A little boy named Robert once came home from Sunday School looking very glum.

"I wish I had a fortune," he said. "I'd give anything for a fortune." Just then his mother came in and overheard what he said.

"Bobby, my boy," she said, "would you give anything for a fortune? Ah, Bobby," said his mother, "I don't think you could ever have heard the story of how the skylark sold his wings."

"Oh, mother, do tell me," said Bobby. And his mother began:

"Once there lived a skylark who was the finest of his race. One day as he flew over a wood he looked down, and there, traveling over the wide road that ran through it, was the strangest little coach ever seen. It was painted black with yellow stripes, and was drawn by six horses as black as pitch. But what interested him most was the fact that he saw sticking out of the windows of the coach the tails of some worms, and so he flew down to see what this thing might be, and as he drew nearer he heard the coachman calling out: 'Three fine, fat, juicy worms for two feathers. Who'll buy?'

"'That's cheap enough,' the skylark thought. 'I'd give anything for worms, especially big ones.' So he nibbled first at one wing and then at the other, and pulled a feather out of each, bought the worms and hurried away into a dark corner to eat them all by himself.

"Next day he saw the coach again and had another treat. And the next day, too, and the day after that, and the day after that. In fact, he grew fonder and fonder of worms. But oh! his wings. Soon he lost a sunward race in which he had always been first. Then he was only able to fly just above the trees, then not even as high as that. At last he could not fly at all, but could only hop about in the undergrowth and he could sing no more because of the darkness and chilliness of the wood from which he could not escape.

"When things got as bad as this, he thought upon a good plan for making them better. He worked hard hunting worms and got a large heap of them by the roadside, and when the coach came along he cried to the coachman: 'Please sir, I have here a lot of worms: how many feathers will you give me for them?' And, would you believe it, that hard-hearted coachman simply answered: 'My business is worms for feathers, not feathers for worms,' and he whipped up his horses and drove away. The poor, foolish little skylark rolled over and died of broken wings and a broken heart.

"When he was found, and the other skylarks saw what had happened they buried him in the wood by the roadside, and over his grave they placed a warning to all other birds, never, never, never to sell one feather of their wings for worms, or for anything else.

"And, Bobby," his mother continued, "Jesus said, What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

Bobby had been following his mother's words carefully. He looked at her when she ceased speaking.

"Mother," he said earnestly, "I think after all I would not give anything for a fortune."—A. D. Belden, in "Stories of the King".

It Takes Two to Make a Quarrel.

Once upon a time there were two boys in the school, named Peter Ender and Smith Bent. They spent their time in singing and telling stories to the little boys before they went to bed. They were the best of friends, and shared with each other their fruit and candy, and so they were very happy.

One day Peter grew tired of being good to Smith. "Smith," said he to his companion, "life is very dull with every day the same. I am tired of seeing you so cheerful, so let us have a quarrel."

"Very well, Peter," said Smth, looking rather grave, for he dd not like the idea. "But what can we quarrel about?" he asked.

"Well," said Peter, doubtfully, "I can't tell you not to use my bike because you never use it, anyway. And I can't steal your fruit or candy for you always want me to share yours. "I have it," he cried, after a moment's thought; "Smith, do you see that sack of good, red apples over there, you say it's yours, and I'll say it's mine, so we'll have a squabble."

"All right," said Smith, "only you must begin." He clenched his hands and tried to look ugly and Peter did the same.

They were quite changed from the kindly, smiling boys they had been a moment before. Peter pointed to the sack of apples and said, gruffly, "I want you to understand that those apples are mine, and if I catch you trying to steal some I'll knock every hair off your head until you are bald."

Such fierceness made Smith jump. "I beg your pardon, pardner Peter," he said in amazement.

"Don't call me 'pardner'," was the rough reply. "Behave respectfully to your betters. Understand that that sack of apples is mine, do you deny it?"

Smith could hardly get his breath but he managed to stammer out, "Your apples, are they?"

"Yes, my apples and mind they belong to me, and I am going to have them."

"Why, of course they're yours, Peter, and if you'll wait a minute I'll get you some more."

"I suppose you must give up trying to squabble, for it takes two to make a quarrel," said Peter.

So they burst out laughing and went in to the basement to share their apples.

From that day on they have never quarreled. Instead, they have told stories to the little boys and then sent them to bed.—Selected.

I'M GOING TO BE HAPPY.

I'm going to be happy today;
Though the skies of the morning are gray,
I have made up my mind that whatever I find
I'm going to be happy today.

I'm going to be happy today;
Who knows what I shall find on the way?
A smiling new friend or a lily to tend;
I'm going to be happy today.

"TIDEWATER TALES"

A book into which is gathered the folklore, traditions and history of Tidewater Virginia. Written in a delightful informal style by Prof. William C. Garnett.

The President of a College in South Carolina writes in part: "My wife and I have been reading with great interest, 'Tidewater Tales', written by Prof. Garnett. I have never read a work of this kind the style of which I have found more attractive, simple and yet elegant, interesting but never monotonous. I have found the greatest pleasure in reading it, and I am delighted that you called my attention to it."

A prominent representative of a Publishing Co., and a lover of books, writes: "You have built a monument to yourself, and long after the green sod grows over you, this book will be read by our children and children's children. I could read 'A Fox Hunt 'Fo de War' every week in the year and get a thrill each time I read it." One of the most prominent merchants in this section of Virginia writes. "To know the author of 'Tidewater Tales' should guarantee the sale of this work."

A prominent attorney in Washington, and himself a writer, and well-known lecturer, writes in part: " . . the charming description of the old homes, the history and traditions, and the true-to-life stories in local color, combined to delight me, and enticed my memory to run down the corridors of the past."

A profesor in one of the Virginia Universities writes: "You have put posterity in your debt by presenting so skilfully to them characters that have passed to the beyond. The story of that old Virginia negro in Louisiona touches me deeply."

The Voice of Free Grace

The First Nation-Wide Gospel Broadcast

While evangelical truth is being broadcast over individual stations, the religious messages over the great chain networks have thus far been largely of the liberal, modernistic type. Now there has begun a national chain broadcast that is thoroughly evangelical. The Vesper sermons of the Rev. Donald Grey Barnhouse are broadcast from the historic Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, over the stations of the Columbia chain, which can be received in the United States from the Atlantic to the Rockies, and also in eastern Canada.

Mr. Barnhouse may need some introduction at the present time, as he is a young man whose work is just becoming known, but after you have heard him you will have no doubt as to his position. These sermons are not controversial; Mr. Barnhouse rides no hobbies, but seeks to lift up the Lord Jesus Christ, and to make Him real as Saviour and Lord. This is a great venture of faith undertaken in assurance that God's stewards will support this much-needed fundamental and evangelical testimony.

Mr. Barnhouse writes: "This year God has seen fit to open the door to a project so vast that we can hardly measure its possibilities. For we are really doing an unheard of thing in this nation-wide broadcast. Many people do not realize that this is the only chain broadcast of a sermon that costs anything. The broadcasts going out from New York are courtesy broadcasts, and we doubt if the ministers would be allowed to tell people that they were lost sinners, headed for a Christless eternity, and that the only way of salvation is through the blood of Jesus Christ.

"The cost of this is stupendous—We pay one thousand one hundred and ten dollars each and every Sunday for our thirty-minute broadcast. Ours is a small church with less than 500 members, but we look to God to supply our need. Let us make it plain. If the people of the country like yourself do not send in to us the thousands of dollars necessary to cover our broadcast, we will not be able to renew our options. If you want this kind of preaching on the air will you not pray that we may continue? We have received a few more substantial gifts, but many people cannot afford to give large amounts. If you can, you may be sure God will use it to His honor and glory in the salvation of souls; if you cannot, we are happy to know that you are listening in as we lift up the Lord Jesus Christ as the only hope of this world."

Health can be earned

Says one of the healthiest men in the world

EVEN a perfect physical specimen like Gene Tunney doesn't just take health for granted. He has worked hard, unceasingly, to build himself up and keep in condition. Realizing the importance of regular habits, he takes no chances.

"I started taking Nujol internally seven years ago. The first month Nujol brought remarkable changes in my physical condition. My elimination became active and normal. My appetite increased and a desire for intensive training was created. Since that time I have taken Nujol about five nights a week. I have regulated myself to the amount necessary to keep my elimination normal. If I discover that I have taken an excess I stop its use for a couple of days, when I renew my daily practice of taking a swallow from the bottle before retiring.

"I have found during my seven years' experience with Nujol that it is not habit-forming, or in any way unpleasant or harmful."

Nujol contains no medicine or drugs. It is simply a pure natural substance perfected by the Nujol Laboratories (26 Broadway, New York). It not only keeps an excess of body poisons from forming (we all have them) but aids in their removal.

BUILDING FUND

ST. THOMAS MISSION CHURCH

SANFORD, N. C.

Our present church building is undesirably located in a mill section. It is a small, unattractive building, and we cannot grow until we move. We are endeavoring to build a new edifice in the residential section of the city, and now have the walls about six feet above the ground. As we have only about 18 or 20 communicants, it is absolutely necessary for us to secure help from our friends, in order to construct a building, that will be worthy of the name of our dear old church.

of St. John's. The service at St. Bartholomew's the following Sunday morning was in the nature of a memorial.

The Church of the Resurrection, Richmond Hill, asks an offering from each member on his or her birthday for the endowment fund.

At St. John's, Flushing, some new memorial gifts were lately dedicated: a grill at the baptistry, four chancel windows, an alms basin, and new light fixtures for the chapel.

At St. Paul's, Flatbush, where a Thursday morning Eucharist with special intercessions for the sick had been a custom for several years, there has now been added a Thursday evening service of hymns and devotions, with a brief address on some aspect of the Church's care for the sick.

At a recent confirmation in St. Michael's and All Angels', Seaford, the age of the eleven candidates ranged from eleven years to eighty-three.

The new parish house of St. John's Church, of Lattingtown, was dedicated by Bishop Stires on December 23. It is a beautiful structure, built as an ell to the lovely little church. It is the gift of a vestryman, in memory of his mother.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Diocesan Institute.

Monday evening Bishop Tucker conducted a Quiet Hour, commencing the series of meetings, known as the Diocesan Institute, being held at the Mayo Memorial Church House, Richmond, January 8-10. Delegates from various parts of the diocese have been arriving the first of the week to share in the inspiration always received at these educational gatherings. All missionaries attending are given an opportunity to present their work. On Tuesday Mrs. Wyllie will tell of her work in San Domingo. On Wednesday Miss Ridgley, of Africa, will be the principal speaker, and on Thursday the Rev. W. B. Everett, of St. Andrew's Mission, and Miss Jones, from the Blue Ridge School, will discuss their fields of service.

The program for Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday follows:

4:00 P. M.—Conferences led by Miss Louisa Davis, Diocesan President of Woman's Auxiliary.

5:00 P. M.—Mission Study Class, Miss Boyer.

6:00 P. M.—Supper served at the Church House, free to all.

7:00 P. M.—Mission Study Classes, Miss Boyer.

8:00 P. M.—Speakers from the Field.

Miss Tilly, of Atlanta, Ga., is conducting classes for Leaders of Juniors and Young People. She is an expert on Methods, and has been a leader in this work at the Blue Ridge Summer School for many years.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Howard C. Robbins, D. D., has resigned as Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City.

The Rev. John J. Neighbour, nonparochial clergyman from the Diocese of South Florida, has accepted a call to the Diocese of Maryland and has entered upon his duties as minister-in-charge of Epiphany Chapel, Odenton, All Saints' Church, Annapolis Junction, and St. Mary's Church, Jessup.

ORDINATIONS.

On St. Thomas' Day, December 21, 1928, at Trinity Church, Anoka, Minn. Bishop McElwain ordained Arland C. Blage as deacon. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Paul R. Palmer, and the Rev. F. H. Eckel, Jr., presented the candidate.

The Rev. Mr. Blage will remain in charge of Trinity Church, Anoka, for the time being.

December 23, 1928, the Rev. K. Brent Woodruff was ordained priest in Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls, S. D., by the Rt. Rev. W. Blair Roberts, D. D. The Rev. Mr. Woodruff is a son of the Very Rev. E. B. Woodruff, D. D., Dean of Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls, who presented him for ordination. The Rev. C. A. Weed, of Mitchell, S. D., preached the sermon. The Rev. Conrad H. Gesner, Canon of the Cathedral, read the Litany. The Ven. Edward Ashley, D. D., Archdeacon of Niobrara, united with the others in the laying on of hands. Mr. Woodruff is a graduate of St. Stephen's College, and the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge. At present he has a fellowship at Harvard University, and on the completion of his work there next June he will take up work among the Indians in South Dakota, working on the Standing Rock Reservation, with headquarters at St. Elizabeth's School, Wakpala.

On December 18, 1928, at 11 A. M., the Rev. Harry E. Elston was advanced to the priesthood in the Church of Faith, Mahonoy City, Pa., by the Diocesan, the Rt. Rev. Frank W. Sterrett, D. D.

The Rev. Robert F. Kline, who was his rector for many years, preached the sermon and presented him to the Bishop. The Rev. Joseph B. Clair, a classmate, read the Litany. The Archdeacon of the diocese read the Epistle and assisted in the Holy Communion. The Rev. Howard W. Diller, the Dean of the Convocation of Reading, read the Gospel. Other clergy present from the diocese were the Rev. Messrs. Alan B. Tongue, of Christ Church, Frackville; Fred DeF. Johnson, of Calvary Church, Tamaqua; Harry C. Mershon, Holy Apostles, St. Clair; Walter Archbold, D. D., St. John's, Ashland; C. E. Purdy, Trinity, Lansford, and A. E. Koch, St. Paul's, Minersville.

Luncheon was served in the rector for the clergy and immediate family, at which time the vestry presented Mr. Elston with a purse.

The Bishop appointed Mr. Elston as the missionary to the Church of Faith, Mahonoy City, where he has been serving since last June.

On St. Thomas' Day, 1928, in St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., Mr. John Henry Lehn was made a Deacon by Bishop Sterrett. The Rev. Dr. F. L. Flinchbaugh, rector of the church, preached the sermon. The Rev. Henry R. Tadall, of St. George's Church, Nanticoke, read the Litany. The Rev. John Hall Griffith, of St. Peter's Church, Plymouth, presented the candidate. The Rev. Robert F. Kline, of Calvary Church, Wilkes-Barre, was the Epistoler and the ordinand read the Holy Gospel. The Bishop was the celebrant.

Mr. Lehn came to us from the Lutheran ministry. He is at present connected with the staff of St. Stephen's, having as his special work the mission at Nuangola, St. Martin's-in-the-Field.

In St. Stephen's Church, Harrisburg, on Wednesday, December 19, 1928, the Rt. Rev. James Henry Darlington, D. D., Bishop of the diocese, ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Clifford Leland Stanley, of Trinity Church, Tyrone, Pa., presented by the Rev. Hiram R. Bennett; the Rev. Earl Miller Honaman, of St. Luke's, Mechanicsburg, St. Chrysostom's, New Mark; St. Gerald's, Harrisburg, and St. James, Enola, presented by the Rev. Frederick P. Houghton; the Rev. Robert Theodore Shellenberger, of Christ Church, Lykens; Saul of Tarsus, Williamston, and St. Bartholomew's, Millersburg, presented by the Rev. Charles E. Berghaus. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. O. H. Bridgman, assisted by the Rev. H. B. Pulsifer, of Atlantic City. The preacher was the Rev. Hiram R. Bennett, of Christ Church, Williamsport. The Litany was read by the Rev. Oscar F. R. Treder, D. D., of St. Stephen's, Harrisburg. The Epistoler was the Ven. Paul S. Atkins, Archdeacon of Harrisburg, the Gospeler being the Rev. Archibald M. Judd, of St. Paul's, Harrisburg. Assisting at the laying on of hands were the Rev. Lewis Nichols, of Lock Haven; the Rev. Wm. Gordon Thompson, locum tenens of Trinity Church, Shamokin, and the Rev. Hollis W. Colwell, of St. Andrew's, Harrisburg. The Rev. A. J. G. Dowie, J. D., was the Bishop's cross bearer. Alfred C. Kuschwa, organist of St. Stephen's Church, was in charge of the music. The young men ordained will continue in the churches and missions as at present. The Bishop entertained the clergy and invited guests at luncheon at the Penn-Harris Hotel.

On Sunday, December 23, the Rev. Frederick Whittaker Burford was advanced to the Priesthood in Christ Church, Springfield, Ill., by the bishop of the diocese, the Rt. Rev. John Chanler White, D. D. The rector of Christ Church, the Rev. Jerry Wallace, preached the Sermon, and the Litany was read by the Rev. William H. Tomlins, retired, formerly priest-in-charge of St. Bartholomew's, Granite City. Assisting the Bishop in the laying on of hands were the Rev. Jerry Wallace, of Springfield; the Rev. William H. Tomlins, of Granite City, and the Rev. Harry R. Zeigler, of Granite City.

The Rev. Mr. Burford has been serving his diaconate in Granite City and also in charge of St. Gabriel's, Woodriver, and St. Thomas', Glen Carbon, and he now becomes minister-in-charge of these three missions by appointment of the Bishop.

Frederick W. Burford is a product of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, he having been active in the Diocesan Assembly in St. Luke's and in his local Chapter in St. Louis, for a number of years.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Dr. Mercer P. Logan, of Charleston, S. C., died suddenly on December 2, while on the train traveling from Nashville to Monteagle, Tenn., where he conducted the DuBose Training School.

Dr. Logan is survived by his wife and several children.

"The Example of An Old Man."

"I do think one mends one's ways as the years run on and that one is tenderer at eighty than he was at fifty. I pray God that, if it might be, the example of an old man who strives with all his soul for gentleness may, despite his own failures, bear fruit in the lives of those who have happily a long way to march, and many opportunities to grasp before their eighty comes."

Such was the farewell words uttered by the Archbishop of Canterbury to his Diocesan Conference. The message came straight from the heart of a great man. They might well be taken by each one of us as our aim and pattern. Those who know the Archbishop best are conscious of how he has striven to cultivate the fruit of the Spirit—love, joy, peace. How different the story of the Church would be if this motto were her guiding principle! How much more powerful and happy our individual lives would be if they were inspired by that "love which thinketh no evil". Censorious, un-Christlike judgments whither our own souls and repel those who are wistfully looking to see the Christ in us. We do not, we cannot, all think alike, but we can, and we ought, to give others the credit for honesty of purpose and a desire to follow the gleam so far as they see it.—Church of England Newspaper.

SLEEP WELL.

"Good-night, sleep well!" we say to those we love
And watch dear faces glimmer on the stair,
And hear faint footfalls in the rooms above
Sound on the quiet air,
Yet feel no fear, though lonely they must go
The road of slumber's strange oblivion:
Dark always wears to dawn,
Sleep is so gentle, and so well we know,
Wherever they have gone
They will be safe until the morning light.
Good-night, good-night!

Good-night, sleep well, beloveds; when the last
Slow dusk has fallen, and your steps no more
Make music on the empty upper floor,
And day is fully past.
We who so lightly let you go alone,
Evening by evening, from our trustful sight
Into the mystery of sleep's unknown—
We need not fear tonight,
Death is so gentle—dark will break to dawn—
Love will be safe until the morning light.

THE ORDER OF THE THOUSANDFOLD, 1929

"Verily, verily I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto my Father."—St. John 14:12.

What is there I can do
To prove that I am true
And faithful to my Lord
According to His word?

I can at least believe
He would not me deceive,
By promising great things
Which life but seldom brings.

His promise must be true
That He can great things do
Through me, if I believe
And thus His Power receive.

I may not ever see
All that He does through me,
But yet a tiny part
Will warm and cheer my heart.

And so I go my way
And each day humbly pray
That what He said He'd do
Will in my life come true.

Frederick W. Neve.

If we will let our Lord use us as He used His own Body here on earth, and believe in His willingness to use us, then great things will come of it, and life will mean golden days of joyous anticipation, though much that He does through us may be hidden from our outward eyes.

OUR PHYSICAL HERITAGE IN CHRIST

SECOND EDITION.

By Kenneth Mackenzie

"Showing wide reading and a mastery of the question, in a sane and well-balanced treatment. By equipment, intellectually, spiritually and by personal experience the author is peculiarly fitted to write on this subject. His intimate knowledge of the Bible acts as a safe guide amid the perplexities which have gathered about the problem. An authoritative contribution." The Southern Churchman.

FIRM IN THE FAITH AND LOYAL

Mr. Alfred B. Williams, December 31, 1928.
Editor Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.
My dear Sir:

Before the year closes I must express to you the rejoicing I have in my heart that there is one Episcopal Church Paper standing firm for the fundamentals of the Christian faith and loyal to Holy Scripture as the fully inspired Word of God. Carry on!

Yours very truly,
River Forest, Ill. Reader.

December 29, 1928.
1039 North Calvert Street,
Baltimore, Md.

Southern Churchman:
Dear Sirs:

Will you please send me to the above address the "Southern Churchman," beginning with the New Year. I believe the amount is $3.00 a year—if this is not right, please inform me. I am sure I shall enjoy it very much, for it has so much religion in it. I am a Northerner, but I prefer your paper to any of our Northern papers. I am also enclosing an original true story, which if you would like to use in the Easter issue of your paper I would be very glad to have you. It has never been in print.

Yours very sincerely,
Florence Montgomery Angell,
(Mrs. Edw. B. Angell.)

Wednesday, January 2, 1929.

Dear Mr. Williams:

A friend has been giving me the New York Churchman for some years. I just could not stand it any longer, so asked her to discontinue it and send me the Southern Churchman, which she gladly did. I have enjoyed your paper, handed to me about a month late, so know I shall enjoy it more right from the press. I have wanted for some time to thank you for so bravely upholding the Faith and Doctrines of our dear Church, and hope you may be spared many years to carry on the work. I saw "The Bible: Its Christ and Modernism" advertised in your paper, sent for it, and have circulated it among my friends. It is a fine book. Wishing you a Happy New Year, and many of them,

Your sincere friend,
Alexandria, Va. Alice J. Green.

Macon, Ga., January 1, 1929.

My dear Friend:

Your paper certainly is one of the greatest religious papers that I have ever read and is such an incentive for better lives and better thought to all who read its message each week.

Believer.

January 3, 1929.

For 1929—And Afterwards

"The God of glory keep thee—
Keep thee in perfect peace;
Leading thee bravely forward
Till all thy conflicts cease."

Dear Mr. Williams:

I am enclosing a little item and am wishing for you true success "Henceforth and forever."

The Church seems divided into three groups—Protestant Episcopalians, Romanists, and Modernists. Your part seems to be to help the Episcopalians and try to keep the two other groups from "swamping the boat." It is a case of holding the Church for the Church! And, as you have already discovered (no doubt) some will ridicule, some ignore, some say "Intolerant!" some sneer, some approve at a distance, some earnestly uphold you. It is generally that way in such matters. So keep cheered up! "He always wins who sides with God." "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

May God guide you continually. Your friend, Minister of the Gospel.

DOMINUS FIRMAVIT ISIN 1835

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 19, 1929. No. 3.

LETTER OF GENERAL LEE TO LORD ACTON.

This letter, written while General Lee was president of Washington College, is unique, since its author was extremely cautious and reticent among his own people on the subject which he here discussed freely with his foreign correspondent. It will be found in Lord Acton's Correspondence—I, 302-305.

Lexington, Vir., 15 Dec., 1866.

Sir,—although your letter of the 4th ulto. has been before me some days unanswered I hope you will not attribute it to a want of interest, but to my inability to keep pace with my correspondence. As a citizen of the South, I feel deeply indebted to you for the sympathy you have evinced in its cause, and am conscious that I owe your kind consideration of myself to my connection with it. The influence of current opinion in Europe upon the current politics of America must always be salutary; and the importance of the questions now at issue in the United States, involving not only constitutional government in this country, but the progress of universal liberty and civilization, invests your proposition with peculiar value, and will add to the obligations which every true American must owe you for your efforts to guide that opinion aright. Amid the conflicting statements and sentiments in both countries, it will be no easy task to discover the truth, or to relieve it from the mass of prejudice and passion, with which it has been covered by party spirit. I am conscious of the compliment conveyed in your request for my opinion as to the light in which American politics should be viewed, and had I the ability, I have not the time to enter upon a discussion, which was commenced by the founders of the constitution and has been continued to the present day. I can only say that while I have considered the preservation of the constitutional power of the General Government to be the foundation of our peace and safety at home and abroad, I YET BELIEVE THAT THE MAINTENANCE OF THE RIGHTS AND AUTHORITY RESERVED TO THE STATE AND TO THE PEOPLE NOT ONLY ESSENTIAL TO THE ADJUSTMENT AND BALANCE OF THE GENERAL SYSTEM, BUT THE SAFEGUARD TO THE CONTINUANCE OF A FREE GOVERNMENT. I CONSIDER IT AS THE CHIEF SOURCE OF STABILITY TO OUR POLITICAL SYSTEM, WHEREAS THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATES INTO ONE VAST REPUBLIC, SURE TO BE AGGRESSIVE ABROAD AND DESPOTIC AT HOME, WILL BE THE CERTAIN PRECURSOR OF THAT RUIN WHICH HAS OVERWHELMED ALL THOSE THAT HAVE PRECEDED IT.

I need not refer one so well acquainted as you are with American history to the State papers of Washington and Jefferson, the representatives of the federal and democratic parties, denouncing consolidation and centralization of power, as tending to the subversion of State Government and to despotism. The New England States, whose citiens are the fiercest opponents of the Southern states, did not always avow the opinions they now advocate. Upon the purchase of Louisiana by Jefferson, they virtually asserted the right of secession through their prominent men; and in the convention which assembled at Hartford in 1814, they threatened the disruption of the Union unless the war should be discontinued. The assertion of this right has been repeatedly made by their politicians when their party was weak, and Massachusetts, the leading state in hostility to the South, declares in the preamble to her constitution, that the people of that commonwealth "have the sole exclusive right of governing themselves as a free sovereign and independent state, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled." Such has been in substance the language of other governments, and such the doctrine advocated by the leading men of the country for the last seventy years. Judge Chase, the present Chief Justice of the United States, as late as 1850, is reported to have stated in the Senate, of which he was a member, that he "knew of no remedy in case of the refusal of a state to perform its stipulations," thereby acknowledging the sovereignty and independence of state action. But I will not weary you with the unprofitable discussion. Unprofitable because the judgment of reason has been displaced by the arbitrament of war, waged for the purpose as avowed of maintaining the union of the states. If, therefore, the result of the war is to be considered as having decided that the union of the states is inviolable and perpetual under the constitution, it naturally follows that it is as incompetent for the general government to impair its integrity by the exclusion of a state, as for the states to do so by secession; and that the existence and right of a state by the constitution are as indestructible as the union itself. The legitimate consequence then must be the perfect equality of rights of all the states; the exclusive right of each to regulate its internal affairs under rules established by the constitution, and THE RIGHT OF EACH STATE TO PRESCRIBE FOR ITSELF THE QUALIFICATIONS OF SUFFRAGE. The South has contended only for the supremacy of the constitution, and the just administration of the laws made in pursuance of it. VIRGINIA TO THE LAST MADE GREAT EFFORTS TO SAVE THE UNION, and urged harmony and compromise. Senator Douglas, in his remarks upon the compromise bill recommended by the committee of thirteen in 1861, stated that every member from the South, including Messrs. Toombs and Davis, expressed their willingness to accept the proposition of Senator Crittenden from Kentucky, as a final settlement of the controversy, if sustained by the republican party, and THE ONLY DIFFICULTY IN THE WAY OF AN AMICABLE ADJUSTMENT WAS WITH THE REPUBLICAN PARTY. WHO THEN IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WAR? Although the South would have preferred any honorable compromise to the fratricidal war which has taken place, she now accepts in good faith its constitutional results, and receives without reserve the amendment which has already been made to the constitution for the extinction of slavery. That is an event that has been long sought, though in a different way, and by none has it been more earnestly desired than by the citizens of Virginia. In other respects I trust that the constitution may undergo no change, but that it may be handed down to succeeding generations in the form we received it from our forefathers. The desire I feel that the Southern states should possess the good opinion of one whom I esteem as highly as yourself, has caused me to extend my remarks further than I intended, and I fear it has led me to exhaust your patience. If what I have said should serve to give any information as regards American politics, and enable you to enlighten public opinion as to the true interest of this distracted country, I hope you will pardon its prolixity.

In regard to your inquiry as to my being engaged in preparing a narrative of the campaigns in Virginia, I regret to state that I progress slowly in the collection of the necessary documents for its completion. I particularly feel the loss of the official returns showing the small numbers with which the battles were fought. I have not seen the work of the Prussian officer you mention and therefore cannot speak of his accuracy in this respect—with sentiments of great respect, I remain your obt. Servant,

R. E. LEE.

A BUSINESSLIKE INVENTORY

During the early months of the year most business concerns take stock. They certainly must know what they have to work with, and what they need in addition, to make for greater accomplishment. The church and Sunday school together make the greatest business in the world—greatest in purpose and greatest in extent—and as such should take stock and weigh the needs for years ahead.

Not to carry on a business as efficiently as might be is considered unpardonable waste. So it is in the Lord's work. Unfortunately many Christian men who conduct their own business with utmost efficiency seem to lose their keenness in the churches. They leave everything to the pastor, who is much overworked and whose training is often in other channels. If this little article causes a few business men in the churches to help their ministers with suggestions and plans for the addition of a bell or chimes; of a piano in the Sunday-school room or an organ in the church; of a bulletin board or suitable furniture; of a stereopticon or Bible pictures, and many other such items, our effort will have been worth while.

Often advice is needed in securing such equipment, and this can well be secured by writing to the advertisers of this publication or to Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, 628 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

FOURFOLD.

Helen R. Stetson.

I love Thee, Lord, with all my heart—
So may it warmer glow,
That I may cheer the lonely ones
Who suffer here below.

I love Thee, Lord, with all my soul—
Oh! fill it with Thy grace,
That I may shed abroad Thy love
At every time and place.

I love Thee, Lord, with all my strength—
Give me the "strength of ten",
That striving, I may win the fight
Among my fellow men.

I love Thee, Lord, with all my mind—
So let it keener be,
That I may better understand
What Thou would'st say to me.

Through heart and soul and strength and mind
Reveal to me Thy will,
Until Thy daily plan for me
Shall all my being fill.

CHINESE WORDS.

"How do you do," I say to you
When I meet you on the street,
But "How boo how," the Chinese say
When two of them chance to meet.

"Very good," I say to you
When you've pleased me with a song,
But my Chinese friends would say, "How ting",
In a tone all drawn out long.

"Never mind," I comfort you
When you've broken your prettiest doll,
But Chinese children say, "Boo yow gin",
If their dollies have a fall.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Moses gives precepts; Christ gives practice.

The more godly men are the more human they are.

The biggest coward is the one who is afraid to do right.

"God never sends your checks back marked: Account overdrawn."

"Measure life by loss instead of gain;
Not by the wine drunk, but by the wine poured forth;
For Love's strength stands in Love's sacrifice,
And whoso suffers most has most to give."

Paul was a man you could neither bend nor break. Principle was the rock on which he stood. Faith was the shield his tormentors could not shatter. Great convictions, tested and tempered in many a fire of affliction, wrapped his soul in the peace which passeth all understanding.—Selected.

The comment passed by a critic on a work of art may or may not be a fair judgment on the artist, but it infallibly betrays the qualifications of the critic."
Prof. T. H. Robinson.

"The beauty and the wonder and the power,
The shapes of things, their colors, lights and shades,
Changes, surprises—and God made it all."

Faith elevates the soul not only above sense, and sensible things, but above reason itself. As reason corrects the errors which sense might occasion, so, supernatural faith corrects the errors of material reason.—Archbishop Leighton.

Humility, the fairest loveliest flower
That bloomed in paradise, and the first that died.
It is so frail and delicate a thing
That if it look upon itself it's gone;
And he who ventures to esteem it his Shows by that very thought he has it not.
—C. Fry.

There must be a serene commitment of the soul to the strong keeping of the Eternal God. He committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously. This is the way of peace, as this is the way of victory. If ever the enemy is to be conquested this must be the mode of conquest.—J. H. Jowett.

We are persuaded that we and all Christian people must seek a more heroic practice of the Gospel. It cannot be that our present complacency and moderation are a faithful expression of the mind of Christ and of the meaning of His Cross and Resurrection in the midst of the wrong and want and sin of our modern world.—From the address of the Jerusalem Council to The Churches.

Men do not complain of the sixth commandment which protects their persons; nor of the eighth which protects their property; why, then, should they complain of the fourth; which protects their rightful heritage, a weekly day of rest?—Eugene Stock.

PUBLICITY

"In public print a woman's name is but twice allowed—Once when in her wedding gown, once when in her shroud."

Nobody knows who wrote that, nor when it was written. It reads like an outburst of feminine indignation and exasperation; but it expresses the rule prevalent in the South and several other parts of this country until the seventies. It was carried to ridiculous extremes. Women who were doing useful public work, leading and managing charitable, religious, educational enterprises, dared not sign even notices of meetings of their organizations. When officers of such organizations were chosen the fact of election was communicated to local newspapers, but names were omitted. Actresses, traveling public lecturers and "plain people" were exceptions; but as nobody liked to be classed with the "plain people" the newspaper editor who published the name of a local woman, except in cases of marriage, death, serious accident or actual tragedy or a trip to Europe—a vast event not so many years ago—took chances of painful personal consequences. Until about seventy-five years back women always were alluded to collectively in American newspapers as "females"—so many females in the audience or congregation, or aboard train or boat to which something happened. Now we have run to the opposite extreme, just as absurd in display of names and pictures as the exaggerated suppression and reticence of 1829, 1854, 1870.

Men have craved and found publicity since the beginning. Long before the invention of printing appeared persons, of whom we catch brief glimpses, who, like Theudas and Judas, alluded to casually in the fifth chapter of Acts, boasted themselves to be somebody; and like Korah, Dathan and Abiram, leading revolt against Moses, sought prominence. In secular history of all civilized countries all kinds of men, from kings and emperors to peasants and clowns, have surrendered dignity and decency and self-respect and invited dangers and penalties that they might be talked about and acclaimed. Among the savages and hopeless barbarians every tribe has had members who by extraordinarily grotesque and elaborate painting or tattooing, or by pretensions to oratory or proclamations of personal prowess, have sought advertisement and admiration. Now this old tendency has become a kind of disease, prevalent in both sexes. Every weekly in the country prints, week after week, the names of the same men and women in connection with the life and activities of the neighborhood. The dailies cater to the desire assiduously. Observation of them suggests that a considerable proportion of the scandalous divorces and quick marriages of the divorced, parades of immoralities and shameful and atrocious blasphemies, indecencies and vulgarities, are results of morbid appetite for publicity, of eagerness to be photographed, pictured, discussed, paraded before the public regardless of how discreditable and disgraceful the display may be.

A man who died in Paris a few days ago was a curious and instructive example. Through several years of the last decade of the nineteenth century he gave all his time and effort and such small intellect as he had to putting his name in the newspapers. With little education and slight mental equipment and supposed to be earning his living as agent for a popular brand of wine, he contrived to thrust himself into the lead of that dull galaxy of snobbery known as New York City's "Four Hundred". He postured and clowned daily, gave parties in honor of monkeys, went about with a parrot on one shoulder, worked to introduce novelties and eccentricities into what the news writers described as high society. Doubtless he was delighted by the many thousands of words and feet of space given to his sayings and doings and performances. He was a kind of reproduction, on a reduced scale, of men of generations ahead of him, like Beau Brummel, in England, Beau Hickman, in Washington City. They are remembered only with slightly amused contempt. This more recent man dropped from sight, suddenly and completely as Korah, swallowed by the earth, Theudas, slain with his followers. He has not been heard of in nearly thirty years His name is familiar to none but the elderly people and they recall him with vague derision. While he strove for publicity the presidents and cabinet officers and governors and judges and leaders of thought and action of the present day were working quietly and obscurely to fit themselves for real work and to win permanent honor and high places in history.

A later instance is the man from Smith College, Massachusetts, who put himself on the front pages by blatant declaration that the idea of sin must be relegated to the abandoned theories and that all the accepted religions and beliefs in the supernatural are false. He was rebuked and repudiated by scientists who described his utterances as impudent and irrelevant intrusion on serious, useful and sensible discussion; but he has had his little day of glory. For the moment he emerges from obscurity into the limelight and sees his name and picture broadcast. And it is safe to predict that within a year he, too, will be forgotten and will relapse to oblivion, to be recalled, if at all, with scornful smile and comment. Meanwhile, men and women, destined for honorable and enduring places in future history and others whose vastly useful and beautiful work will be recorded only in the annals of Heaven, are going quietly and modestly onward, preparing for or achieving splendid practical results.

While the pot boils froth and scum are thrown to the top. We are in a bubbling, busy time of progress, reaction, adjustment to new conditions and developments, in this country facing the vital tests of unexampled growth of power and prosperity. We will settle presently to discretion, dignity, wise understanding of real meanings and values. It is the story of humanity that follies cure themselves. We have outgrown and outlived the extreme and ludicrous timidity and caution of the publications of the past. We will outlive and outgrow the audacity and recklessness of our present journalism, the constant forcing upon us of the immoralities of persons supposed to be in high place and of the persistent bids for notice and prominence of cheap, vain, vulgar, tawdry people. We will arrive at the decent chronicling of the really interesting and important acts and words of people who really are interesting and important in religious, political, commercial, social and professional life. As the inevitable change comes, with the gradual gains of good sense and good taste, we can find honest amusement in the antics and endeavors of the diligent publicity seekers and go on, peacefully and modestly, doing what good we can find to do. attending faithfully to our own affairs of labor and pleasure, realizing that pursuit of publicity, for mere publicity is one of the most undignified, unfruitful, useless and belittling enterprises in which benumbed and benighted humanity can engage.

ORGANIZING THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

A special General Convention was held in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, October 30 to November 3, 1821, to consider action on a legacy of $60,000 left by Jacob Sherrard, of New York City, to an Episcopal Theological Seminary to be instituted in New York by the General Convention or the Convention of the diocese. Lawyers of equal eminence differed regarding proper use of the money. It was determined to concentrate the seminaries in New York. Bishop White says the chief opposition was from the gentlemen from Virginia, with whom it was a favorite idea to establish a chair of theology at William and Mary College.

ELEVENTH REGULAR CONVENTION.

The eleventh regular Convention met at Philadelphia May 23 to 26, 1823, with nine bishops present, including Bishop Ravenscroft, of North Carolina, who was consecrated at the beginning of the session, two being absent. Recommendations of Bishop Chase, of Ohio, that communicants of the Church be forbidden from attending theatrical performances and that none but communicants be eligible for election as delegates to Church Conventions were disposed of by compromise recommendations. The Church of Georgia was admitted to membership. A committee of three bishops, six clergymen and seven laymen was appointed to revise the psalms and hymns to be sung in churches and a standard edition of the Bible was adopted. It was a busy, brief, session. The report on the theological seminary was adopted and organization of the missionary society was completed. The slavery question cropped up slightly with a proposal to send delegates to the American Colonization Society, formed to transport freed slaves to Liberia. The Convention, while expressing sympathy with the objects, declared that the question was more of political than of religious nature, and declined the invitation. Trustees for the theological seminary were nominated. A committee was appointed to enquire and report on religious teaching in the colleges and universities of the country and to report on the practicability of establishing seminaries for education of youth under the influence of the Church.

MISSISSIPPI ADMITTED.

At the Convention of 1826, November 7 to 15, in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, Mississippi was formally admitted to membership. All bishops were present but Bishop Moore, of Virginia, who had been overtaken by dangerous illness at Hartford. Bishop Bowen, of South Carolina, consecrated since the last Convention, preached the opening sermon, and Dr. Wilmer, of Virginia, presided over the lower House. Provision was made for abbreviation of the services when circumstances made it expedient and changes in the confirmation services to meet doctrinal scruples were authorized. A report on the theological seminary described as "satisfactory" was presented. The committee on hymns and the psalms in metre was continued, its work being incomplete.

KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE.

At the Convention of 1829, Philadelphia, August 12 to 20, Kentucky and Tennessee were admitted. Two days were spent in discussion of the consecration of Dr. William Meade as assistant Bishop of Virginia, the Convention of that State having voted to present him with the provision that his consecration should not entitle him to succeed Bishop Moore as full bishop of the diocese. This reservation was objected to strongly. The delegates from Virginia promised that the reservation should be withdrawn at the next Diocesan Convention and Dr. Meade was consecrated in St. James' Church, Philadelphia, October 19. Seven changes in canons were agreed upon.

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

I KINGS.

The Name of these books called "Kings" suggests something of the history here recorded, God's dealing with Israel from "the throne".

Subject.

The Holy Spirit records in this book the wonderful glory of the God-appointed kings and kingdom of Israel, and how this glory was dragged into the dust through the sins of kings and people.

I. Chs. 1-11. The glorious kingdom of Solomon, ending like a bright day with the sun setting behind a cloud.

1. Chs. 1-4. Solomon established on the throne of his father David with surpassing wisdom and wealth.

2. Chs. 5-8. The Temple of the Lord built and dedicated and filled with the glory of the Lord.

3. Chs. 9-11. The glory and shame of the wisest and wealthiest king.

II. Chs. 12-16. Decline of the glory of the throne from the division of the kingdom unto the rebuilding of Jericho.

1. Ch. 12. Division of the kingdom and establishing idolatry in northern Israel.

2. Chs. 13, 14. Doom of the idolatry at Bethel announced and death of Jereboam and Rehoboam.

3. Chs. 15, 16. The downward steps of kings and people, warring with each other and worshipping Baal, in spite of God's wrath and mercy.

III. Chs. 17-22. The Lord's faithful testimony through Elijah, whose name means "My God is Jehovah".

1. Ch. 17. The Lord's care for Elijah during the three and one half years of judgment upon Israel.

2. Chs. 18, 19. The Lord's testimony on Mount Carmel, destruction of false prophets, and the "still small voice".

3. Chs. 20-22. The Lord's judgment of Ahab, the founder of Baal worship in Israel.

A CONTINENT-WIDE BIBLE CRUSADE

A Movement for a Million Testaments for the Latin-American Lands of Central and South America, Mexico and the West Indies.

By George T. B. Davis

THE blessing of God rested upon the nation-wide distribution of New Testaments in China in such a signal manner, that a campaign has now been started for the careful and prayerful circulation of a million copies of the New Testament in the Latin-American lands of Central and South America, Mexico and the West Indies. The plan is not merely the circulation of a million Testaments; but to water the Word with such a great volume of prevailing prayer that a great spiritual awakening will sweep over the Latin-American Republics.

The darkness of the past centuries in Latin-America is due to their being deprived of the Word of God. Four hundred years ago Spanish and Portuguese adventurers went to South America seeking for GOLD. Three hundred years ago British and Dutch pilgrims went to North America seeking for GOD.

The results that have followed from the Spanish and Portuguese lusting for gold, and the British and Dutch seeking first the Kingdom of God, have been without a parallel in the world's history. In South America—darkness and superstition and ignorance. In North America—unparalleled prosperity, and all the multiplied blessings that come from an open Bible.

Now is the hour of opportunity to inaugurate a great Bible campaign for the enlightenment of the Latin-American nations. After four hundred years of darkness the dawn is breaking. One after another of the Republics have proclaimed religious liberty. But the political release is only the first step. Now they need spiritual freedom. Most of the 90,000,000 inhabitants of Latin-America are still in darkness. They are groping about in superstition without the lamp of the Word to guide their footsteps. Their souls are starving for the Bread of Life.

A missionary in South America who is a British Professor of Philosophy, and who gave up all to preach Christ, recently declared that there is scarcely an anti-Christian book published in Europe, that is not reprinted at once in Spanish in South America; but he said that in spite of all the difficulties of the work there is a great hunger after higher things in those lands.

It is only the Word of God that can dispel the darkness and bring blessing and true prosperity to the peoples of Latin-America. A year or two ago an American traveler, Mr. L. L. Legters, was making a tour of exploration in Mexico to seek to discover how to bring the Gospel to Indian tribes that had never been reached by a missionary. Away in the interior he came to an Indian town and was amazed to find a church of nearly three hundred believers. In telling the story of his trip, in the Sunday School Times, Mr. Legters gave the explanation of his remarkable discovery. He said:

"We were the first missionaries who had ever visited the town. How did it come, then, that this large group of believers were gathered here? Nine years before an old Indian had heard the Gospel while away from home. Some one had given him a Spanish Gospel. When he returned home, a nephew had learned a little Spanish, so the old uncle pressed him into service. As he read the Good News, he would hurry with the lad to a neighbor to share it with him. As a result of this kind of work there were nearly three hundred believers in this Indian town—more than half of the village were real Christians when we visited there."

The reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society contain striking examples of the power of the Word of God to transform and transfigure lives in Latin-America. An experienced missionary told a Secretary of the British and Foreign Society in Brazil that he felt led to offer a copy of the Scriptures to any one who was desirous of reading the book. Then the missionary made this striking statement: "In every case the person who received the book had been led to Christ."

A Colporteur, laboring in Venezuela, sent this striking testimony of the power of the Word to the British and Foreign Bible Society: "Some two years ago we were allowed to place six Bibles and twelve New Testaments in the Leper Asylum at La Guaira. Early last year Colporteur Rivera was permitted to visit this Leper Asylum with his Books and to speak to the inmates. He found forty of them were professing Christians."

The British and Foreign Bible Society reports the striking words of the President of Chili when he was presented with a copy of the Bible several years ago by the Evangelical Churches of Chili and the Bible Society. In accepting the gift he said: "I am a Christian. I believe in the doctrines of Christ. I drink the waters of the crystal fountain, but not the turbid waters of the swamps. I receive the health-giving doctrines of the Bible. This Book which you have presented to me will ever be with me. It will be my guide, and will be appreciated at its full value."

A colporteur of the British and Foreign Bible Society laboring in Argentine, wrote: "I entered a barber's shop and offered him a Bible; but he replied, 'Thanks be to God, I have one'. When I asked how he obtained the Book, he told me the following story: 'In the review called El Mundo Argentino, I read an announcement recommending readers to obtain the Gospels or the New Testament in order to ascertain the teaching of Jesus Christ. I ordered the four Gospels, which pleased me. Then I ordered a complete Bible.' His wife came up to us, and it was wonderful to listen to the simple testimony of this couple as to their conversion through reading the Bible only, without having attended any evangelical meeting."

In speaking of the value of spreading the Word of God in Brazil, a traveler wrote to the American Bible Society: "Brazil as a field for Bible distribution becomes more and more attractive every year. Its immense area adds to the difficulties of travel,, but perhaps there is no country in the world from which there comes such a wealth of testimony to the power of the printed Bible circulated in advance of the preacher of the Gospel."

One of the Secretaries of the American Bible Society, who is stationed in Brazil, gives a glowing testimony to the power of the Word of God in that land. He says: "From missionaries of various denominations I received striking testimonies to the value of the work of Bible distribution in that land. Many churches, now vigorous and growing, trace their origin to a single copy of the Scriptures carried far beyond the range of the missionary, and making for itself a lodging in some believing heart. The Bible in Brazil is good seed falling upon good ground and bringing forth fruit abundantly."

There are millions and millions in Latin-America who have never seen a copy of the Word of God; and great multitudes who do not even know of the existence of such a Book! Mrs. Harry Strachan, of the Latin-American Evangelization Society writes: "Our duty is to give the Word of God to the people who do not have it. No one can say more than a small proportion of the people have either seen or heard of a Bible. There are few children of school age that cannot read and write."

This is surely the providential moment to give the people the Word of God in their own language. Our aim is a continent-wide crusade to reach all ages and classes quickly with the Word watered by a great volume of believing prayer. The plan is to present neat pocket Testaments, through the missionaries, pastors and others, to students, officials, professional men, and the various classes who will agree to read them.

Most of the Testaments will be printed in Spanish and Portuguese, which are the chief languages of Latin-America; while others will be printed in various Indian dialects. The Testaments are attractively bound in blue-purple pluviusin, with one or more picture, so that the very sight of the neat little Book will make one long to possess and to read it.

Surely now is the time for Christians throughout the world to concentrate their prayers upon Latin-America in order that a mighty spiritual awakening may sweep over the land. Mr. and Mrs. Harry Strachan have recently sent out an urgent appeal for intercessory prayer on behalf of Latin-America. They say: "Never before has there been such a magnificent opportunity, such a wide-open door. We have reason to believe that God is ready to initiate a great spiritual awakening that will stir the continent, and which may really constitute Latin-America's last opportunity. On this prayer campaign to which you are called hangs, perhaps, the destiny of a continent—millions of souls whose destiny is at stake."

We wish to place quickly in the hands of God's children a quarter of a million prayer cards giving suggestions for intercession for God's blessing on the production and distribution of the Testaments; for an outpouring of God's Spirit upon the missionaries, pastors and workers; and that the hearts of the unsaved may be tender and receptive to the Word of God and the Gospel. Will you not send for a supply of these prayer cards to pass on to others to help in enlisting a great volume of believing prayer for these lands that have so long lain in darkness? The cards will be sent free of cost on application to The Million Testament Campaign, 323 North Thirteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Each one who reads these lines, no matter in what land you may reside, can have a very real share in helping in the Million Testament Campaign for Latin-America, and in the evangelization of those lands. King David declared that those who tarried by the stuff shared alike with those who went forth to the conflict. Hence, in the privacy of your homes you can help in opening the windows of heaven in the neglected continent. Will you not determine, with God's help, to spend a little time daily, alone or with others, in intercessory prayer for God's blessing upon the Million Testament Campaign, and for a great spiritual awakening?

ROBERT E. LEE

By the Late John W. Daniel, LL. D.

Washington Academy and Washington College.

SHORTLY after the close of the Revolutionary War, the Legislature of Virginia, in token of esteem and admiration for the virtues and services of General George Washington, donated him one hundred shares of stock in the Old James River Company. General Washington, in a characteristic manner, declined to accept the donation save only on the condition that he be permitted to appropriate it to some public purpose "in the upper part of the State", such as " the education of the children of the poor, particularly the children of such as have fallen in defense of the country". The condition granted, President Washington, in 1796—for he had then become President of the New Republic—dedicated the one hundred shares of stock "to the use of Liberty Hall Academy in Rockbridge County". Mayhap the friendship between William Graham, its principal, and his old class-mate at Princeton, "Light Horse Harry Lee", the friend of Washington, had something to do in guiding the benefaction; but be this as it may, it was given and accepted, and in honor of the benefactor the academy was clothed with his immortal name.

In acknowledging the thanks expressed to him by the Board of Trustees, President Washington said: "To promote literature in this rising empire and to encourage the arts has ever been amongst the warmest wishes of my heart; and if the donation which the generosity of the Legislature of the Commonwealth has enabled me to bestow upon Liberty Hall—now, by your politeness, called Washington Academy—is likely to prove a means to accomplish these ends, it will contribute to the gratification of my desires."

Soon after this, the Legislature, which had already incorporated the institution on a comprehensive basis, gave it the name of "The College of Washington in Virginia"—name, however, which the trustees did not accept until 1812*. In the spirit of their beloved commander, "The Cincinnati Society", composed of survivors of the Revolutionary War, on dissolving in 1803, donated their funds, amounting to nearly $25,000, to the institution which had received his patronage and bore his name; and, thus endowed, it went forward in a career which, for nearly threescore years and ten, was a period of uninterrupted usefulness, prosperity and honor.

All ranks of honorable enterprise and ambition "in this rising empire" felt the impress of the noble spirits who came forth from its halls, trained and equipped for life's arduous tasks with keenest weapons and brightest armor. What glowing names are these that shine on the rolls of the alumni of this honored Alma Mater! Church and State, Field and Forum, Bar and Bench, Hospital and Counting-Room, Lecture-Room and Pulpit—what famous champions and teachers of the right, what trusty workers and leaders in literature and law, and arts, and arms, have they not found in her sons! Seven Governors of States—amongst them Crittenden, of Kentucky, and McDowell, Letcher, and Kemper, of Virginia; eleven United States Senators—amongst them Parker, of Virginia; Breckinridge, of Kentucky; H. S. Foote, of Mississippi, and William C. Preston, of South Carolina; more than a score of Congressmen, two-score and more of judges—amongst them Trimble, of the United States Supreme Court; Coalter, Allen, Anderson, and Burks, of the Court of Appeals of Virginia; twelve or more college presidents, and amongst them Moses Hoge and Archibald Alexander, of Hampden-Sidney; James Priestly, of Cumberland College, Tennessee; and G. A. Baxter and Henry Ruffner (who presided here), and Socrates Maupin, of the University of Virginia. These are but a few of those who here garnered the learning that shed so gracious a light in the aftertime on them, their country and their Alma Mater. And could I pause to speak of those who became valiant leaders of men in battle, I could name many a noble soldier whose eye greets mine today; and, alas! I should recall the form of many a hero who passed from these halls in the flush of youthful manhood, and has long slept with "the unreturning brave"; for in 1861, when the call to arms resounded, "The Liberty-Hall Volunteers"—the students of Washington College—were among the first (and in a body) to respond; and when the quiet professor of your twin institute was baptized in history as "Stonewall Jackson", their blood o'erflowed the christening urn and reddened Manassas' field, and from Manassas to Appomattox, under Joseph E. Johnston, and Thomas J. Jackson, and Robert E. Lee, the boys and the men of Washington College proved that they were worthy of their leaders, worthy of their State and country, and worthy of all good fame.

The Fate of War.

Unsparing war spared not the shrine where breathed into the arts of peace, yet lived the spirit and was perpetuated the name of the Father of his Country. When in 1864 David Hunter led an invading army against the State from whose blood he sprung, he came not as comes the noble champion eager to strike the strong, and who realizes that he meets an equal and a generous foe. Lee had penetrated the year before to the heart of Pennsylvania, and the Southern infantry had bivouacked on the banks of the Susequehanna.

When he crossed the Pennsylvania line, he had announced in general orders, from the headquarters of the Army of Northern Virginia, that he did not come to "take vengeance"; that "we make war only upon armed men", and he therefore "earnestly exhorted the troops to abstain with most scruplous care from unnecessary or wanton injury of private property", and "enjoining upon all officers to arrest and bring to summary punishment all who should in any way offend against the orders on the subject". He had been obeyed by his lieutenants and his men. No charred ruins, no devastated fields, no plundered homes marked the line of his march. On one occasion, to set a good example, he was seen to dismount from his horse put up a farmer's fence. In the city of York General Early had in general orders prohibited the burning of buildings containing stores of war, lest fire might be communicated to neighboring homes; and General Gordon, in his public address, had declared: "If a torch is applied to a single dwelling, or an insult offered to a female of your town by a soldier of this command, point me out the man, and you shall have his life". The battle of Gettysburg had raged around Gettysburg College, but when it ended the college stood scathless, save by the accidents of war. But when David Hunter invaded Virginia, he came to make war on the weak and helpless, and he was as ruthless to ruin as he was swift to evade battle and to retreat. He blistered the land which he should have loved and honored, and a broad, black path marked his trail. From the summit of those mountains where Spotswood first spied the Valley, could be counted at one time the flames ascending from one hundred and eighteen burning houses. The Virginia Military Institute was burned, and the very statue of Washington, which adorned it, was carried off as a trophy. Washington College was dismantled, its scientific apparatus destroyed, its library sacked, its every apartment pillaged. The hand of war indeed fell heavily here, and when the Southern cause went down at Appomattox, Washington College remained scarce more than a ruinous and desolate relic of better days. Four professors, a handful of students, and the bare buildings, were all that was left of it.

President of Washington College.

In August, 1865, the trustees of Washington College met. The situation they contemplated was deplorable and de-

*In 1796 the Legislature of Virginia undertook to erect the Academy into a College under the name of "College of Washington". The board of trustees resisted the enactment as an infringement of the rights of the corporation; and their grave and forcible protest was said by the late Hugh Blair Grigsby, in an address delivered in 1870, to have been the basis of the brief of Mr. Webster in the great Dartmouth College case. The act was repealed in response to this remonstrance. The name of Washington College was finally adopted in 1812.

pressing. Their invested funds were unproductive. Their treasury was empty. The State was prostrate and bankrupt. In the sky of the future there was scarcely a ray of light. But they were resolved to face difficulties and to do the best they could. One of the trustees, Colonel Bolivar Christian, of Staunton, suggested that General Lee be invited to accept the Presidency of the Institution. There was but little anticipation that he would incline to their wishes. The position could not be very remunerative—it involved tedious and perplexing tasks, and it did not seem commensurate with the abilities, nor altogether fitting to the tastes of a great commander who had so long dealt with the vast and active concerns of military life; but the suggestion was unanimously adopted, and Hon. John W. Brockenbrough, rector of the Board, was appointed to apprise General Lee of the fact. At first General Lee hesitated. He modestly distrusted his own competency to fulfill the trust, and he feared that the hostility of the Government towards him might direct adverse influences against the Institution which it was proposed to commit to his care. These considerations being successfully combatted by those who knew how high his qualifications were, and how great were his attractions, General Lee accepted the position tendered him, and on the second of October, 1865, he took the oath of office before the Rev. W. S. White, the oldest Christian minister of Lexington—and was duly installed in the presence of the trustees, professors, and students, as President of the Washington College. On the eve of acceptance, two propositions were made to General Lee: one to become President of a large corporation, with a salary of $10,000 per annum; another to take the like office in another corporation, with a salary of $50,000. But he had made up his mind to come here, and this is what he said to a friend who brought him the last munificent offer:

"I have a self-imposed task which I must accomplish. I have led the young men of the South in battle; I have seen many of them fall under my standard. I shall devote my life now to training young men to do their duty in life."

This was the high resolve that brought him here, and Robert E. Lee seemed to be the great, heroic Captain when he stood before the Virginia Convention with superb courage and dauntless mien, and "devoted his sword to his native State", he seemed informed with a spirit that gathered its strength and loveliness from Heaven, when he stood here and consecrated his remaining years to training up to life's duties, the sons, brothers and comrades of those who had followed him in battle. Young men of the South! to him who thus stood by us, we owe a debt immeasurable, and as long as our race is upon earth, let our children and our children's children hold that debt sacred.

General Lee's Administration as College President.

General Lee was eminently qualified for the task assumed. His own education had been liberal and thorough. In his youth he had been grounded by his tutors in a knowledge of ancient history, and of the dead languages, the Latin and the Greek, and the tastes thus early stimulated had been preserved and cultivated in after years. As a cadet at West Point, he graduated second in a distinguished class, excellence of conduct and excellence of attainment going hand in hand. Appointed an officer of Engineers when he entered the army, and often charged with most important works, the duties devolved upon him required assiduous study and research. Still later, after he returned with great distinction from Mexico, he became the Superintendent and Head of the Military Academy at West Point, and occupying that position for three years, he acquired experience and developed capacities which singularly fitted him for the sphere which he now entered—the training of youth. It is indicative of his comprehensive views of education, that during his superintendency at West Point, the course of study was extended to five years and greatly enlarged in its scope. And when he entered upon his duties here, it was soon evident that he possessed every qualification to direct with signal success, the affairs of the Institution, and to mould the characters and minds of those confided to his care.

It was understood from the time of his inauguration that he would not himself act as teacher of any class; but would have in charge the business and financial concerns of the College—its educational curriculum, and the discipline of its students; and from first to last, he devoted himself to these tasks with unceasing assiduity and success.

Everything here felt with his presence a renovating and progressive impulse. Nothing escaped his attention, from the smallest detail of business to the gravest question of educational policy; and in whatever concerned the well-being of the College, its Faculty and its students, his discerning judgment and sympathetic heart worked out the right result. Under his supervision the buildings were repaired, the accommodations enlarged, the chemical and philosophical apparatus replaced, the library replenished and reformed. He it was who selected the site of yon Chapel which now guard his mortal remains—his was the hand that draughted the plan, and his the eye that saw its parts conjoined together. No figure-head was he, but a worker, and doer, bringing things to pass as they should be.

Prior to his administration, there were but five Chairs of Instruction, several Departments being combined under one professional head:

1. Mental and Moral Science, and Political Economy.
2. Latin Language and Literature.
3. Greek Language and Literature.
4. Mathematics and Physical Science.
5. Chemistry and Natural Philosophy.

Speedily after his accession, three new Chairs were added, and Professors elected to fill them; the Chair of Natural Philosophy, embracing, in addition to Physics, Acoustics, Optics, Etc., the various subjects of Natural and Applied Mechanics; the Chair of Applied Mechanics, embracing Astronomy, Civil and Military Engineering; and Chair of Modern Languages, to which was added English Philosophy. In the second year of his incumbency the Chair of History and English Literature was established, and soon afterwards the department of "Law and Equity", under that eminent jurist, Judge John W. Brockenbrough.

Several other Chairs were included in the President's program, one of the "English Language", one of "Applied Chemistry", and also, "A School of Medicine", a "School of Journalism" and a "School of Commerce"—the latter being designed to give special instruction and sympathetic training in whatever pertained to business in the most enlarged sense of the term. Amongst other changes introduced by General Lee was the substitution of the elective system instead of a fixed curriculum; and the system of discipline which he adopted, in nowise partaking of the military type, to which it might have been supposed his disposition would incline—was that which has so long prospered at the University of Virginia; a system which ignored espionage and compulsion, and put every student upon a manly sense of honor—a system which, especially with young men not too immature to appreciate it, and which, with all men who have the capacity of being gentlemen, is the best calculated to develop the virtuous and independent elements of character. Here for five years the General devoted himself to the cause of education, and here under him that cause nobly flourished. Here he demonstrated that comprehensive grasp of every subject connected with his sphere: and the keen apprehension of the demands of this progressive age, and of a land entering as it were upon a new birth. His associates in the Faculty loved him as a father, and all who saw or knew his work, with common voice proclaimed the conviction expressed by one of the most distinguished of his associates, that he was "the best College President that this country has ever produced".

His work has been established, and though the great Chief has "fallen by the way" one who bears his name, and who is worthy of it, has taken up the lines that fell from his hands; and under him, with God's blessing, the good cause goes on prospering and to prosper.

And so happily it has come to pass that the little school of the pioneers, planted in the wilderness, is today a great university; that the ambition of William Graham, the college mate of Henry Lee, has been realized beyond its sweetest dream; that the college which the Father of his Country lifted up by his generosity from a struggling academy to educate the children of those who had fallen in its defense, and which was blighted to the verge of destruction, has been restored and magnified by the hand of him who alone of all men, living or dead, now equally shares with his illustrious prototype, the eulogy pronounced by his own sire, Light Horse Harry Lee:

"First in Peace, first in War, and first in the hearts of his Countrymen."

Lee the Man—His Personal Appearance.

Thus feebly and imperfectly have I attempted to trace the military achievements and services of him to whose memory this day is dedicated. Lee the General, stands abreast with the greatest captains of all time, and Lee the Patriot, has universal homage. It is now of Lee the Man, that I would speak:

In personal appearance, General Lee was a man whom once to see was ever to remember. His figure was tall, erect, well proportioned, lithe and graceful. A fine head, with broad, uplifted brow, and features boldly, but yet delicately chiseled, bore the high aspect of one born to command. The firm yet mobile lips, and the thick-set jaw, were expressive of daring and resolution; and the dark scintillant eye flashed with the light of a brilliant intellect and a fearless spirit. His whole countenance, indeed, bespoke alike a powerful mind, and indomitable will, yet beamed with charity, gentleness and benevolence. In his manners, quiet reserve, unaffected courtesy and native dignity, made manifest the character of one who can only be described by the name of gentleman. And taken all in all, his presence possessed that grave and simple majesty which commanded instant reverence and repressed familiarity; and yet so charmed by a certain modesty and gracious deference, that reverence and confidence were ever ready to kindle into affection. It was impossible to look upon him, and not to recognize at a glance that in him, nature gave assurance of a man created great and good.

Mounted in the field, and at the head of his troops, a glimpse of Lee was an inspiration. His figure was as distinctive as that of Napoleon. Ah! soldiers! who can forget it? The black slouch hat, the cavalry boots, the dark cape, the plain gray coat without an ornament, but the three stars on the collar, the calm, victorious face, the splendid, manly figure on the gray warhorse, that steps as if proudly conscious of his rider; he looked every inch the true knight—the grand, invincible champion of a great principle.

WHAT IS HAPPENING IN CALVARY CHURCH IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK

By A. S. R., a Member of the Staff

HOW does a lay person do it? I am asked that a dozen times in a hunter's moon. How does a clergyman do it? I was asked that in one week by four Episcopal clergymen, a Methodist parson, and a Presbyterian minister. All of these men had known a personal God for as long as they could remember, but each one of them frankly saw that while they had "helped" people, they had never brought one to an experience of Him. I ought to be very humble before these folk by all human reckonings, but although I have only known Him for two years, I have learned at Calvary how to do the things that they could not do. About what I know from experience, I can be sure.

All my life the first lesson and the second lesson, the Epistle and the Gospel have flowed over me, but have never caught anywhere. The Old Testament affected me much as Frost or Masefield did. I ranked the Acts with poems of Browning. No one of them all, affected my conduct. Then through knowing people whose lives had been changed and through knowing the stories of others farther afield—I made with the help of a member of the fellowship, the decision that they had made—to surrender my will to God and to seek and obey His guidance. The Bible came alive and the historical Christ, whom I had known in much the same fashion that I had known Abraham Lincoln or St. Francis of Assisi, became the living Christ.

The emphasis of the group lies in sharing one's own experience. I hadn't any theology to share, but I knew what had happened to me. Any one could down me by quoting a verse from the Bible in argument, for I have a poor memory, but nobody could down me on what I had seen, drunks made sober, thieves made honest, lazy men made active for Him, wilful men seeking His will, not theirs. I squared my shoulders, a little rounded by over fifty years of living, and quickened my step.

How is it done at Calvary? Forgive me if I speak only from experience. It is done in other places I know, but I can only testify to what I have seen.

The other day with forty members of the fellowship, I was the guest of the wife of a distinguished lawyer at lunch. After food there was to be a meeting. "I hope you won't think it rude if my husband does not join us," our hostess said to one of us. "He thinks the whole thing emotional and unreal." By a chance they knew and liked some of my family. I learned that the host was a supporter of a politician with whom I had had an interesting interview, that he was a pacifist. My Mother was a Quaker. The first fact brought me welcome, and I found myself greeted with warm courtesy when I arrived. The problem was to establish confidence in me as an individual. It was necessary to show my host that an evangelical Christian wasn't a bore. The second fact managed that for me and I found the host who "might" not lunch with us, on my right at table. We had a gay time, which took a deeper note as we spoke of the war and he learned that I believed in non-resistance. After lunch the spiritual eyebrows of the crowd went up, although the physical ones stayed down, when the host who had not been bored, came to the meeting and listened with real interest. I could have talked about religion for the first hour with him, but if I had my fish would have gone down stream. The way is paved with him and his wife for a real interview later as a result of the meeting.

I know one boy was caught because his companion was willing to mark time talking about sport for an hour or two; another by our enthusiasm for social case work. Every scrap of tact, humor, intelligence, knowledge, charm, that we have, belongs to His work. Whatever we have and are was given to us for this end only. Even our clothing matters, for it must not separate us from either rich or poor: it ought to be becoming and suitable enough to attract a millionaire, and simple enough so that a shop girl feels at home as she looks at it. One of the most comfortable moments I have ever had was when a young working girl gave me the address of a shop where she had bought for $11.50 the charming gown she wore, because "their clothes look like you". So much for the first step in conversion, the establishing of friendly, warm confidence.

The second is usually to make the person you are with realize that you have something, a confidence, an inner joy, which they lack. Here comes the necessity of sharing experience. This requires guidance. A lot of things have happened to you: which ones of them will open the heart of your companion? I was talking to a church worker not long ago and I didn't seem to get anywhere. Then it came to share the story of an old sin long hidden. She turned to me with tears in her eyes and told me that she had grown so unhappy over the aridness of her work that for two years she had thought of suicide as the way out. "I couldn't have told you," she said, "if you hadn't talked about yourself as you did. I couldn't have told you if I hadn't realized that there ran an undercurrent of prayer through what you said."

Without sustaining prayer and the silent, almost unconscious cry for guidance that goes up during an interview, we cannot help any one toward conversion. I must be conscious of my own gratitude to God and my humble, absolute dependence on Him in working with another human being, or He cannot be made real to the other person.

After sharing experience which is confession of sin, must come conviction of sin. No man can really convict another of sin, that is the work of the Holy Spirit; but he can help him to see himself. The next step is the apprehension of Christ, the cure, that in His love He will so guide us that the desire for that particular sin is taken away. But before a guided life is possible, there must come the absolute surrender of the will to the will of God. I have always been a strong willed person and when I was told that this was what I must do, I rebelled.

"My will is all I have," I said; "whatever I have gotten from life has come because I have known what I wanted and gone after it. I can't give it up."

A weak willed person once said to me:

"I have never had the sand to carry through anything. How can I carry through God's will?" Fear of whatever may happen after surrender in the next morning or the next year, is none of our business. If we let God guide us He will make His will ours, whether we are arrogant or weak. But the surrender, to be complete, must not only involve the whole, but such parts as we can see at the time. A dishonest person must surrender specifically dishonesty, whether that involves property or attitudes. A person of unclean life must surrender not only unclean acts, but unclean thoughts—"whosoever committeth adultery in his heart," we are told, and the heart must be reckoned with as well as the body. A successful priest of our church told me of a long established sin of his which he had occasionally conquered. He had to surrender that, but his great surrender lay in the surrender of his atheistic unbelief that God could give him complete victory. He had adored Christ always since a boyhood experience before confirmation, but he had never known Him as the cure of sin. He had loved, but without faith.

Nothing that I have said implies that when we let God take us in hand, our responsibility ceases. As we try to live the guided life, new surrenders of specific sins come. But the fact of the first decision remains, and it is against the background of that, that we are able to keep our further path clear.

It requires no special attainments to help other people to surrender, to conversion, as that moment is usually called. You can do it, every one of you who read these words, cleric or layman that you may be, but before you can help others to this point, you must have lived through it yourself.

"Thanks be to God that giveth us the victory" is not only poetry, but experience.

With Dean and Lady Agusta Stanley in Italy

J. deHart Bruen.

It was a beautiful night in June 1871, and as I looked down upon the waves and watched the dancing moons in the water, I realized that I was going, as a stranger into strange lands. Fifty years before my grandfather—a young lawyer of twenty-seven, had provided himself, before crossing the Atlantic, with a pocket full of letters of introduction, but I had not provided myself with a single letter. I had no keys to unlock social doors. I thought over the people whom I might have seen. The one above all others whom I wanted to meet was Dean Stanley. Early in my studies I had read his Jewish Church. It had completely changed my feeling toward the Bible. Until I read these volumes, Sacred History was unreal. Then, under his magic pen, Palestine came out of dreamland; Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were no longer mummies; Moses walked by the pyramids and stood by the burning bush, on Mount Sinai. He was not a mysterious ghost floating down from the past, but a real man. Dean Stanley had brought me from forced surface acceptance to real belief. Now I was going to Europe without obtaining letters of introduction that might have opened the way for a few minutes' interview with the one man I longed to meet.

Months passed in wandering about Europe with my wife. One evening in October in Rome we got out of the coach and entered the Hotel de' Inghilterra. A gentleman who appeared to be fifty or sixty years old, with his wife, preceded us. We both asked for rooms on the upper floor. Half way up I overtook the two ladies. The lady who had preceded us out of the coach waited for no introduction, and was chatting with my young wife. I approached and joined in the conversation. When we went down to dinner we were placed together.

I was a clergyman of twenty-three making my first visit to Rome, and as I would spend but a few days there, I was anxious to make the best of my time. The strangers took a kindly interest in my plans. They seemed to have a perfect knowledge of Rome of the present, and of Rome of the past. Each day at dinner they inquired how we had spent our time and suggested how best to use the day following. The strange gentleman in a few words seemed to change the dusty ruins into palaces and temples of the past. Each day old Rome rose before me more and more distinctly, until gilded palaces, with their gardens and fountains covered the Palestine hill and the great Romans of long ago debated in the Forum. Night after night I returned to the hotel, with a higher appreciation of the knowledge and power of word painting, and of the invincible kindness of our new acquaintances. Then (October, 1871) the King had just taken possession of the Church states, and the persistent beggars were intolerable. My new friend told me to go to the Coliseum late at night, and see it in peace, then he painted in picture words the Coliseum as it was of old.

That night we left for Naples. Later we returned to Rome. The night was cold and the moon full and the streets were silent and empty. I left my wife at the hotel and ordered my cab driver to take me past the Capatolini Hill, up the Via Sacra, under the Arch of Titus to the Coliseum. I stood for a few moments gazing at the immense building, and then entered through the deep shadows into the arena. As I stood there under the full moon the vast ruin changed, and it appeared as my friend had so vividly pictured it—the seats filled with eighty-five thousand spectators and in the arena the Christian martyrs and over there in the dark shadows were the lions coming out of their dens. Then the vision faded, and I went out under the arches, woke up my sleepy driver and returned to the hotel.

In the morning our friends had gone, They had withheld their names and I had felt that courtesy demanded that I should restrain my curiosity. We went North, still following the advice of our friends, pausing at Pisa, Specia and Genoa to Turin. There on our last morning, we came down to breakfast and were told that the coach was waiting to take us to the station. However, I insisted that I knew the exact distance and that we had plenty of time, so we sat down and had an excellent breakfast. Then the waiter told us that two people were waiting in the coach. We immediately sprang up and hurried out. To my intense mortification we found our friends of Rome. To my earnest apologies they replied with laughter, and said, "You are young travelers, and have been wise enough to insist on eating your breakfast while we, old travelers, have been making our breakfast on crackers and cheese in the coach." The reply to my repeated apologies was a cordial invitation to lunch with them at noon. Of course, we accepted the invitation. Astonished as I was at their perfect knowledge of Rome, I was still more astonished at their reaction from the breakfast experience. They were the only travelers I had ever seen, or have ever seen since, who would not have been indignant at the most uncomfortable delay. It was to me a lesson for a life time in courtesy and good humor.

That day, at the custom house crossing from Italy into France, the lady who had been so kind to us came to me and said, "Mr. Bruen I cannot find my husband, so I will ask you to help me. There are several second class passengers who have lost their luggage and are greatly distressed. I want to find some of the officials and help them out of their trouble". In a short time we succeeded. It was a second lesson in kindness.

As we parted in France that night, the gentleman who had been so helpful to us, said: "I suppose that you have wondered at my not giving you my name. I am Dean Stanley." He turned and presented to my wife and to me the woman as well known in the hospitals of London for her attention to the suffering poor, as she was known in the royal palaces for her intimate friendship with Queen Victoria, Lady Augusta Stanley. He added: "When you return to London it will give me pleasure to take you through Westminster Abbey."

Book Reviews

A NEW COMMENTARY ON HOLY SCRIPTURE, INCLUDING THE OPOCRYPHA: Edited by Bishop Gore, assisted by fifty collaborators. Cloth. Pages 1,596. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York City.

The avowed intent of this painstaking effort is to "reconcile the old faith with the new knowledge". The authors, all British, are dedicated to this task; and they enter upon their pursuit with commendable zest. Apart from the intrinsic worth of the book as a commentary, we have to note the enlightening treatment of auxiliary themes which are essential to a right comprehension of the Holy Scriptures. Bishop Gore himself writes on "The Bible in the Church"; and his thesis on "The Virgin Birth" is fully in accord with his well-known orthodox position on that subject. We have illuminating articles on "The Function of Literary and Historical Criticism"; "Advice to the Ordinary Reader of the Historical Books"; "Sacrifice and Priesthood in the Old Testament"; "A Comparative Study of the Old Testament in the Light of Recent Anthropological and Archeological Research"; "Environment Social, Political, Intellectual and Religious of Israel, from Maccabees to Our Lord"; "The Political and Religious Background of the New Testament in Jewish Thought"; "The Gentile Background of Early Christianity"; "The New Testament and the Catholic Creeds"; "The Constitution of the Church in the New Testament"; "The Sacraments in the New Testament"; "The Theology of St. Paul" and "Evidence of the Resurrection". These most valuable and up-to-date contributions are more than worth the cost of the entire volume of quite sixteen hundred pages. If we plus this with the commentary on the Apocrapha, there can be no question that we have before us the greatest commentary proposition.

The book is designedly written for critical readers, initiated into the secrets of the later exegetical schools. The common man will stand aghast as these astute scholars play the game with their P, J, D and E documents in the Old Testament, suggesting an insertion here; a deletion there; a transference elsewhere, the addenda of a later writer, implied anachronisms, inadmissible renderings, impossible analogies, later redactions, original glosses, evident divergences and all such like, which were totally and happily unknown to our forebears. And he will wonder why he must regard Isaiah as written not now by two authors, but a number, spread over generations of time. He will possibly be prepared to withstand the shock of Jonah's legendary character, and the announcement of the Flood as but a local phenomenon. And he will question how all this wisdom has come into being. But if he will patiently read, he will be comforted by the assurance that the decisions herein are not final, for the admission is made that "the mistakes of one school are corrected by another. Truth will win in the long run". So there we are, and we do not know where we shall be.

And our hearts are warmed by a significant confession on page one hundred and eighty-eight of the Old Testament section: "In proportion as you are a student you will want to master the historical origin and literary character of its (Old Testament) several parts. But when you have done that, so far as you are able to, and willingly or reluctantly have accepted the new estimates of the books, as this commentary seeks to give them to you, you will go back to the Bible as it stands". Blessings upon you, dear editors, for this condescension.

The present reviewer expects to use this book 'til he wears it out, awaiting that advance into the realms of truth, which is herein presaged. And he commends it most cordially to discriminating readers. K. M.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart", Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. A. A. Gassaway, of Gaithersburg, Md.:

" . . . Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."—St. Matthew 28:20.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

OFFICIAL TITLE.

Mr. Editor:

Having just received the "Protest" from Minister in today's issue, I am writing to request a clear statement in your columns as to whether (if so, how and when) our official title has been changed from P. E. Church, etc., to "A. E. Church". With thanks, I am,

Respectfully,

Lloyd T. Everett.

DeLand, Florida, January 5, 1929.

Editor's Note: The official title of our Church is "The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America". It has not been changed.

NOBLEST AND BEST.

Mr. Editor:

I rejoice that The Churchman has printed the sketch of Robert E. Lee, by John W. Daniel. Preliminary, let me say that the author entered the military service of Virginia in May, 1861, and served in The Stonewall Brigade, at length becoming Chief of Staff of General Early. He was a member of Congress in 1886-'87 and U. S. Senator until his death in 1910—and he was in the front rank of all of the men of that period distinguished for their virtues, characteristics and attainments. I rejoice that The Churchman has preserved what Daniel has recorded of General Lee. Whatever is noblest and best in human life and character is found in the career of these two men. They embody the highest virtues of the race. Those who aspire to the perfection of manhood may well make them their pattern in life.

And yet the other day, a man holding a high position in one of the patriotic organizations of this Union, characterized "The Confederates" as Traitors! Ridiculous ad absurdum! How could men of high intelligence, of peerless virtue and honor and spotless character be "Traitors"? There is certainly a great misapprehension somewhere: and all that is necessary to remove it is a fair and candid examination of the facts of history.

"THIRTY-FIVE THOUSAND."

Mr. Editor:

In a recent issue of the "Southwestern Episcopalian", published in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, there appears an editorial, under the title "Thirty-five Thousand", containing a criticism of the action of the laity in circulating the petition recently presented to the General Convention, asking it to vote down the resolution to drop the Articles of Religion. Some of the statements contained in that editorial are remarkable:

> "Now that the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion have been kept in the Revised Prayer Book and the Church saved by its friends, we can perhaps discuss one feature of the frenzied campaign to retain them . . . We have been told that between thirty and thirty-five thousand laymen rallied to the call of the defenders of the faith and signed a memorial to the General Convention, asking that the Articles be retained in the Prayer Book. . . How many of the signers could say that they had ever read the Articles, and of those, how many that they understood them.
> . . . . . .
> "We seriously question the propriety of any individual or organization going over the heads of the Parish Clergymen in an effort to secure names to a petition of this sort.
> . . . . . .
> "The Clergy are the official leaders in our Church and if any movement has to resort to an appeal over their heads to an uninformed constituency, it gives the impression that it is weak and is making its appeal to ignorance and prejudice.
> . . . . . .
> "We hold no brief for Anglo-Catholicism, although it has much to teach us if we would stop our imputations of bad faith long enough to listen, but we do object to the use of such tactics as was resorted to during the recent campaign to stir up the Church against brethren of our own common household of faith."

Inasmuch as this editorial fails to state the facts, either through ignorance or design of the writer of it, it is misleading, and, in simple justice to the National Committee of One Hundred and Four Laymen and Laywomen, hailing from all sections of the country, who sponsored the circulation of that petition, the people of the Church are entitled to the exact truth about it.

At the 1925 session of the General Convention, a resolution was passed on first reading, providing that the Articles of Religion be dropped. That resolution had to lie over until 1928 for final action.

In accordance with the requirements of Art. X of the Constitution, the Secretary of the General Convention forwarded notice of that resolution to the Secretary of the Convention of each Diocese. The same Article of the Constitution requires that that notice shall be made known to each Diocesan Convention at its next meeting, obviously in order that the Communicants of the Church, in each Diocese, might be informed of what was proposed and elect their delegates accordingly. But, for reasons which they have not thus far explained, the Diocesan authorities, with only a very few exceptions, failed to bring this notice to the attention of their respective Diocesan Conventions, with the result that not five per cent of the communicants had even heard of the resolution.

The resolution was introduced by one of the leaders of the "Anglo-Catholic" party. To those who happened to have knowledge of the situation, it was perfectly obvious that the real purpose of the resolution was to get rid of Articles 22, 25, 28 and 31, which repudiate the doctrines of the Mass, Purgatory, Worshipping of Images and Relics, Invocation of Saints, the Doctrine of Seven Sacraments, Transubstantiation, as well as Reservation of the Sacrament and Adoration of the Communion Elements.

When it became apparent that there was no hope of getting the notice of the resolution before Diocesan Conventions, as the Constitution requires, appeal after appeal appeared in the "Southern Churchman" that Bishops and Clergy tell their people frankly what was proposed, in order that they might elect their delegates accordingly. Save in a pitifully few instances, that appeal fell on deaf ears.

It was under these circumstances that the petition was prepared and circulated by the laity. The appeal was made to an uninformed laity, but they received the information and acted, apparently with great effect. Who was responsible for the lack of information on the part of the laity? Why keep the laity in ignorance of the resolution?

But, dealing with the editorial in question, what phase of the campaign for the circulation of the petition justifies the application to it of the term "frenzied"? If any statement contained in the petition was untrue, what was it?

It may well be admitted that many of the signers of the petition did not understand all of the Articles of Religion, but they did understand the real purpose of the resolution to drop them.

When the writer of this editorial questions the propriety of the laity circulating a petition without the permission of the Parish Clergy, he is treading on dangerous ground. When it is a breach of propriety for the laity to circulate among themselves a courteous and respectful petition to their General Convention concerning a vitally important matter pending before it, particularly when the Clergy fail in their duty to inform the people of facts which they have a constitutional right to know, it is time for the laity of the Church to reflect. The Constitution of the Church provides that in its General Convention a measure may pass the House of Bishops and receive the entire Clerical vote in the House of Deputies, yet if it fails to receive the approval of the laity in the latter House, it fails of adoption.

It is true that the Clergy are the official leaders in our Church, but where are they leading it? Do we find them, except as to a few of them, audibly leading in opposition to the attempt of the "Anglo-Catholic" party to undermine and destroy the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Church? It is stated that at a recent "Catholic Congress", in New York, twenty Bishops and hundreds of Clergy participated in a "solemn pontifical Mass". Were they perverting their leadership to an unlawful purpose? The law of this Church says that they were.

The editorial in question speaks of "imputations of bad faith" on the part of "Anglo-Catholics". Bishops and Clergy of this Church take a solemn oath to conform to the "doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America". When a Bishop or Clergyman ordained in this Church "celebrate Mass", participates in the Roman Catholic service known as "Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament", and teaches Invocation of Saints (including prayers to the Virgin Mary, Purgatory, Worship of Images and Relics and enjoins Auricular Confession as a religious duty, is he acting in good faith?

The laity will be glad to follow the leadership of Bishops and Clergy loyal to the doctrine and worship of this Church as it has declared the same, but when they find that leadership directed towards toleration and encouragement of the teaching of doctrines and the practice of ceremonies contrary to its plainly expressed law, they have a Constitutional right to repudiate that sort of leadership and take matters in their own hands. They are rapidly awaking to that fact. The great majority of the laity of the Church are loyal to its doctrine and worship. If Bishops and Clergy will take the lead in demanding and insisting upon conformity to that doctrine and worship, they will receive generous and whole-hearted support; but the time has come when the laity are no longer willing to sit supinely by while "Anglo-Catholic" Bishops, Clergy and laity pursue their purpose of converting the Church into a feeble imitation of Rome and ultimately uniting it with that body.

Three Letters.

Lambeth Palace S. E.
16th November, 1928.

My Dear Presiding Bishop:

On our Golden Wedding-Day, November 12, the day on which I received office as Archbishop, my wife and I had the great pleasure of receiving at Lambeth, by the hands of Bishop Brent, the striking message of friendship and goodwill contained in the address presented to us as agreed upon in your Convention.

It is quite beyond my power at this time of stress to dwell as I should wish upon the relationship between our central home at Lambeth and the bishops and clergy of the great Church over which you preside. You could not have sent your message by a more loved and honored representative than Bishop Brent, our friend of many years, who used eloquent words in presenting to us your communication.

It is now fifty-one years since I first began to be in touch with American bishops visiting England. I was fortunate enough to be a virtual secretary of the Lambeth Conference of 1878, and the links which then began to be fashioned between myself and the episcopate of the United States have grown stronger and stronger ever since, as I have increased my knowledge, both of the men and of the work so blessed of God in the United States of America.

Though I have now laid down my official position, I hope to be allowed still to maintain many links of friendship and cooperation with those whom I have learned to admire in the common work belonging to us all.

It is not a small thing or a small strain upon one to go forth from the home which has been ours for so many years and to lay down work which has occupied our every thought and every ounce of energy. But it was beyond question right that I should leave to younger men the obligations which have been mine, and the kindness which, in these days of out-going, has been shown to us not only in England, but in every part of the world, has softened the sadness and given us fresh links of encouragement as regards the remaining years of our life. Certainly the messages which have poured in upon us from America are not the least of those which have thus cheered our path.

The beautiful gift of the golden casket in which your weighty and stirring address was contained will be to us a treasured possession as long as we live, and a treasured possession, too, to those who come after.

With the assurance of our constant thought and constant prayer,

I remain, with great respect,
Your faithful and affectionate brother,
(Signed) Davidson of Lambeth.

The Most Rev. Bishop Murray,
Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Lambeth Palace, S. E.
10, Cheyne Walk,
Chelsea, S. W., 3.
20 November, 1928.

My Dear Bishop Murray:

Last week, in the extreme confusion of every hour, when I was receiving addresses and making replies and communicating with all parts of the world, I wrote you a letter which may, I think, have seemed a little confused. It was to thank you for the wonderful address you sent to me from the Convention. I mentioned the beautiful gift of the gold casket placed in my hands by Bishop Brent, but I did not allude to the munificent money gift, thinking that I would write separately about that, as I understood it to be a gift less directly associated with the actual Convention.

May I now tell you, with a full heart, how intensely we appreciated the generous present thus made to us at a time when difficulties are very great and the expense of moving from Lambeth is embarrassing, if not alarming? The thought that our kind friends on the other side of the Atlantic should thus give their aid to smooth our path and to enable us to enter more easily upon the new conditions, is in every sense encouraging. It touches us deeply, and I am anxious that you should realize our high appreciation of such friendly action.

We are still in the midst of confusion attending the removal from Lambeth. We hope, in a week or two, to get things straight, and to be able to decide what our new life is likely to involve in the way of responsible work.

I remain, with our united kindest regards and warm thanks,

Yours most truly,
(Signed) Davidson Lambeth.

13 December, 1928.

The Most Rev. and Rt. Hon. Randall Thomas Davidson, D. D.,
10 Cheyne Walk,
Chelsea, S. W. 3, England.

My Dear Lord Davidson:

Your cordial acknowledgments of November 16 and 20 have been duly received, and are sincerely appreciated.

Your gracious words greatly augment the joy we, your affectionate brethren of the American Church, experienced in our participation with Mrs. Davidson and yourself in the notable anniversary events of your life, both personal and official.

We here, with the Mother Church there, thank God upon every remembrance of you and your good works. We wish and pray for you many happy years yet together upon earth, and may the bountiful blessing of Divine love and human fellowship attend you all your temporal days until there comes to you the call to the sphere of the higher life, and you find the place prepared for you in the Father's house of many mansions, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Faithfully and affectionately yours,

Presiding Bishop.

A Hero of the Faith—George Berkeley.

This year marks the two hundredth anniversary of a notable event in the history of the Church in this country, the coming to the American colonies of George Berkeley, Dean of Derry, afterwards Bishop of Cloyne. He arrived in Newport January 23, 1729. The Rev. Mr. Honeyman, the S. P. G. missionary, was holding divine service in the newly-built Trinity Church when a letter was brought to him saying that the great Irish dignitary was about to land. He dismissed the Church with his blessing and "wardens, vestry, church and congregation, male and female, repaired immediately to the ferry wharf where they arrived a little before the Dean, his family and friends".

Berkeley was already known in England as a distinguished philosopher and man of letters. At the age of twenty-four he had written a philosophical treatise which had given him a European reputation. His extraordinary charm and force of character had attracted a host of friends. Alexander Pope, as is well known, attributed to him "every virtue under heaven", and Bishop Atterbury wrote: "So much innocence and such humility I did not think was the portion of any but angels until I saw this gentleman."

In the midst of his honors and influence he decided to become a foreign missionary, to go as a messenger of the Gospel to the wild and little known new continent. He had conceived an idea which seemed to his contemporaries fantastic that "Westward the course of empire takes its way", and he believed that the best hope of European civilization was to strengthen the forces of religion in the new world. He would do it by establishing a Christian college where missionaries might be trained to work among the English colonists and in the surrounding Indian tribes. His first thought was to establish his college in Bermuda which he had been persuaded would be a convenient point from which to reach the mainland. He settled, however, in Newport, to await the transmission to him of the 20,000 pounds which the government had voted in support of his project.

The money never came. Eighteenth Century Churchmen did not believe in foreign missions. They did not take Christian education very seriously. They were suspicious of idealists, and were very worldly-wise. So they turned their backs upon the glorious dream which was both too practical and too Christian for their slow-moving minds, and stifled in its inception the splendid endeavor of one of the greatest men the Church of England ever produced. What it might have meant for American civilization and for the Church in America had Berkeley received the support he deserved it is not easy to exaggerate.

Not that his effort was wasted, noble deeds such as this shine as beacons across the centuries. And Berkeley's stay of three years in Colonial New England had certain definite results. He became the friend of the brilliant S. P. G. missionary in Stratford, Conn., Samuel Johnson, and later when Johnson became the first President of King's College, New York City, Berkeley counselled him as to its organization. Berkeley's follower, Smibert, who painted the portrait of Berkeley and his family which now hangs in the Yale art museum, introduced art into the colonies and was later Copley's teacher. The gift of Whitehall, Berkeley's estate near Newport, to Yale established the first graduate scholarships in America. And on Berkeley's return to England he sent a collection of nearly one thousand books to the library of the college, a collection which is still in the University library and testifies to the wealth of Berkeley's interests, for it contains books on the classics, philosophy, theology, art, science, history—such a broad foundation of learning Berkeley evidently believed ought to be part of the training of the future (congregational) ministers to graduate at the college. Another collection of books he presented to Harvard. And the money he had collected for his college was with the consent of the donors turned over to Oglethorpe for his Georgia enterprise.

A committee has been formed to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the coming of Dean Berkeley to the American colonies in 1729. The patrons of the committee are Archbishop Randall T. Davidson, Archbishop Charles F. D'Arcy of Armagh, Bishop Murray, Bishop Brewster of Connecticut, President Angell and President Butler. The chairman of the committee is Bishop James deW. Perry; Bishop Gore is vice-chairman. Among other members of the committee are the Rev. Stanley C. Hughes, Miss Annie B. Jennings, the Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy, Mr. John Nicholas Brown, and Dean W. P. Ladd. There will be a commemoration at the Berkeley Divinity School in New Haven on January 23, with addresses on The English Background, The American Background, New Light on Berkeley's American Sojourn, Berkeley's Contribution to American Church Life, Berkeley's Contribution to American Thought, Berkeley as a Patron of Art, Berkeley as an Educator, Berkeley's Significance in Modern Philosophy. There will be an exhibit of Berkeley books, manuscripts and pictures. Bishop Acheson is sending a request to the clergy of Connecticut that they observe the Bishop Berkeley anniversary on Sunday, January 27. Doubtless other churches throughout the country will commemorate this event in some way either during the month of January or at some later date.

W. P. Ladd.

Conference of Sisters, Peekskill, December 29-30.

The first Conference of Sisters met at St. Mary's School, Peekskill, N. Y., December 29-30, 1928, the first meeting of the kind ever held by Sisters of the Episcopal Church. Over thirty were in attendance at all of the sessions; they represented the Communities of St. Mary, St. Anne, Holy Nativity, Transfiguration and St. Margaret. An unavoidable emergency presented All Saints Community from being represented.

At the opening session the Rev. Harold Holt, Assistant Secretary of the Social Service Department, made a brief address outlining the purpose of the conference. He said, in brief, that the Department had had such a conference in mind for a year or so, as a means of bringing to the Sisters some of the changes and new ideas in the social service field from time to time. This first conference was to be in the nature of a trying out of the idea, and if the Sisters liked it, and though it might be a useful thing, other conferences might be arranged by the Sisters. Our Communities are all doing outstanding work in the social service field at the present time. Their schools and institutions are of the highest, but they are not well known, and all of the communities are greatly handicapped by lack of numbers. If we can show the young women of the Church who are looking forward with sacrificial ardor to a career of social service, especially in institutional work, that in the Communities there is an opportunity of realizing this vocation in its highest terms, our whole program of Church work will be advanced immeasurably.

Mr. Hughson of the Order of the Holy Cross, Provincial Chaplain of St. Mary's, spoke. He took as his theme the necessity, by the very nature of the conventional life, to seek in all avenues of life, perfection. The work carried on by a Community should be the nearest to perfection in its particular field as it is possible to attain.

Mr. H. W. Hopkirk, of the Child Welfare League of America, was present at the opening session and spoke on the work of his organization and its search for the best standards in child care. He said that he had great hopes that out of such conferences as the present one definite contributions might be made to the field of child care.

The afternoon session was given up to a discussion of behavior problems led by Miss Sarah Ivins, of the faculty of the New York School of Social Work.

At the evening session Miss Gordon Hamilton, of the New York School of Social Work, took up the theme, where it had been left in the afternoon. She cited the various ways a child might fail in adapting itself to the world and pointed out some of the possible causes for these failures.

On Sunday morning the session, following a choral Eucharist, was given to a consideration of the religious training of the child.

A continuation committee was appointed to consist of three Mothers Superior who could arrange details of time, place and program for a future conference.

Week-End Conferences for Laymen.

Mr. William C. Sturgis, who, prior to June, 1927, was, for ten years, Educational Secretary of the Department of Missions, is now located in Washington, D. C., where, under the auspices of the College of Preachers and Bishop Rhinelander, he is initiating a series of week-end conferences for laymen. This is not altogether an experiment, since similar conferences have been repeatedly and successfully held at Dayton, Ohio, and Racine, Wis.; but as a systematic attempt over a period of several months, to bring small groups of laymen together for conference and discussion, it does present certain novel features.

The men gather on Friday evening in time for supper at the Boys' School on the Cathedral grounds. Pending the completion of the building for the College of Preachers, rooms are provided in an apartment house nearby. The sessions of the conference are held in the Cathedral Library, and the Chapels of the Cathedral offer opportunity for worship. Thus the desired community idea is realized. The men feel that they are parts of a body united in a common purpose.

The object of the conferences is to discuss certain aspects of the Christian Faith, and what the Faith of the Church implies as to advantage, responsibility, and opportunity, in daily life. The sessions begin Friday evening; and are continued Saturday morning, afternoon and evening; and Sunday morning and afternoon. Each session lasts for two hours, and consists of one hour of informal talk by the leader, ten minutes intermission, and fifty minutes of free and general discussion on any topic touched upon during the first hour. The Holy Communion is celebrated each morning before breakfast; a brief period of intercession occurs at noon; and the day closes with an Office of Compline.

Thus far, two of these week-end conferences have been held; the first, attended by seven men; the second, by fourteen. During January, the lay conferences are omitted to make way for clergy conferences; but the former are resumed February 15, and continue each week-end (with the exception of March 8-10) until March 24. Thus the future dates are February 15-17; February 22-24; March 1-3; March 15-17; and March 22-24. In theory, the first, third and fourth of the above periods are intended primarily for young men, twenty to thirty years old; the second and fifth, for older men of more experience; but no rule holds. Also, these conferences, though held in Washington, are intended primarily for men from outside the immediate locality; partly in order to secure diversity of outlook, partly to ensure the sense of community life; but here again the rule is lax.

Obviously, the cost of holding such conference is considerable; therefore, a charge of $6 is made to cover board and lodging for the period of the conference. The College of Preachers, however, has a fund which enables it to remit this charge if so desired, and also to pay transportation to and from Washington in the case of men who could not otherwise attend. As no more than fifteen men can be accommodated at any one conference, those who desire to attend should correspond as soon as possible with the Conference Leader, Wm. C. Sturgis, Washington Cathedral Offices, Mount Saint Alban, Washington, D. C.

THE STANDARD BOOK.

The Editor of The Southern Churchman:

Many inquiries are coming to the Prayer Book Commission about the time when the new Prayer Book may be expected. The Editing Committee is working diligently with the printer, but we cannot at this time fix any date when the Standard Book will be ready for the publishers. The only assurance we can give is that we are doing our very best to complete the work as rapidly as good workmanship will permit.

Publishers wishing to print the book will, upon application, receive advance pages, without waiting for the whole Standard Book to be completed, so that they may, in a measure, keep pace with the printing of the Standard Book.

City Mission Training Course for Recent Seminary Graduates: 1929.

The Purpose of the Course:

The New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society is quite naturally the largest work of its kind in the American Church. Every possible branch of City Mission work is represented here, and in many ways our opportunity is unique, because of our official capacity as Hospital and Prison Chaplains for the City Government.

The increasing emphasis upon the social welfare side of parish work, the unfolding of new possibilities in the scientific treatment of abnormal or unadjusted people, and the growing necessity for a priest to be a well-trained pastor, would seem to demand of the Church an opportunity for special training to be offered to its young clergy.

Because our opportunity is the largest and unique and because the City Mission Society feels that it owes this duty to the Church, it is again offering a "clinical year" to several young priests.

During the past four years eight young men from Seminaies have taken advantage of the Course, and have felt keenly the concentrated experience it has gained for them.

The Field of Work:

Chaplaincy—Twenty experienced and trained chaplains in sixty hospitals, prisons, correctional or welfare institutions.

Chapels—Two for colored and one for Italian people.

Community Houses—Two on the lower east side.

Camps—Three for boys, together with convalescent care.

Social Service—Special department dealing in family case work, unemployment, and the rehabilitation of abnormal and unadjusted people.

Immigrant Work—In the hospital and detention groups of Ellis Island.

Goodwill Industries—For handicapped men and women.

The Training Offered:

The Course provides opportunity for the "student chaplain" to associate with different members of the staff in their various activities. He gets the benefit of their wide experience and can talk over his problems with them. He is brought face to face with many problems of the sick and those in trouble, and thus gets concentrated training. Trained Social Service workers are ready to show him the definite contribution they have to make to the solution of his problems. This Course extends over a period of nine months, during which the student will be active in all branches of the work. His experience ought to be invaluable to him in his later parish life.

The Arrangement and Stipend:

In some cases the student may be resident in an institution for a period. In other cases he will live at Headquarters, where a number of the Staff is in residence. In all cases he will receive $70 per month and living, with incidental expenses such as carfare, postage, etc.

The Course begins June 15 and continues for nine months. Application should be made to, and further information may be secured from, The Rev. L. Ernest Sunderland, D. D., Superintendent, 38 Bleecker Street, New York City.

St. Luke's Fund Passes $500,000 Mark.

Although no general appeal for St. Luke's International Hospital, Tokyo, has been made in the Episcopal churches as yet, owing to the holding of the General Convention and the Every Member Canvass, the half million dollar mark has been passed in the undertaking to raise the $2,656,500 Medical Centre fund.

The two most recent large gifts were $125,000 made available for the building fund by the National Council and $100,000 given by the estate of the late Charles M. Hall, aluminum manufacturer of Niagara Falls, N. Y. The $125,000 pledged by the National Council represents the allocation to the fund being raised for construction purposes of half the sum previously appropriated for operating expenses during the next five years. This step was taken in view of the recent $400,000 gift of the Rockefeller Foundation for endowment of the College of Nursing. The $100,000 gift from the Hall estate will go towards the College of Nursing.

The $500,000 now pledged includes, among other gifts, the $100,000 pledged by an anonymous donor early in the campaign, the $50,000 gift of Mr. and Mrs. Percy R. Pyne and $25,000 given by J. P. Morgan & Co.

Preparations for Church Appeal Started on Epiphany: Through a vote the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church recommended that active preparations for the St. Luke's appeal in churches of this denomination throughout the country begin on Epiphany, January 6, and that plans be made to have the effort culminate in the week beginning on Sunday, February 3, and ending on Quinquegesima Sunday, which is February 10.

Eight dioceses were represented at the first regional conference in connection with the appeal in the churches, held in Chicago on December 7. These dioceses were Chicago, Northern Indiana, Indianapolis, Springfield, Quincy, Milwaukee, Fond du Lac and Iowa. A similar regional conference is to be held in Pittsburgh on January 15 and others, in various sections of the country, will follow.

College of Nursing Graduates Largest Class in History: Sixteen nurses, the largest class in the history of the institution, were graduated from the St. Luke's College of Nursing at commencement exercises held recently. The nurses received diplomas as college graduates since the school is recognized by the Imperial Government as a full college, the only institution of its kind to be so honored.

VERY DISCOURAGING.

Mr. Franklin sent this message on January 7 to every bishop in the United States: Remittances for nineteen twenty-eight budget very slow. Disturbing reports from some dioceses as to ability to complete what Council was told to expect. Our books close on the nineteenth. Early reports of expectations for nineteen twenty-nine very discouraging. Please do your utmost for the budget of both years.

Lewis B. Franklin,
Treasurer.

Dean Robbins' Resignation.

Mystery still surrounds the cause of the resignation of the Very Rev. Howard Chandler Robbins, D. D., as Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York City. Both Bishop Manning and the Dean, between whom a serious difference of opinion seems to have arisen, maintain silence on the subject.

A special meeting of the trustees of the Cathedral, called to act on the resignation of Dean Robbins, has had to be postponed for a second time owing to the severe illness with pneumonia of Bishop Manning, president of the board of trustees.

The date now set for the meeting is Tuesday afternoon, January 22. In the meantime Dr. Robbins has requested of the trustees an immediate leave of absence to visit his sister who is ill in California.

Dr. Robbins has held his position as Dean of the Cathedral for eleven years, and the Cathedral has progressed greatly under his devoted leadership. Many of the clergy of the Diocese of New York have expressed regret over the Cathedral's losing Dean Robbins, and a report has been circulating that owing to this Bishop Manning will personally request the board of trustees to refuse to accept the resignation.

Dean Robbins received the next largest number of votes for Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Pennsylvania at the Diocesan Convention, which met recently and elected Dr. Bowie as Bishop Garland's assistant. Now that Dr. Bowie has declined this honor, it is not improbable that Dean Robbins will be elected to the office by the Diocese of Pennsylvania at its next diocesan meeting called for January 22.

Bayou Du Large Mission School Loses Loved Principal.

The death of Mrs. Flora Conely Anderson on January 5, 1929, deprived the Bayou Du Large Mission School near Houma, La., of its principal. Mrs. Anderson had served for the last three years as teacher and principal in this school.

The Mission School ministers to the trappers and fishermen living in the marshes that border the Gulf Coast of Louisiana. At the beginning of the work of this mission some years ago the people of this section were entirely illiterate, old and young. As a result of the school's work, this condition has steadily improved and during the past year some of the pupils had reached the Sixth Grade.

Mrs. Anderson was not only an excellent teacher and capable administrator, but also showed a rare ability to enter sympathetic relationship with the simple folk of the mission and won their confidence and was councillor and guide to them in their many problems.

She was buried from St. Matthew's Church, Houma, La., on January 6, 1929. G. L. T.

Rosemont.

Just outside of Baltimore there is a new development called Rosemont, in Anne Arundel County. The Rev. Percy C. Adams, rector of the Church of the Advent, Baltimore, has recently organized a Mission there, and so far the results have been very gratifying.

Five Hundred.

Five hundred Hymnals have been presented to the Church of the Messiah, Hamilton, as a memorial to Alexander McIlvain and his wife, Elizabeth A., for many years faithful communicants of the Church. The Hymnals are the gift of their children, Mr. Alexander McIlvain, vestryman of the Church of the Messiah, and Mrs. T. Quincy Scott. When the new prayer books are issued, five hundred will be presented to the church as part of the same memorial.

St. Matthias' Chapel.

The work at St. Matthias' Chapel, on the Belair Road, has been relinquished by Mt. Calvary Church, Baltimore, after seventeen years, and at the request of the Bishops of the Diocese, the Church of the Messiah, Hamilton, has undertaken this work. Regular Sunday services will be under the direction of Mr. Lewis O. Heck, student assistant at Messiah, and the monthly celebration of the Holy Communion will be administered by the Rev. James A. Mitchell, rector of Messiah.

Maryland's School For Missions.

Donaldson School, Ilchester, Md., was selected as the place to hold the School for Missioners, January 7-11, inclusive. Nineteen clergymen met in time for Evensong, at five o'clock, on Monday evening, and continued on until after the celebration of the Holy Communion on Friday morning. The School was conducted by the Rev. S. C. Hughson, O. H. C.

Maryland is planning to hold Missions in every parish throughout the diocese during the year 1929, and the majority will be held during the week beginning with Septuagesima Sunday. Beside the Missioners in our own diocese, who were trained at the School, many outside clergymen will come in and conduct Missions in the various churches.

OKLAHOMA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas Casady, S. T. D., Bishop in charge.

Bishop Sees Cheerful Outlook.

Further acquaintance with the Missionary District of Oklahoma does not in the least diminish Bishop Casady's conviction of the opportunity that Oklahoma offers for the future, or some of its urgent needs in the present. Here are some of the things that cheer him:

"The people themselves are responding financially as they never have responded before. For instance, at the end of November I held a parochial mission in Shawnee, where we have a parish; until quite recently, a struggling Mission. A new $15,000 parish house will be erected there in 1929.

"The next week, a similar evangelistic effort was made in Ponca City. This mission congregation will probably become a parish by 1930. They are undertaking to build and entirely pay for a church and parish house. One year ago I seriously feared for the life of this Mission.

"This week I have definitely organized missions in Cleveland and Hominy, where we have never had work before; not even an occasional service. Each place needs a small building and should have $2,000 to assist them in the purchase of a lot and the erection of a building. The rest they will do themselves. At Cleveland we can have fifty children in our Church School the minute we have a place in which to gather them. At the present time, twenty are meeting in a private house. The children at Hominy drive twenty-two miles to Sunday school every Sunday.

"The people at Mangum have a lot and are raising money for a new building. At Chickasha which was in a hopeless tangle, the new man has straightened out all difficulties. Next week I go there to make final plans and accept designs for a $10,000 parish house.

"The first of January I am placing a man at Pawnee with four other missions under his care. The people at Pawnee can raise immediately one-half the cost of a rectory. Probably we can borrow the rest for this.

"At Cushing, a prosperous oil town, in a good agricultural country, an active group is working for a lot and desire to build a church.

"We are reopening the church at Chandler as soon as I can scrape up four or five hundred dollars to put this church in repair. It has been vacant for years. Chandler is a county seat town of about 8,000 people."

Here are some of the needs the Bishop sees:

"I am in desperate need of a church building for our colored mission in Muskogee, where a really fine piece of work is being done.

"At every opportunity I am pushing for an endowment of a million dollars, to take care of future missionary opportunities. I will call upon the giving strength of the District to its very limit. In the meantime, urgent opportunities are being lost although every one of my clergy is working to the limit of his abilities and my financial strength.

"I do not believe that the domestic field outside of the great cities has ever had a comparable opportunity for rapid and permanent growth.

"I do not wish anything at the expense of another man's work, whether he be in the domestic or foreign field, but I do wish to lay before the Church the needs of this field."

NORTHERN INDIANA.

Rt. Rev. Campbell Gray, D. D., Bishop.

The Book of Remembrance which the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Northern Indiana has been compiling for several years under the Chairmanship of Miss Alice Goldthwaite, of Marion, Ind., is now nearing completion. The goal set for the accompanying Memorial Fund is the amount of $2,500, which is to be invested and the income therefrom used by the Bishop for Missions and Church Extension in the diocese. The fund has now reached $1,905.71. The women expect to present the Fund and the Book to the Bishop for the purposes above mentioned when they gather together at the annual meeting the day before the next Diocesan Council.

At the request of the Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary of Northern Indiana, Bishop Gray has appointed the Second Sunday after Epiphany, January 20, 1928, as a day for special offerings to be taken as a memorial to Mary Louise White, wife of the first Bishop of Northern Indiana, and first Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary of this diocese.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council.

Everything is in readiness for the Eighty-fifth Annual Council of the Diocese of Florida. This Council has been called by Bishop Juhan and will meet, according to the resolution of the last Council, in Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, the Rev. Wm. S. Stoney, rector, on Wednesday and Thursday, January 23-24. Outstanding features of the sessions will be a thirty-minute address by the Rev. Louis G. Wood, representing the National Council, who will speak on the Budget of the National Church, both in its maintenance and advance work projects, the Campaign for St. Luke's Hospital and the National Campaign of Evangelism; the Vice-Chancellor of the University of the South, Mr. Benjamin Finney, will represent that institution, and the student workers of the University of Florida and the Florida State College for Women, the Rev. Melville E. Johnson, and Miss Hope Baskette will tell of their work and of the need for the new buildings for which the Diocese of Floriad has instituted a campaign.

The Thirty-ninth Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary to the National Council in the Diocese of Florida will hold its sessions, in Gainesville, simultaneously with the Council, Miss Margaret G. Weed, presiding.

The Twenty-first Annual Assembly of the Daughters of the King in the Diocese of Florida will hold their sessions also in Gainesville, on day preceding the opening of the Council, January 22, Mrs. G. Hendree Harrison presiding. The Bishop of the diocese will address all three meetings and the Rev. Newton Middleton, rector of St. John's Church, Jacksonville, will be the chief speaker at the Daughters of the King Convention.

Educational Institute.

Jacksonville is planning a city-wide Educational Institute early in February. This institute will be arranged by the Department of Religious Education, the Rev. Ambler M. Blackford, Chairman.

The Rev. Basil M. Walton, rector of St. James' Church, Lake City, conducted a two-day mission in St. Andrew's Church, Jacksonville, on the evenings of January 9 and 10.

Exceptionally beautiful and impressive services of the Feast of Lights were held in St. John's Church and the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, on the night of Epiphany.

CONVERSION OF ST. PAUL.

January 25.

In weariness and painfulness Saint Paul
Served God and pleased Him: after-saints no less
Can wait on and can please Him one and all
In weariness and painfulness.

By faith and hope triumphant thro' distress;
Not with the rankling service of a thrall;
But even as loving children trust and bless,
Weep and rejoice answering their Father's call,
Work with tired hands, and forward upward press
On sore tired feet still rising when they fall,
In weariness and painfulness.
—Christina G. Rossetti.

Lee and the Confederacy.

Charles Francis Adams, a son of Massachusetts and grand-son of John Quincy Adams, a typical bred-in-the-bone Yankee, as he called himself, delivered a notable address at the Lee Centennial held at Lexington, Va., in 1907. Among other things he said, "One of a community which then looked upon Lee as a renegade from the flag he had sworn to serve, and a traitor to the nation which had nurtured him, in my subordinate place I directly confronted Lee throughout the larger portion of the War of Secession. During all those years there was not a day in which my heart would not have been gladdened had I heard that his also had been the fate which at Chancellorsville befell his great lieutenant; and yet more glad had it been the fortune of the command in which I served to visit that fate upon him. Forty more years have since gone. Their close finds me here today certainly a much older, and in my own belief, at least, a wiser man.

"The charge still most commonly made against Lee in that section of the common country to which I belong and with which I sympathize, is that in plain language, he was false to his flag—educated at the national academy, an officer of the United States Army, he abjured his allegiance and bore arms against the government he had sworn to uphold. In other words, he was a military traitor. I state the charge in the tersest language possible. Having done so, and admitting the facts as technically true, I add as the result of much patient study and most mature reflection, that under similar conditions I would myself have done exactly what Lee did."

He further said:

"Coming directly to the point, I maintain that every man in the eleven States seceding from the Union, had, in 1861, whether he would or no, to decide for himself whether to adhere to his state or to the nation, and I finally assert that, whichever way he decided, if only he decided honestly, putting self-interest behind him, he decided right."

He puts Lee in good company, and further says: "But he stands awaiting sentence at the bar of history in very respectable company. Associated with him are, for instance, William, of Orange, known as The Silent. John Hampden, original Pater Patriae, Oliver Cromwell, the Protector of the English Commonwealth; Sir Henry Vance, once a governor of Massachusetts, and George Washington, a Virginian of note. . . . As to Robert E. Lee, individually, I can only repeat what I have already said—if in all respects similarly circumstanced, I hope I should have been filial and unselfish enough to have done as Lee did."

At the time he uttered those words Charles Francis Adams was the head of the Historical Society of Massachusetts. And thus it happens that "the avenging pen of history", instead of denouncing Lee as a traitor, lauds him as a patriot and places him by the side of the immortal Washington.—Exchange.

The Cross-Bearer.

As men ordinarily see it, he who is the truest cross-bearer is he who has most trials to endure, and who endures them faithfully for the Master. As the Bible presents it he is the truest cross-bearer who most heartily puts himself at the service of Christ, for joy or for sorrow, for want or for fulness, for life or for death. Cross-bearing is not hard asceticism; it is cheerful and unquestioning devotedness. It is not living for the purpose of denying oneself; it is living for Christ, even though one must deny himself in order to obtain such living.

It is such cross-bearing as this that prepares the way for crown-wearing. He who would save his life by penances and unnecessary privations shall lose it. But he who would surrender his life for Christ's sake shall find it in a joyous here and hereafter, in the presence and service of Christ.—H. C. Trumbull.

"He Just Grins When They Tease Him."

The door opened quickly and Bobby stumbled in, pulling his somewhat reluctant cousin, Jack.

"Mother! O Mother!" called Bobby.

Mother, who was Mrs. Bridges, came hurriedly into the room.

"What is it, Son?" she asked—then stopped in amazement as she saw Jack with his face bloody and his left eye fast swelling shut. "What have you boys been doing? Jack, have you been fighting?"

"Yessum," he muttered, just as his father, Mrs. Bridges' brother, entered.

"What's the trouble, Jack, my lad?"

"He and Bill Fibley had a terrible fight!" explained Bobby who had kept silent as long as possible.

"What in the world were you fighting about?" inquired Mrs. Bridges.

"He just picks on me all of the time, and I won't let any one rag me all the time," sullenly answered the youthful combatant.

"Well, Son, you certainly aren't a beauty right now, but a fellow has to stand up for himself and his own rights," commended his father.

"I'm not sure of the advisability of preaching such a philosophy to these boys, Fred," reproved his sister.

"Shucks, Sis, don't kids have to do a certain amount of fisticuffing?"

"No, I do not think it necessary," said Sis, ministering seriously as she went about the work of giving first aid to her little nephew.

The two boys had just come home from the afternoon school session, and as she worked she encouraged them to tell her more fully about the trouble.

"Mother, you know Bill and the other second grade boys all like to tease the first graders—especially Jack and Densil."

"Why Jack and Densil?"

"I don't know—unless it is because they both get so mad."

"It's just for meanness and 'cause they have a spite against me," complained Jack.

"They don't tease Chubby any more, but they sure did at first," Bobby went on to explain.

"Ah, he's a sissy don't take his own part nor nothin'," grunted Jack in disgust.

"What does he do, Son?"

"Well, he just stands and grins when they try to tease him or sometimes he laughs and says, 'Go on and chase yourself'."

"He's not brave enough to stand up for himself," broke in Jack.

"Oh, yes, he's brave, Jack! Don't you remember when they were teasing your little Dorothy and Tom slapped her? Chubby doubled up his fist and went right after him and made them quit. He told me that his mother said if he got mad at a little teasing he wasn't a good sport nor a gentleman," confided Bob. "Is that what you think, Mother? Is that why you don't want me to fight when I get teased?"

"Yes, Bobby, I think Chubby must have a very sensible mother, and I agree with her that a real sport and a true gentleman does not fight except on very rare occasions and when by doing so he helps others as much or more than himself."

Jack twisted around where he could see his aunt better as he joined in again.

"Don't we have to take our own part, Aunt Frances? Won't the other fellows run over us if we don't fight them?"

"Oh, they might, sometimes but not very often. This isn't the first time you have fought Bill, is it?"

Jack shook his head negatively.

"Well, does he stop teasing you?"

"No, he doesn't, and I'm going to fight him every time until he does stop it." An angry expression was again on the little fellow's face.

"Listen, Jack, do they tease Chubby any more?"

"No! Not hardly ever."

"He didn't fight them to make them quit. Bobby said he just grinned at them and refused to get angry or to pay attention to the teasing. That is what will stop them more quickly than anything you can do. They just keep on teasing you because it makes you angry and because you will fight about it."

"I declare, Sis," exclaimed her brother who had been watching and listening all this time, "I believe you are right about this! I am partly to blame for Jack's attitude, for I did not want him to be a softy but neither do I want him to be too ready to fight. Of course, selfish fights over trivial things won't do a boy any good. Jack, you and I will talk this over later. I must think back to the time when I was a little boy, first. We'll all go for a ride, now."—Mrs. W. B. Bailey.

When Lee Came Home.

Dr. William E. Hatcher, in his book "Along the Trail of the Friendly Years", as an eye-witness, gives a vivid picture of General Lee's return to Richmond after the surrender at Appomattox:

"But I saw another sight in connection with Richmond's fall which I confess thrilled me a thousand times more than all the glory of the victorious armies of the Republic. It was a spectacle that broke upon me most unexpectedly; it came while the heavens were black with storm and the streets were wild with flooding rains.

"What I saw was a horseman. His steed was bespattered with mud, and his head hung down as if worn by long traveling. The horseman himself sat rigid with self-respecting griefs; his garments were worn in the service and stained with travel; his hat was slouched and spattered with mud and only another unknown horseman rode with him, as if for company and for love.

"Even in the fleeting moment of his passing my gate, I was awed by his incomparable dignity. His majestic composure, his rectitude and his sorrow, were so wrought and blended into his visage and so beautiful and impressive to my eyes that I fell into violent weeping. To me there was only one where this one was there could be only one that day, and that one was still my own revered and cherished leader, stainless in honor, resplendent and immortal even in defeat, my own, my peerless chieftain, Robert E. Lee.

"In that lone way, in the midst of rain and mire, with no crowds to hail him, with no resounding shouts to welcome him, with no banners flapping about him, did he come back from disastrous war? But, ah! we did not know. Conquered and solitary he was, but yet he wore invisible badges of victory; he carried spoils of honor and conquest which could never fail, and in every step of his sad moving he was marching forward to take his place in the balance courts of universal fame."

WALKING WITH GOD.

Who walks with God must take His way
Across far distances and gray
To goals that others do not see,
Where others do not care to be.
Who walks wth God must have no fear
When danger and defeat appear,
Nor stop when every hope seems gone,
For God, our God, moves ever on.

Who walks with God must press ahead
When sun or cloud is overhead,
When all the waiting thousand cheer,
Or when they only stop to sneer;
When all the challenge leaves the hours
And naught is left but jaded powers,
But he will some day reach the dawn,
For God, our God, moves ever on.

LIFE.

Maude Mumma.

Life—not good enough—
Ah! vain and foolish stuff;
To say these idle words to me,
When I have seen a bird and tree!

I have seen enough in dreams,
To furnish me a thousand themes;
And when I behold a rose,
My heart with gladness overflows!

When I hear the song of wren,
My heart with gladness sings again
Its praise to Him who made for me
The bird, the flower, and the tree.

The Invincible Leader.

"Tell me a story about when you were a great soldier. Tell me about one of the battles you won," said a little boy to his grandfather.

The old man had been a colonel in the Austrian army for many years and could recount fierce tales of conquest by his troops. But today he shook his head as he took the boy upon his knee.

"I will tell you, instead," he said, "of the greatest battle I ever lost, which was won by braver men than mine."

The little boy was astonished, for he thought that his grandfather's soldiers were the bravest in the world. So he listened eagerly.

"I was commanded," the old colonel began, "to march against a little town in the Tyrol and lay seige to it. We had been meeting stubborn resistance in that part of the country, but we felt that we should win because all of the advantages were on our side. My confidence, however, was arrested by a remark from a prisoner we had taken. 'You will never take that town,' he said, 'for they have an Invincible Leader."

"'What does that fellow mean?' I inquired of one of my staff. 'And who is this leader of whom he speaks?'

"Nobody seemed able to answer my question, and so in case there should be some truth in the report, I doubled preparations.

"As we descended through the pass in the Alps, I saw with surprise that the cattle were still grazing in the valley and that women and children—yes, and even men—were working in the fields.

"'Either they are not expecting us, or this is a trap to catch us,' I thought to myself. As we drew nearer the town we passed people on the road. They smiled and greeted us with a friendly word, and then went on their way. So friendly was their attitude toward us, and so different from the usual reception given us, that my soldiers forgot they were under discipline and returned the greeting.

"Finally we reached the town and clattered upon the cobble-paved streets—colors flying, horns sounding a challenge, arms in readiness. The forge of the blacksmith's shop was glowing, and the smith left it to stand in the door with a number of others to watch us pass. Suddenly he waved to one of my soldiers and I heard him exclaim, 'I knew that fellow when we were boys together at Innsburch!'

"Women came to the windows or doorways with little babies in their arms. Some of them looked startled and held the babies closer, then went quietly on with their household tasks without panic or confusion. As for the boys—little fellows like you, my son," the old man cuddled the boy in his arms; "they made us feel as though we were taking part in a glorious parade for their special amusement. They swarmed after us, whooping with delight and asking innumerable questions about the weapons we carried. Apparently they had never seen guns and swords before.

"It was impossible to keep strict discipline, and I began to feel rather foolish. My soldiers answered the questions of the children, and I saw one old warrior throw a kiss to a little golden-haired tot on a doorstep. 'Just the size of my Liza,' he muttered.

"Still no sign of an ambush. We rode straight to the open square on which faced the town hall. Here, if anywhere, resistance was to be expected. This is what we found. The door of the beautiful old building was wide open. Pigeons flew up from the grass around the fountain as we approached. No cannon or barricade was in sight, and my regiment, as it poured into the square, looked out of place.

"Just as I had reached the hall and my guard was drawn up at attention, an old white-haired man, who by his insignia I surmised to be the mayor, stepped forth, followed by ten men in simple peasants' costume. They were all dignified and unabashed by the armed force before them—the most terrible soldiers of the great army of Austria."

"And what did this old man say, in the face of your guns and your cannon?" asked the little boy breathlessly.

"He walked down the steps, straight to my horse's side, and with hand extended, cried, 'Welcome, brother!' One of my aides made a gesture as if to strike him down with his sword, but I saw by the face of the old mayor that this was no trick on his part.

"'Where are your soldiers?' I demanded.

"'Soldiers? Why, don't you know we have none!' he replied in wonderment, as though I had said, 'Where are your giants?' or 'Where are your dwarfs?'

"'But we have come to take the town.'

"'Well, no one will stop you.'

"'Are there none here to fight?'

"At this question, the old man's face lit up with a rare smile that I will always remember. Often afterwards, when engaged in bloody warfare, I would suddenly see that man's smile—and somehow, I come to hate my business. His words were simply:

"'No, there no one here to fight. We have chosen Christ for our Leader, and He taught men another way.'"

"What did you do then, grandfather?" asked the little boy eagerly.

"Do you know, son," the old soldier answered, "there seemed nothing left for us to do but to ride away, leaving the town unmolested. It was impossible to take it. If I had ordered my soldiers to fire on those smiling men, women and children, I knew they would not have obeyed me. Even military discipline had its limits. Could I command the grizzly soldier to shoot down the child who reminded him of his Liza? I reported to headquarters that the town had offered unassailable resistance, although this admission injured my military reputation. But I was right. We had literally been conquered by these simple folk who followed implicitly the leadership of Jesus Christ."—Pilgrim Elementary Teacher.

THE MARKETS OF THE YEAR.

We sleep and wake and sleep, but all things move.
The sun flies forward to his brother suns;
The dark earth follows—wheeled in his eclipse;
And human things, returned on themselves,
Move onward, leading up the golden year.

Fly, happy, happy sails, and bear the press;
Fly happy with the mission of the cross;
Knit land to land, and blowing heavenward
With silks and fruits and spices, clear of toll,
Enrich the markets of the golden year.
—Tennyson.

Holding Rusty.

Arnold had come to the farm with his mother. It was the first time he had seen the place where they were going to live, and it seemed very wonderful to the boy who had always lived in the city. The fields were as large as a park, and he could see only one house. His mother said the Bartletts lived there and Arnold hoped there was a boy who would be his playmate.

Arnold ran through the big, empty farm house, and watched for the furniture van that would bring his father and their furniture over the hill. Then he found a bunch of keys that would unlock the barn doors, and the hen houses and a rickety shed.

"Oh, my!" cried Arnold with delight, when he looked into that shed. He saw a workbench by the window, a rack of carpenter tools, a box of different sized nails, and some smooth boards. "Here's just the play shop I wanted, all ready to work in and with a key to the door."

He went in and closed the door. That was why he didn't hear the wagon wheels rattle on the driveway. The first thing he knew the door was opened from the outside and a boy looked in.

"Hello!" said the boy, surprised to see Arnold there.

"Hello!" said another boy, who sat in an open wagon he had backed up to the doorstep.

"Hello!" said Arnold, wondering what they wanted.

"We're Rob and Ray, the Bartlett boys who live at the next place," said the one who had opened the door. "We've come for the shop things Mr. Cushing left here for us. He used to live here, and he said we could have these tools to use in the play shop we've fixed up at home."

"I thought I was going to have a play shop here," said Arnold, trying not to show his disappointment.

"Huh! your father said he is going to pull this old shed down. It's tumbling to pieces."

"Perhaps you'll let me come to your play shop sometimes," said Arnold.

"Oh, you're too small for that!" said Rob.

"Want to hold Rusty while we load up?" asked Ray, who saw that his brother's unkind speech had made Arnold feel badly. "Rusty is a good horse. Just hold one rein in each hand and he'll keep still."

Arnold got up on the wagon seat beside the rust-colored horse, and felt very glad to be trusted to hold the reins. He heard the big red and green furniture van coming over the hill and turning into the yard, but he had seen so many furniture vans that he did not bother to watch it. But the country horse had never before seen anything that looked like this moving, noisy, colored house. The nearer it came the more frightened Rusty was. The Bartlett boys were in the shed, packing the tools.

"Keep right still, good horse!" said Arnold, holding the reins tightly.

The next minute Rusty started to run right across the big field. Arnold was frightened to feel the wagon lurch under him. He would have been more frightened if he had known that Rusty was running straight toward a wide ditch. But he held the reins, and braced his feet on the footboard and called clearly, "Whoa, good horse! I say, whoa! I'm going to stay right here. Hi, Rusty, good horse!"

His firm voice and that tight hold on the reins quieted Rusty, so he began to run slower and stopped at the very edge of the ditch.

Then Arnold saw that the Bartlett boys and the furniture van driver and his father were running toward him.

"Good work!" cried Ray Bartlett, when he reached Rusty's head.

Rob Bartlette got up on the wagon seat beside Arnold, but he didn't offer to take the reins.

"You drive back," he said. "And, say, I'll find another key for our play shop, so you can get in when you want to. Small size doesn't count against a boy with your pluck."—Exchange.

Little Green Caterpillar.

Once upon a time there lived in a meadow a little green caterpillar.

Little green caterpillar was very happy, and why should he not be happy? The great golden sun in the blue sky shone down brightly. The flowers nodded pleasantly. The birds sang overhead. Best of all the waving grasses tasted, oh, so good for the little green caterpillar was always hungry.

"You are very ugly, little green caterpillar, and very lazy, too," said the ants as they passed. "All day long you lie in the sunshine and do nothing but eat."

Little green caterpillar looked up and smiled, but went on eating.

The bumble bee stopped with a message from spider, the spinner. He, too, said to the little green caterpillar, "How very ugly you are". This time there was a sigh but little green caterpillar went on eating.

A cloud of butterflies passed by on their way to the butterfly ball. They smiled kindly on little green caterpillar and said, "Wise little green caterpillar, just eat, and eat, and eat!"

And so little green caterpillar went on eating until he became so tired and sleepy that he no longer cared to eat; then he began to hunt for a warm bed in which to rest himself. He was so tired he could hardly crawl to the lowest branch of a nearby bush. There he found a nice green leaf in which to wrap himself from the cold wind which commenced to blow. Little green caterpillar pulled his green blanket over his head but his toes were cold. "I must spin a shell," sighed the little green caterpillar for he was very sleepy now.

So little green caterpillar began to spin, and spin, and spin. By and by his toes and even his nose were covered with a pretty gray silken sheet. So little green caterpillar curled himself up in his cocoon cradle and went to sleep.

Soon Jack Frost came dancing along, the merry little elf. He patted lovingly the heads of the nuts, and made a mirror of the pond behind the barn. Little green caterpillar had pulled the covers over his head so tightly that Jack Frost could not find even a wee, wee hole to peep in. And the little green caterpillar slept on.

The North Wind rocked little green caterpillar's cocoon cradle and howled: "Whoo! whoo! whoo!" But little green caterpillar slept on.

The Snow King came creeping over the mountains throwing a winter cloak over everything. Over the meadow and the bushes and over everything he spread the white snow-cloak. It covered the little cocoon cradle.

But the little caterpillar slept on.

He slept until the North Wind ceased rocking the cocoon cradle. Then the Snow King took his white cloak and hurried away over the hills to the land of ice and snow. The brooks and rivers were free again and danced down the mountains to find the sea.

The trees dressed themselves in their new green leaves. Soon the flowers pushed their heads through the brown earth. Then the little green caterpillar awoke. He crept out of his cocoon and stretched himself.

It was a warm spring day and the bumble bee came lazily buzzing along to make his first calls on his friends in the fields. He paused at the cocoon cradle. It was empty. But there beside it with his wings spread ready for flight was—not the ugly little green caterpillar—but a beautiful meadow brown butterfly.—Kindergarten Magazine.

A Story of Lights.

The night had come. The sun had disappeared, and birds had tucked their heads beneath their wings to rest. A night bird flew close to an electric light.

"Of what use are you?" asked the bird. "You give so little light compared with the sun!"

"I do the best I can," said the light. "Think how dark this corner would be if I were not here! People walking and driving might run into one another and some one might get hurt."

"That's true," said the bird, and away he flew. Then he came near a gaslight, standing apart from houses and busy streets.

"Of what use are you?" asked the bird. "You do not give as much light as the electric light!"

"I do the best I can," said the light. "Do you not see that steep bank beyond? If I were not here, some one might fail to see it and fall."

"That's true," said the bird, and away he flew. Soon his sharp eye spied a lamp in a window.

"Of what use are you?" asked the bird. "You do not give even as much light as the gas light."

"I do the best I can. I am in the window to throw light down the path, that Farmer Brown may see the way when he comes home. I do my best."

"That's true," said the bird, and away he flew.

But again his sharp eye spied a light —a tiny candle-light in the nursery window.

"Of what use are you?" asked the bird. "Your light is so small! You do not give as much light as a lamp."

"I do the best I can," said the candle, "and I can be easily carried from room to roo, Nurse uses me when she gives the children a drink at night, or sees them snugly covered up in bed. I do the best I can."

"That's true," said the bird, and away he flew, thinking: "The little and great, all are helpers!"—Kindergarten Review.

IN REPLY TO MR. CRAIGHILL.

January 4, 1929.

The Rev. Francis H. Craighill,
Rocky Mount, North Carolina.

Dear Mr. Craighill:

Thank you very much for your Christmas card and for your long letter on matters pertaining to our recent correspondence.

I do not believe that the ordinarily accepted view of evolution is in accord with the Scripture teaching, and I believe that ambitious young minds are often led far astray from the paths of truth by indulgence in idle words and vain conversations. From my viewpoint, the academicians and theorists are led astray by ambition to ferret out the unknowable. The finite mind cannot grasp the infinite, and as the great Bible scholar, Canon Dyson Hague, says, evolution is largely a superstructure of dubious probabilities reared upon a foundation of unquestionable improbabilities.

As long as Christ lives, the Bible will live, even unto eternity. The heresy of today is not the orthodoxy of tomorrow. The world does not need any reinterpretation of our old Bible, but it does need universal distribution of this greatest of all books. "Thy Word is truth." "Go ye into all the world and preach THE GOSPEL." The New Testament is concealed in the Old and the Old Testament is revealed in the New. We are not told to preach the emanations perambulations of over active, egotistical brains who have hit side tracks in the field of imaginations and suppositions and call the same evolution. "Blind unbelief is sure to err and scan his work in vain. God is His own interpreter, and He will make it plain." "Unless ye be converted and become as a little child ye cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven." "Without faith it is impossible to please God."

As long as I believe that the modern, so-called theory of evolution is pure fiction and imagination of over-ambitious minds (by ambition fell the angels), I believe it would be wrong to propagate any views tending to substantiate a false theory; hence I do not think it wise to publish any of your articles advocating the modern theory of evolution. We are overcrowded with strong, virile, Bible-believing articles and have no space to spare for any theories not in full accord with the Bible teachings.

I accept the entire Bible as far as my own reason carries me, and I then accept all of the rest on faith, knowing full well that my infinitesimal, minute, human mind cannot possible comprehend the workings of the mind of an omniscient God, blessed for evermore.

Hold fast to the Christian plan of salvation and avoid the side tracks of evolution, etc., which profit nothing, but lead to hell in a confused unbelief. "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life" and they are they which testify of a merciful and loving God and Saviour.

"An atheist's laugh is a poor exchange for deity offended."

Yours very truly,
Langbourne M. Williams.

About the Polar Bear.

Of all the animals of the Arctic, perhaps there are none more interesting than the polar bears. Their manner of living, immense size, great strength and valuable coat all go toward making them unique and attractive.

The polar bear is a great hunter and fisher. He is a rapid swimmer, and can glide over the smooth surface of the ice at a surprising rate. Many a king salmon has taken a nap beneath the surface of the ocean's ice, never to awake—a big white bear got him. He has been known to kill the white whale, which is twelve to fifteen feet in length and may weigh twice as much as he does. The bear is swifter beneath the water than is the white whale. Having discovered his prey, he constantly follows him, tires him, beats him into unconsciousness with his powerful paw, then leaves him to die and to drift ashore to supply him a belated dinner.

The white bear will lie for hours beside a seal hole in the ice. With nose covered by his paws to make him look all white like the ice, with eyes all but closed, he watches until the seal has climbed out upon the ice. Then he suddenly springs between him and his hole and catches him on the ice.

The polar bear is a wasteful hunter. He leaves the half-eaten carcasses of his prey to freeze on the ice, while he presses on to new hunting grounds. For this reason the white fox follows him, living on the remains of his feasts. When the Eskimo sees white bear tracks on the shore ice, he gets out his fox traps and sets them, for he is sure of a catch.

Though the white bear is a clever hunter, he is not good at eluding those who hunt him. Perhaps this is because he lives, for the most part, far from the haunts of men and dogs, and knows nothing about them. If he chances to come upon a dog, it is as likely as not that he will want to play with him. It is for this reason that the Eskimo hunter takes two or three dogs with him on the hunt. When he sights a bear he turns the dogs loose and they engage the bear's attention while he is coming close enough to get in a fatal shot.

When dogs worry a white bear, he bends his long neck and seizes them by the skin of their back. He then gives his neck a sudden twist and sends them whirling into space. A well-trained bear dog on being thrown, doubles himself into a round ball. When he strikes the ice he goes rolling over and over, to spring up unharmed.

When very hungry, the white bear has no objection to fresh dog meat as food. He has been known to come aboard an exploring ship, frozen into the ice, drag a dog from his kennell and carry him away for his dinner.

It is Stefansson who tells of hunting a polar bear who turned the tables about and hunted him. Mr. Stefansson, being in need of food, and having sighted a bear out among a great number of ice piles, struck out in the general direction in which the bear was last seen.

He had traveled a long way and had about concluded to give up the hunt when he heard a sudden, strange sound behind him. It was like the hiss of a goose. Turning quickly, he found himself facing a huge, grinning white bear, who was not twenty feet away. Had not the bear uttered this friendly word of warning, this story might never have been told.—Exchange.

He who stand the little trials is fitted for the great trusts.—Ex.

BISHOP WINCHESTER, OLIVER ORR and PHILIP MOWRY SMITH

Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

My Dear Mr. Williams:

Can you use the enclosed sketch in the Southern Churchman? If not, let me have it back.

Richmond of my day was a wonderful Christian city and I thank God for my ministry there as deacon. I may send an article on Bishop Wilmer, the devoted friend of Dr. Peterkin and my first Bishop after I became a Presbyter.

You are doing splendid work with the Southern Churchman, our family paper from boyhood.

Faithfully yours,

JAMES R. WINCHESTER.

Little Rock, Ark.

Hon. Langbourne M. Williams, President of Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

My Dear Friend:

I am sure Professor J. R. Moseley will appreciate the courtesy you have extended to him, and also will Colonel Warren Grice. With best wishes for Christmas to you and yours, and all who are associated with you in your great paper, I feel like it is a message from heaven each week and its influence is as far-reaching as the sunlight, and that means it goes deep into every heart.

Sincerely,

OLIVER ORR.

Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

Dear Sirs:

"Southern Churchman", because of its staunch and uncompromising defense of the faith, has, through its weekly visits, won a BIG place for itself in my heart.

In His name,

PHILIP MOWRY SMITH.

54461 Cabanne Ave.,
St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 3, 1929.

Dear Sirs:

Enclosed find three dollars, for which continue my subscription to the Southern Churchman for another year. Am so proud of the way you are fighting these "Anglo-Catholics". Why don't they want the Church to progress in the right way? Not go back to the pre-Reformation days.

I certainly enjoy your paper; but don't or can't read any other of the so-called Church papers.

Sincerely,

(Miss) M. E. ZIMMERMAN.

Our Mountain Mission Home

St. Andrew's Mountain Mission

Peidmont Parish, Marshall, Va.

REV. W. B. EVERETT, III, Rector

A STATEMENT

About two years ago we began making a special appeal for funds with which to purchase a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country. From north, south, east and west—from far-away Japan came the welcome checks to help buy the property and to furnish necessary equipment. Old friends, new friends, and entire strangers, numerous branches of the Woman's Auxiliary and Section B kindly opened their hearts and loosened their purse strings. To these many generous friends we wish to extend our grateful thanks and hearty appreciation. God has blessed us, and may He bless these many donors, as doubtless He will, through their gifts to these needy and deserving children of our one Father.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

If you, who have helped us to help these long-neglected mountain people, could visit St. Andrew's Mission, as we hope you will, you would see for yourselves what a great help it is to our work to have this splendid and convenient home, that you have so generously helped to provide.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00. We must pay six per cent interest on deferred payments, and wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of debt. We are striving to raise the next $1,000 payment promptly. Who will help? If twenty persons will subscribe in cash or instalments $50 each, we will have the $1,000. If forty will subscribe $25, or one hundred will subscribe $10 we will have the thousand. Any amount will be most acceptable. What will YOU do?

The Right Rev. William Cabell Brown, late Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia, heartily endorsed this appeal. The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, also endorses it.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $.....to be paid in cash or instalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mrs. Chambers.

Resolved, that the vestry of Cunningham Chapel Parish, Clarke county, Va., expresses the sorrow of the parish and of the whole community at the passing of MRS. CHAMBERS.

Only four years ago she came unknown to live among us, but by her warm and understanding heart and her desire and abilities for helpfulness to the parish she quickly made a place for herself which has marked the friendship and admiration of all who knew her.

We each of us shall miss her, and wish individually to express our sympathy to her family. It is further

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be sent her family, be published in the Southern Churchman, and be spread on the minutes of the vestry.

ROBERT BEVERLEY.

Resolutions on the Death of Robert Beverley.

At a called meeting of the vestry of St. Anne's Parish, Essex county, Va., on January 3, 1929, the following resolutions were passed:

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to take from our midst our beloved friend, ROBERT BEVERLEY, who died at his home, "Blandfield", on December 28, 1928. Be it resolved—

First. That in the loss of Mr. Beverley that we, the vestry of St. Anne's Parish, in deep appreciation of his ability, wisdom, faithfulness and friendship, in affectionate regard for his character and personality, in recognition of his services, record our loss and join with the parish, Diocese and Church at large in respectful tribute to his memory.

Second. We desire to bear testimony to his uprightness of character, purity of life, a devoted husband and father, loyal friend and faithful in the discharge of his duties in every capacity. He was a faithful friend to the cause of missions and spared neither his labor, talents or means to this purpose.

Third. We desire that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his bereaved family, published in the Southern Churchman, the Virginia Churchman, and spread on the minutes of our vestry.

LATANE SALE, Senior Warden;
RICHARD BAYLOR, Secretary;
R. U. BROOKING, Rector.

MRS. EMMA CARRINGTON RIELY.

EMMA CARRINGTON RIELY, widow of the late Judge John William Riely, of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, died on December 16, 1928, at Halifax, Va., in the home of her son-in-law, Henry H. Edmunds, which was also formerly her own home and at which most of her married life was passed. She was the last surviving member of the family of her parents, Henry Carrington and Louisa Elizabeth Cabell, of "Ingleside", Charlotte county, Va., where she was born on January 22, 1843. It is interesting to note that in the long lives of herself, her father, and her grandfather, Judge Paul Carrington, the elder, who was born on March 5, 1733, almost two centuries were spanned. Her grandparents on her mother's side were Judge William H. Cabell and his first wife Elizabeth Cabell.

She was born and came to maturity under conditions largely typical of the old South and retained through life an intense loyalty to the life and traditions of that day. Gifted in mind and memory, she was noted among those who knew her for her clear recollection and lively narrative of the events and experiences of that period, especially of the war years of 1861-1865, the emotions and sacrifices of which were to her sacred. But many will not forget also the light cast about companionship with her in the deep love of much that is good in literature which had come to her during early life in the atmosphere of a quiet and secluded home in which books were a chief resource.

Giving little acceptance to some present-day views, her conception of duty was to her church, her family and home, her relatives and friends. Within that sphere she met responsibility with steadfastness and devotion that never wavered.

With her there passes another of the links that bind us to the old order. What does not pass is the memory which she leaves of firmness for right and truth, loyalty to the ties that life brings, and fidelity to the standard in which she believed and by which personal purity and uprightness and consecration to the home are the test of true womanhood.

Teacher Training Course.

The Department of Religious Education of the Diocese of Washington has announced a Teacher Training Course, to which all are invited and for which certificates from the National Accredited Teachers' Association will be given to all students who satisfactorily pass a written test at the end of the course. The Rev. Christopher P. Sparling, rector of the Church of the Prince of Peace, Baltimore, and formerly rector of St. John's Church, Georgetown, will be the lecturer, and his subject will be, "The Bible, Book by Book". The lectures will be given in St. John's Parish Hall, Sixteenth Street, January 16-18, and January 21-25, all lectures beginning at 8 P. M.

Missionary Meeting.

The annual joint missionary meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary and Sunday-School Institute of the Diocese of Washington was held in Epiphany Parish Hall January 15, at 8 P. M. All interested persons were invited and a good number was there to welcome the speaker, Mrs. William Coyllie, wife of the Archdeacon of the Dominican Republic. Under the title, "Spreading the Kingdom in the Land of Columbus", Mrs. Wyllie told of her life and work in the almost unknown interior of the Island of Santo Domingo among a primitive native population, to whom she brings their only contact with the outside world.

Archdeacon Wyllie has two assistant ministers with him in the Dominican Republic. His wife, however, is his principal assistant in social work accomplished by the mission. During the influenza epidemic the Wyllies organized a hospital in Santo Domingo City which is today a flourishing institution. Their work in building schools and churches also is exceptional. The missionaries not only administer to the spiritual needs of the large American population engaged in the sugar industry, but devote considerable attention to the native population living in the jungle.

Annual Fellowship Dinner.

Hon. George Wharton Pepper and Dr. William C. Sturgis have accepted the invitation to deliver addresses at the annual fellowship dinner in honor of Bishop Freeman, to be held at the New Willard Hotel, February 5. Bishop Freeman will also be one of the principal speakers. This will be the third dinner given by the Washington laymen in honor of Bishop Freeman and it is felt that much inspiration to greater lay activities is gained by these fellowship dinners.

Mr. Pepper has rendered distinguished service to the Episcopal Church in successive General Conventions. He played a prominent part in the deliberations of the General Convention last October. Since his retirement from the Senate he has been devoting much time to Washington Cathedral, being a member of the Cathedral Chapter and chairman of the National Executive Committee.

Dr. Sturgis was for ten years Educational Secretary of the Department of Missions under the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He now is initiating a series of week-end conferences for laymen under the auspices of the College of Preachers of Washington Cathedral. M. M. W.

Sale of Church Property.

Sale of the extensive property at present occupied by the Church of the Heavenly Rest and Chapel of the Beloved Disciple at 63-67 East Eighty-ninth Street, to the Reformed Church of Harlem, was announced December 23 simultaneously by the rector of the former, the Rev. Dr. Henry Darlington, and the Rev. Edgar Tilton, Jr., pastor of the latter, at morning services in the two churches.

The contract, according to Dr. Darlington and the Rev. Mr. Tilton, was negotiated Friday, consideration involved being $425,000. The date for the passing of the title has been set for February 15, 1929. Date for terminating the present occupancy of the Eighty-ninth Street buildings has not yet been determined.

According to Mr. Tilton the Reformed Church will begin complete redecorations and necessary alterations of the church building, chapel, parish house and rectory immediately upon the withdrawal of the present incumbents.

This sale marks another step in the fulfillment of the plans for financing the Heavenly Rest's handsome new building now nearing completion at Ninetieth Street and Fifth Avenue. "We are still holding to our original financial schedule," stated Dr. Darlington. "We have achieved the goal announced at the completion of the first financial campaign, having now raised all but the $500,000 needed to finance our $3,200,000 goal.

Personal Notes

Bishop Nathaniel Thomas has accepted appointment as bishop in charge of American Churches in Europe for 1929. His present address is Bethesda Church, Palm Beach, Fla.

The Rev. Walter Archbold, D. D., has been appointed to take charge of Mission of Good Shepherd, Milford, Pa., and two small mission chapels, one at Dingman's Ferry and the other at Sawkill. He will take up his new work on February 1, 1929. Dr. Archbold was the rector of St. John's Church, Ashland, Pa.

The Rev. John Henry Lehn, a Deacon on the staff of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., was appointed to take charge of the St. John's Memorial Church, Ashland, effective February 1, 1929. Mr. Lehn came to us from the Lutheran Church.

..Without stating a reason the Rev. Mr. Winecoff suddenly offered his resignation to the vestry of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Scranton, Pa., to take effect not later than March 1, 1929, but soon if a successor be found.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Arthur Edward Marston, Deacon, was advanced to the Priesthood in St. Paul's Church, East St. Louis, Ill., on the Sunday after Christmas, December 30, by the Rt. Rev. John Chanler White, D. D., Bishop of the diocese. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Wm. H. Tomlins, retired, formerly priest-in-charge of St. Bartholomew's, Granite City. The Rev. Mr. Marston came into the Church from another denomination, and has been serving most of his diocanote in East St. Louis as assistant to the rector, who is also the head of the Archdeaconry of Alton. For the time being at least the Rev. Mr. Marston will continue as assistant in East St. Louis.

George Wyndham Ridgway was ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Campbell Gray, D. D., S. T. D., at 9:30 o'clock Wednesday morning, January 2, at St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Mishawaka, Ind.

Bishop Gray's sermon was followed by the presentation of the Candidate for Holy Orders by the Very Rev. Lewis G. Rogers, Dean of the Pro-Cathedral, at which time the Bishop commended the candidate to the prayers of the congregation. Dean Rogers read the litany.

At the appointed place, the ordinand was vested in maniple, stole and dalmatic, and after the laying on of hands, was presented with the New Testament and the Chalice, after which he read the Gospel.

Those assisting the Bishop at the Holy Communion included Archdeacon Joseph William Gubbins, Huntington, Chaplain; the Very Rev. L. C. Rogers, Mishawaka, presenter; the Rev. A. L. Schrock, Goshen, master of ceremonies; the Rev. E. E. Smith, Trinity (Hungarian) Church, South Bend, and the Rev. Lawrence C. Ferguson, St. James, South Bend.

The Rev. Mr. Ridgway resides at Detroit, Mich., but is canonically resident of St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Mishawaka, having been recently transferred from the Diocese of West Missouri. He will return to the Theological Seminary of the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., where he will complete his studies in preparation for his ordination to the priesthood.

The Rev. Harold C. Sende was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop McElwain on Holy Innocents' Day, December 28, at Gethsemane Church, Appleton, Minn. The Rev. C. C. Rollit, D. D., was the presenter and the preacher.

The Rev. Harry Lee Woodward was ordained priest on Friday, December 21, 1928, at St. Mark's Church, Shelby, Ohio. Presenter, the Rev. Lane Barton, of Newark; preacher, the Venerable Gerald F. Patterson, Archdeacon of the Diocese of Ohio. The Rt. Rev. Warren Lincoln Rogers, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Ohio, presided. A number of clergymen were present. The Rev. Mr. Woodward has had charge of St. Mark's, Shelby, during the last year, while completing his theological preparation at Bexley Hall. He has been called to be rector of St. Luke's Church, Niles, Ohio, effective January 1, 1929.

The Rev. Morgan Cilley was advanced to the Priesthood in Emmanuel Church, Keyser, W. Va., on December 16, 1928. The Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, Bishop-Coadjutor of West Virginia, officiated. The Rev. Paca Kennedy, D. D., preached the sermon. The Rev. Jay Johnson Dimon, D. D., rector of St. Andrew's Church, Washington, D. C., presented the candidate. Mr. Cilley will continue his work as minister-in-charge of Emmanuel Church, Keyser, St. Stephen's, Romney and Emmanuel Church, Moorefield, W. Va. He will reside in Romney.

DEATHS.

The Rev. William DuHamel passed to life eternal on December 24, 1928. He was a missionary of St. Gabriel's Church, Bethlehem, for many years. He had been in failing health for some time. Bishop Sterrett had charge of the funeral services, which were held in the Church at Douglassville, Pa., on December 27, 1928. A large concourse of people gathered from all the country side to pay their respects, as Mr. DuHamel was beloved by all who knew him.

He is survived only by his wife, who was a great helpmate to him in his work.

FIVE MINUTES LATE.

Five minutes late, and the school is begun;
What are the rules for, if you break every one?
Just as the scholars are seated and quiet,
You hurry in with disturbance and riot.

Five minutes late, and the table is spread,
The children are seated and grace has been said.
Even the baby, all sparkling and rosy,
Sits in her high chair by mamma, so cozy.

Five minutes late, with your hair all askew,
Just as the comb was hastily drawn through
There are your chair and your tumbler and plate
Cold cheer for those who are five minutes late.

Five minutes late on this bright Sabbath morn!
All the good people to meeting have gone;
People and minister look at your pew,
Little surprised when they see it's your.
And when you stand at the Beautiful Gate
What will you do if you're five minutes late?

THE ONLY THING THAT WILL SURELY BRING SALVATION

Is heart faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as being God's Son and your personal Saviour, who died for your sins and was raised again for your justification. (Rom. 4:25.)

This faith is not possible if you willingly hold on to sin. Faith in Christ should be for Him to save you from sin and make it possible for you to obey God.—Rom. 6:16.

"Repent ye, and believe the gospel."—Mk. 1:15.

"By grace are ye saved, through faith."—Eph. 2:8.

"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."—Ac. 16:31.

"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—Jno. 3:16.

"If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus (Jesus as Lord—R. V.) and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved."—Rom. 10:9.

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."—Mk. 16:16.

"That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith."—Eph. 3:17.

"The righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all that believe."—Rom. 3:22.

"Sanctified by faith that is in me; purifying their hearts by faith."—Acts 26:18; 15:9.

To John Bunyan the question came:

"Wilt thou have thy sins and go to hell, or leave thy sins and go to heaven?" Have you settled it?

REFRESHED.

There is a secret spring beside the way
To which I turn me in the heat of day,
And well refreshed am I for toil or play
Its welcome draught to share.

Out of the rock deep fathomed from my eyes
Its cooling waters silently arise,
And like an angel eager for the skies
Give answer to my prayer.

Among the winding paths I stray aside,
And night deceives me where the vale is wide,
But blindness brings me where the waters hide
A grateful truant there.

Then as my thoughts across horizons fly
At times forgetful of the soul's deep cry,
I stay a moment where the deserts sigh,
And find it everywhere.

A secret spring beside a busy way,
Pure as the sunlight on the moulding clay,
And for the friends of God who pass each day
There's plenty and to spare

—Robert MacGowan.

Christ is the living heart of the Bible and of our religion. Ethics are summed up in His commandment of love, and the salvation of the soul rests upon fellowship with Him. Every act of sacrifice is carrying His cross and every virtue proceeds from His spirit.—John Watson.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Most of the irritating things in life are soluble by love.

God hurries not nor makes delay;
Who works for Him will get His pay
Some certain hour, some certain day.
—H. J. Hamilton.

"If we had the hearts of peacemakers, nations should learn war no more."

"Faith" is the key that opens the prison gate, freeing the prisoner from materialism.—Rev. Wm. Porkess, D. D.

Thou Master Workman, grant us grace
The challenge of our tasks to face;
By loyal scorn of second best,
By effort true to meet each test.
—Selected.

To have a past that we are not ashamed of is a valuable possession; that is one possession we must make for ourselves.—Selected.

A man who refuses to join the church because of the "hypocrites who belong to it" is like a man who declines to be a citizen because some citizens are disloyal to their country.—Selected.

"There is a destiny that makes us brothers;
None goes his way alone:
All that we send into the lives of others
Comes back into our own."

"We are saved because of past missionary efforts; others are to be saved by our present missionary efforts."

"A living sacrifice" is the life poured out in loving ministry for others. How often our own lives are impoverished because we reserve them for ourselves! —Missionary Review.

Pass on the torch, pass on the flame;
Remember whence the glory came,
And eyes are on you as you run,
Beyond the shining of the sun!
—A. E. Cross.

Since from His Heaven He stoops to breathe
A flower to balmy air,
Surely our lives are not beneath
The kindness of His care.
And as He guides the blade that gropes
Up from the barren sod,
So, from the ashes of our hopes
May beauty grow toward God."

Christianity widens out the sense of brotherhood and fellowship so as to take in all men. It knows no distinctions of race or class or climate; its sense of brotherhood does not stop with red and blue lines on the map. We owe to every human being a gift as our brother, especially the higher gift of the gospel. —Dr. W. A. Squires.

Our civilization believed that it was traveling automatically by express train to Paradise, when suddenly it suffered a railroad accident and found itself in Hades—in a hell of wreckage and ruins, of lies and blood and tears. The optimism which places evil and wickedness in parentheses is no longer possible. It has abdicated. Each of us must bear the cross, the fearful symbol of the evil of the world.—Dr. Nathan Soderblom.

GENTLEMEN?

In Thackeray's "Vanity Fair" is a strongly, vividly drawn sketch of the Rev. Bute Crawley, rector, by inheritance, of the living of Crawley-cum-Snailby, of the Church of England. The Rev. Mr. Crawley was a hard riding, hard swearing, hard drinking, fox-hunting parson. He had no religion or religious belief, read the services for the stated days and occasions, drawled dreary sermons, most of them composed by his busy and rather clever wife, and when his ministerial duties were performed turned eagerly to his amusements. Rawdon Crawley, his first cousin, officer in the British army, was gambler, swindler, blackguard, like Byron's Corsair linking one virtue to a thousand crimes. Mrs. Rawdon Crawley, formerly Becky Sharp, unscrupulous and fascinating adventuress, proposed that if all else failed her husband might sell out of the army, go into the Church, take the family living and assume the functions of a clergyman.

By a coincidence, it was in the same period that Thackeray placed these products of his imagination—the period directly after Waterloo, 1815—that in Virginia two men took orders in the Church—Richard Channing Moore and William Meade. They did not seek or take established or inherited "livings". With fine natural talents and intellectual equipment, culture and the best mental training, they humbly and devoutly consecrated themselves to service of God and Christ and Church and mankind. Sincere believers, faithful Christians, they put aside all prospects of temporal gain, greatness, power and wealth, gave themselves solely to labor and struggle for the Almighty and the cause of the Redeemer, for a Church miserably poor, discredited, unpopular, its congregations scattered, parishes feeble, ruinous, diminishing. Little by little, by weary journeys over desolate roads, through wilderness and forests and over dim trails, through all changes of weather and hostility and hospitality, they did their work valiantly. They carried hope and inspiration and faith until they had re-established and restored the Church, gave comfort and strength to the aged, light and beauty to death beds, guidance and high thought and nobility of life and purpose to the young. Amid far spread darkness and confusion they achieved results, yet living in countless pious and happy households.

These Virginians were gentlemen. "Christian gentleman," so often used, is tautology. The essentials of Christianity are those of gentility. The sincere Christian is a gentleman or gentlewoman, inevitably. Bishops Moore and Meade, both born to high social stations, as clergymen are products of adversity and necessity, men whose clean and loving and heroic hearts thrilled and answered to the call of their Lord and fellow men for gallant endeavor.

Lord Bacon sagely says prosperity is the virtue of the Old Testament, adversity that of the New. One of the wisest sentences in our Litany is that in which we pray the good Lord to deliver us in all times of our prosperity as in adversity, the hour of death and the day of judgment. The Crawleys were familiar types of clergymen in Thackeray's day and before. Old English and continental literature put before us, generation after generation, pictures of Roman Catholic priests and Church of England clergy unfaithful, immoral, slavish tools and pitiful butts of their patrons. They were products of rich, secure, prosperous, ecclesiastical establishments and rotted and debased them. The Meades and Moores—some of them in most of the States of this country—were products of adversity and peril.

Now our Church faces the danger of prosperity and power. It represents vast wealth and social and commercial influence and is threatened by hosts of poisonous parasites. Alarming numbers of men lacking stable religious belief, distinctly heretical or waving in theological and intellectual chaos, seek place in its ministry or have taken orders. Plain language, however harsh, is appropriate and necessary. The Church offers many pleasant and secure places and the distinct social position always accorded to its clergy. Young men seek access and opportunity for such places as jobs, easy berths for life, reserving the right to believe or disbelieve, as their mental vagaries may direct, to accept or reject the Holy Scriptures and the doctrines, teachings and principles of the Church. The unhappy, indisputable fact is that every such man forfeits all claim to be gentleman or Christian. When he takes the ordination vows and answers the questions of the ordaining bishop he tells a lie in the most horribly sacriligious circumstances. If he rejects any part of the Creed—the Virgin Birth, the Death or Resurrection—he lies fearfully as he repeats from the chancel the sacred words.

No gentleman can stoop to profanation or falsehood. Shocking information comes from some of our theological seminaries confirming dismal indications in some publications purporting to speak to and for the Church. There is no surprise in the declaration of Editor Guy Shipley, of the New York Churchman, that he rejects much of the Old Testament as mere folk lore and fable and views the Biblical description of the last judgment, in a jocular way, as "a sort of college entrance examination". From our old-fashioned Southern Bible belt, fundamentalist, point of view—which includes the fundamentals of honor, loyalty, decency and gentility as well as those of religion—the man who finds himself at exact variance with the teachings and principles of an organization to which he has very solemnly and publicly sworn faith and allegiance, should withdraw from it frankly and openly, refuse to be identified with it or accept from it any benefits. "Traitor" is the unpleasant but accurately descriptive word applied to the person marching with the flag of an army, wearing its uniform and taking its pay while laboring to weaken and destroy it, to defeat its objects, repudiating obligations, voluntarily assumed, to the authority it represents.

For our own young men we are more interested. It is reported, on authority unquestionable, that we have in our Seminaries students who do not believe in the truth of the Bible or the future life or the Biblical account of the Saviour's birth. These men, we must assume, are like Thackeray's Crawley's, merely seeking jobs, preparing to assume solemn obligations, to swear to belief in what they do not believe, to make promises they do not intend to perform, to assume guidance of the souls of the young and direction of the hope of the old and dying by telling lies or flagrantly betraying trusts. Frankly, an open, declared, blatant Atheist is more decent and honorable than a man accepting the benefits of a Christian Church under false pretenses, taking vows while mentally repudiating them, promising solemnly, with hope of gain, what he does not intend to do, undertaking to declare and teach what he disbelieves.

If nothing else can be done, we appeal to all students at Church seminaries who are not ready to accept with their whole hearts the doctrine and teachings of the Church and to take the ordination vows and answer the ordination questions with honest, faithful, loyal hearts, to withdraw and seek other avocations. That should be the instinct and impulse of any man hoping to deserve in the eyes of the world, and to his own conscience and self-respect, the name of gentleman, the standing of a man of honor.

For the Church, better a score of Meades and Moores than a thousand Crawleys and Shipleys. The sword of the Lord and Gideon! Better for the Church three hundred stalwart, strong, plain, earnest, honest, fighting men than the twenty and two thousand afraid or the other thousands treasonable or doubtful. Let those who feel within them faith in Christ and God and the Holy Scriptures go on, emulating the spirit of Moore and Meade and working and hoping for the enduring benefits to Church and country and people that blest their efforts. Let those conscious of doubt, holding in their minds heresies which must be a treason against the Church, show the instincts of decency and the fundamentals of gentility and take themselves elsewhere, like honest men, and let any Professor at our Seminaries who does not believe in the truth and inspiration of our Bible resign and earn an honest living.

Langbourne Meade Williams.

I KINGS.

Purpose.

THE first book of Kings was written to reveal to us typically God's thought concerning the Kingdom of Israel under the reign of David's Son, the One greater than Solomon, and also to picture God's unchangeable purpose and grace, in Christ, toward the Church, in spite of her sad failure to enjoy God's blessings through the knowledge of Christ as her Lord (Ps. 89:3, 4, 34-37; Isa. 9:6, 7; Matt. 12:42; Heb. 6:12-20; 1 Cor. 10:58; Rev. 3:20).

1. Chs. 1-11. The glory of Solomon's kingdom was like the light of a candle compared to the glory of the sun, when Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, shall arise with healing in his beams (Mal. 4:2; Isa. 11:1-9; Hab. 2:14).

What blessing is ours as Christ rules in our hearts, and what glory will be ours as we rule with Him in His kingdom (Col. 3:15; Rom. 8:17; 1 Peter 5: 1, 10; Rev. 3:21; Matt. 25:20; 20, 21; John 17:22, 24).

1. Chs. 1-4. The wisdom and wealth of Solomon are not to be compared to that of the Greater than Solomon, the One in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, the One who is the Heir of all things (Col. 2:2, 3; Heb. 1:2; John 16:15).

Because we are joint-heirs with Christ, He gives us His wisdom liberally, and supplies every other need according to His unsearchable riches in glory (Rom. 8:17; James 1:5; Phil. 4:19; Eph. 3:8, 20).

2. Chs. 5-8. When He whose name is the Branch builds dedicates and fills with His glory, the temple of the Lord, in Jerusalem, the glory of Solomon's temple will be but a shadow (Zech. 6:12, 13; Hag. 2;6-9; Ezek. 40-45).

But Christ is building a temple for the habitation of God in the spirit, every part of which he fills with his glory, as he is given possession (Eph. 2:10-22; 1 Cor. 6:19, 20).

3. Chs. 9-11. Only the wisdom which is from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy, only such wisdom, which is Christ in us the hope of glory, can save us from shame (John 3:17; 1 Cor. 1:30; Prov. 1:33; Col. 1:27, 28).

II. Chs. 12-16. A heart, like a kingdom which is divided, cannot enjoy the fulness of the blessing of the Lord, and soon the pleasures of the world will spoil the joy of the Lord in the soul (2 Tim. 3:4; 4:10; Neh. 8:10; 1 Peter 1:8).

1. Ch. 12. A divided heart, a heart that is not wholly yielded to the Lord and filled with His Spirit, will covet something else to occupy thoughts and affections, which is idolatry (Col. 3:5; 1 John 5:21; Phil. 4:6, 7).

2. Chs. 13, 14. All idolatry, and idolaters will be judged and put down, not only in the coming kingdom of Christ, but in every yielded heart, by the One who is able to subdue all things unto Himself (Col. 3:6; Phil. 3:20, 21; 1:6).

3. Chs. 15, 16. Unjudged sin leads to worse sin even in believers, to say nothing of the fearful degradation that comes to apostate ones, who only have the form of godliness (1 John 5:16; 1:9; 1 Cor. 11:31, 32; 2 Thess. 2:10-13).

III. Chs. 17-22. Faithful to Israel in seeking to reveal His love to and through them, the One who is the same yesterday and today, is raising up servants who believe and obey him, like Elijah, and are thus used to bring His people back to the place of blessing in occupation with Him (Heb. 10:23; 13:8; 1 Thess. 5:24; Eph. 4:11-13).

1. Ch. 17. The servants who trust and obey the Lord as His witnesses, enjoy his care in the hidden place even in the time of judgment (Col. 3:3; 1 Peter 5:7; Phil. 4: 6, 7).

2. Chs. 18, 19. The believer who will wholly follow the Lord, like Elijah, will lead many to give up their idols and to serve the Lord (1 Thess. 1:9, 10).

3. Chs. 20-22. The Antichrist, the founder of idolatry in the apostate church, will be overthrown, and cast alive in the lake of fire (Rev. 17:16, 17; 19:20).

PASTORAL SERMON.

In a big city church which attempts little, if any, pastoral work, a visiting bishop recently preached a simple sermon from a pastoral point of view. It at once called forth a letter of appreciation which said, in part, "The clergy do not always recognize the spiritual needs of the people. We are advised to know God, to have faith and to pray, but are very rarely shown how to do this."

THE REVEREND JOSHUA PETERKIN, D. D.

A SKETCH OF A GENTLE SHEPHERD

By the Right Reverend James R. Winchester, D. D.

TO my mind the most interesting object of Saint Louis is "Shaws Garden". In the very midst of the attractive vegetation and rare flowers may be seen the exquisitely carved recumbent statue of the lover of flowers, who left his carefully earned material fortune for the enrichment of St. Louis to the object that is a joy to thousands of visitors. The statue has the figure of the munificent donor with an exquisite rose upon the breast. After meditation and admiration at the monument, over the grave, the visitor goes with inspiration around the spacious grounds, animated by a greater love for his fellow-men through the sacred lessons of the choice flowers. It is with like sentiment that the Church life of Richmond, Virginia abides in my memory. God's presence seemed to permeate the ranks of clergy and laity. I think of Richmond as the ideal church city, where brotherly love was dominant and pure religion ruled the thoughts and hearts of the people. It was my privilege, the real blessing of my early ministry, to have been placed by Bishop Whittle as assistant under Dr. Peterkin at St. James' Church, Richmond, in 1877, where I spent fourteen months of happy life. I lived in his home with the tender consideration of Mrs. Peterkin, who was as a mother to me. I had the opportunity of hearing Dr. Peterkin preach nearly every Sunday morning and during week days. Never did I hear a word of adverse criticism regarding the Holy Scriptures or a sentence derogatory to the Church. No wonder hallowed memories cluster around those days of spiritual uplift, and I thank God I have never lost the vision; and I have tried to keep his holy example before me. In the afternoons of Sunday, Dr. Peterkin had me to preach, and he delegated the night services at St. Phillip's (colored congregation) to my ministrations. I had five communicants in St. Phillip's mission and presented four for confirmation. It is now a self-sustaining church. There I learned valuable lessons and got an interest in "my brother-in-black", which followed me into my episcopate, teaching me not to despise "the day of small things". I may regard Dr. Peterkin as the instrument in God's hands of opening my eyes to the necessity of a Negro Bishop, enabling me to become the agent, years after, in securing the first Negro Bishop for work among the colored people of the United States. His patience and unceasing interest in details impressed me, as his unfailing faith worked on day by day. We had no street cars in those days in Richmond. The long walks in my pastoral duties, which he laid upon me became a blessing after my close confinement and hard work of eight years in college and seminary life, together with teaching. He saw that I needed physical exercise and recreation, and would send me to see distant parishioners in Manchester and elsewhere. It is no surprise, as I review my ministry, that "pastoral visiting" became a special of my life's work. Looking over my records I have found that my visits, up to the time of my episcopate, were 24,419. I learned the value of visiting from Dr. Peterkin, the most faithful pastor I have known. And I learned that it is a wise provision of the Church, where possible, to place Deacons under experienced and godly rectors, as assistants, instead of putting them in charge of parishes to make blunders and become discouraged. Dr. Peterkin's ministry is a model for all rectors. He had wonderful patience with all who called to see him, who "had infinite leisure", as he would say regarding some who sat indefinitely. One who had many questions to ask he denominated "Quid Nunc"? with a twinkle I shall not forget. Humor combined with patience, kept him always in a cheerful mood. A special impression made upon me during those days was that he made no effort to induce any one to become a member of St. James, rather than of another parish in the city. The Church in the city was bigger than his parish, and the diocese was bigger than Richmond. In this we see his missionary spirit, the germinal principle of the five points of service, so splendidly stressed by our National Council.

It was the custom in those days for gentlemen to go to market and bring back their groceries and meats. Dr. Peterkin did that service for his household. Sometimes he returned with articles Mrs. Peterkin did not think necessary. She would ask, "Why did you get this"? His answer was, "The poor man did not seem to be selling anything, and I thought it would help him". Such was the current report over Richmond, and I do not question it.

Richmond had a very remarkable corps of clergy, as the names will show to any one familiar with the history of the time. Dr. Minnegerode was rector of St. Paul's, Dr. Grayson Dashiel at St. Mark's, Dr. Melville Jackson (afterwards Bishop of Alabama) at Grace, Dr. Pike Powers at St. Andrew's, Dr. Weddell at St. John's, Dr. Woodbride at the Monumental, the Rev. Robert A. Gibson, first assistant at St. James, had charge of the Moore Memorial Chapel, now Holy Trinity, and the Rev. Robert S. Barrett had Christ Church. They were extraordinary preachers and scholarly men. They took me into their lives, and never did I hear a word from any one of that godly company a suggestion of doubt as to the Inspiration of the Bible, or departure from the principles of the Reformation, as embodied in "The Thirty-nine Articles" of the Prayer Book. The other Christian pulpits had strong men, whose names are enshrined in Richmond and Virginia history. Drs. Moses Hogue and Preston of the Presbyterian Church stand out conspicuously. There was a Christian fellowship with all ministers of the oGspel, and I learned from them to cooperate with all who love our Lord, never compromising any matter of the Church. Dr. Peterkin took leadership in Christian cooperation. He was scholarly, though not always noted for what he richly deserved. I was just out of the Seminary, and thought I knew a little Hebrew. Referring to some passage in its original, he brought out his Hebrew Bible and soon had me chagrined by his knowledge. I found he was accustomed to read Hebrew constantly. It is a matter of regret that our Seminaries today neglect the Lower Criticism, as found in the original Hebrew text.

Dr. Peterkin's influence in the General Convention was well expressed by Bishop Randolph: "He never shrank from controversy upon questions of religious truth; and in all those years he saw the danger to be feared from the invasion of Romish principles in Protestant Churches; and with steadiness and firmness he was true and consistent in his fidelity to our Prayer Book, and to the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century." Yet when this saintly man died, the Roman Catholic Bishop said: "His death is a great loss, not only to his Church, but to the community. This world (the Bishop went on to say) is all the better for such a Christian gentleman, one who was known for the purity of his life and the great charity of his heart." Largely through him, Richmond became the City of Churches. St. Mark's, Holy Trinity and St. Phillip's owe their vigor to him, as their father. And to this good day St. James' stands as the monument to his ministry. The motto over the chancel arch of those days entered into the lives of many through his preaching, "Be ye doers of the word and not hearers only". The mural tablet at Holy Trinity expresses "multum in parvo" his rounded Christian character, "To the glory of God, in loving memory of the Rev. Joshua Peterkin, D. D., Founder of this Church, a man of God, fearless without guile, A pastor devoted, Untiring, A Friend Affectionate and Sympathetic, A Preacher of the Truth, Sound in Doctrine, Clear in Utterance, Catholic in Spirit, Fell Asleep the Seventh Day of March, 1852, Aged Seventy-eight Years. THEIR WORKS DO FOLLOW THEM." It was a matter of no surprise to me that Richmond of those days had such consecrated laymen as John Williams, Dr. J. Upshur, John Stewart of Brookhill, Edmund Addison, William Gray, W. Woodward, Peter Mayo, Frank McGuire, who were my friends and sat under the teachings of those holy men. I thank God that the present Senior Warden of St. Paul's, my deskmate at the Episcopal High School, a godly boy with high ideals, is still spared, and can give an account of the men trained by the orthodox clergy of our day in Richmond. Richmond is the strong Church City because of their influence, and so would other cities be if they had been blessed with similar rectors and pastors.

A Japanese writer said most strikingly: "Look at the Japanese garden. It is never an independent garden. It is always fitted into the distant mountains or the surrounding woods. It is harmony with the surroundings that we are trying to accomplish. The same with religion." As I look over the Catalogue of Alumni graduated from the Virginia Theological Seminary, not surpassed by any institution of our country, in my judgment, I pause at the name, Joshua Peterkin of the class of 1837. It is like the rarest orchid in the botanical garden, and seems to express what the great Gardener had in mind, gentle refinement and loving influence. God drew him by cords of special love from early life to the very close, as "the disciple of love". The Southern Churchman said of him, "When he died the brightest light in Richmond went out. It is the testimony of all who knew him that a holier and meeker Christian man dwelt not among us."

During my long illness I have meditated much upon my first year in the ministry, associated with Dr. Peterkin, and his life seems to be "a lake of peace, flowing on into the ocean of joy".

ST. HILDA'S

Beatrice Shelton Haden

ON the top of a little hill, about ten miles from San Juan, Porto Rico, stands Saint Hilda's chapel. The surrounding fields and pastures are dotted with the shacks of the congregation, little shacks sheltering enormous families. Most of the houses are frame with tin roof, but now and then one sees a palm leaf hut. Nothing has made me realize the primitive conditions of rural Porto Rico more than the dwelling made of palm leaves. It is picturesque. It withstands the wind as well as the frame house does. It is most fascinating to the newcomer. But it is dirty, smelly and uncomfortable to live in.

To go back to St. Hilda's. It is a pretty chapel, built of concrete and timber with a quaint belfry and a cross which stands out against the sky and bids the countryside to follow Christ.

St. Hilda's congregation once worshipped in a cock-pit.

The mission was started in 1926 by the Rev. Aristides Villafane (rector of St. Luke's Church, San Juan), in the home of Don Panchito, overseer for Mr. Vall-Spinoza, owner of the land. When the congregation grew too large for the house, Don Panchito offered his much prized cock-pit. The priest refused, courteously explaining that a cock-pit could not be used for such a sacred purpose. Later, however, on the feast of the Three Kings, Epiphany, no other place being available, the cock-pit was used.

After the service old Don Panchito came to the priest and said:

"You may use the cock-pit from now on. There will never be any more fights here. It is consecrated to our Lord." Mr. Villafane was much gratified with the fine spirit of the old man.

So the cock-pit was used till the church was built, and that barbarous sport of Porto Rico is a thing of the past on Don Panchito's premises. Mr. Vall-Spinoza gave the land, and money was raised for the building material. The men in the community gave their time and labor free. Porto Ricans do not like extra work much, so these men showed extraordinary devotion.

Since the chapel has been built many men, women and children have been baptized; also a good number have been instructed and confirmed.

As Mr. Villafane is so busy at St. Luke's he has only time to read Evening Prayer at St. Hilda's on Sunday. However, on Wednesday morning there is a celebration of the Holy Communion before the people go to work; also on Tuesday evening there is a service of meditation with the Litany.

I have seen the chapel packed, and more people standing on the outside resting their elbows on the window-sills, listening to the service.

How much it must mean to them to know that our Heavenly Father loves them and that some day they will have peace with Christ in Heaven. If they are not taught it, and do not believe it, they have nothing in the world to live for.

It was two days after the hurricane of last September that for the first time I went out there with Mr. Villafane and some of the girls from St. Catherine's Training School. The roads were strewn with trees, the houses had lost their roofs, those that were not just little piles of boards. Porto Rico was a sad sight that day. Over the wreckage ragged children climbed. How soon children forget! How unconscious they are that all their lives they have been ill-fed and undernourished.

As we drove on we saw many men busy with their hammers, nailing the roofs on their huts. Some were making pitiful little wigwams out of the boards and bits of tin that were left.

One man, however, I saw sitting in the door of his roofless house nonchalantly picking a banjo. "Manana" the roof could be tacked on. There is some of that spirit still in Porto Rico.

We passed the leper colony. Porto Rico is a possession of the United States and now, of course, the patients have the new serum which has brought hope and health to so many.

When we reached the chapel we found that part of the tin roof was blown off, two of the shutters were gone, and everything inside had been soaked. Several families had taken refuge in the building. Beds had been moved into the sanctuary. Others had used the pews to sleep on. Of course the odor of the place was very unpleasant.

I looked at a baby lying in a pew half covered with rags; obviously diseased and attracting flies. I could not tell if he were dead or alive. I had not the courage to touch the child for fear of infection.

Not until his mother picked him up, and I heard him cry was I sure he was a living being. The woman was not a member of the parish, but had come there to take refuge. We saw that she was provided with milk and clothes and soap for the baby. The people who live in the tiny palm leaf house not far from the chapel offered her their hospitality. There is always room for one more in Porto Rico.

St. Catherine's girls cleaned out the chapel and put everything in order again, while the priest took a survey of the conditions.

A few days later I went out again with Mr. Villafane and Deaconess Lyon. We took food to distribute, for the people had nothing. This was before the Red Cross was organized to give out provisions. The people lined up to receive beans, rice, sugar and coffee in paper bags. There is something about a situation in which food must be given out to people in lines which is very pathetic.

I did not have a chance to go out to St. Hilda's again for four weeks after the hurricane. When I did, I found the community had done well. The roofs were nailed on again wherever it was possible. In one case a new house was being built. Best of all, the fields were plowed. Seeds were planted and things were already sprung up. Sweet potatoes, bananas and rice were growing in front of the chapel. It was most satisfying to see people had already regained the courage and the energy to start over again.

St. Hilda's people are typical of Porto Rican country life. They are very poor, illiterate, superstitious and emotional, but often inarticulate. Before Mr. Villafane, understanding and always enthusiastic, came to them, there was no religious influence in the community. Of course, there was a church a few miles away, but it meant a horse or a team of oxen to get there. Undernourished souls and bodies seldom make a habit of long trips over bad roads on Sunday mornings.

There are lots of things I should like to see connected with St. Hilda's. First of all, a kindergarten. Remember the old saying: "Give me a child before he is seven." Of course, we all know that is true now; the psychologists have written some very learned books on the pre-school child. Before they are seven teach them to pray, to sing praise to God daily, and to be orderly and obedient. That is what kindergarten does.

Then St. Hilda's should have a visiting nurse, or a dispensary of some kind. Many of the children and especially the babies need medical attention. The mothers need instruction in the care of infants. All these things cost. Perhaps some day a graduate of St. Catherine's Training School can fill these offices. This is where your native assistant comes in. An American kindergarten teacher or district nurse would be very much handicapped compared with the native woman, who would understand the people. For the Porto Rican country folk are the Porto Rican country folk, and I could not begin to explain them. However, they have parts just like the rest of the world—bodies and souls that need care and nourishment.

I shall never forget the vespers at St. Hilda's on All Soul's Eve. Beneath the radiancy of the tropical stars in whose light all ugliness perishes, the people thronged into the chapel each to light a candle in memory of one who is treading a highway, beyond even the stars, to the throne of God.

There were over a hundred candles on the altar, the chapel was packed, and more people stood in the doorway and at the windows. There was no organ; unaccompanied, they sang in Spanish:

> "Peace, perfect peace, in this dark world of sin,
> The blood of Jesus whispers peace within."

It was a very beautiful and a very moving expression of faith in the progress of the human soul.

ROBERT E. LEE

By the Late John W. Daniel, LL. D.

Mental Attributes and Attainments.

THE intellectual ability of General Lee were of the highest order, and his attainments, scientific and literary, were remarkable for one who had devoted so many years of his life to the exacting duties and details of the camp and the field. He read much, digested what he read, and amplified his readings with reflective power. But so modest and unpretentious was he—so chastened and retiring was his ambition, and his overshadowing military exploits had so fixed the admiring gaze of men, that when he came here few knew how rare were the accomplishments, and how versatile and adaptive was the genius of the gentleman who seemed by nature framed to lead the ranks and grace the habiliments of war. The training, habits and occupations of the soldier seldom guide his footsteps to classic haunts, and when the great Captain is unhorsed and his trappings disappear, how often do we find that the soldier was a soldier only, and nothing more. But when Lee the soldier stepped forth in civic dress, it was soon evident to all, as it had been previously to those who knew him best, that here was one full panoplied to dignify and adorn any civic station; one who disclosed himself in wide converse and correspondence embracing all manner of delicate and difficult situations, to possess that quality which is the consummate flower of wisdom—unerring judgment combined with exquisite taste. The literature that may be found in the letters of the great, unfolds the very essence of the genius of the men and of the times they lived in; and in my humble judgment it were sufficient to read the letters written by General Lee, and which are collated in the beautiful memorial volume prepared by the Rev. Dr. J. William Jones, to discern that the writer was one who profoundly comprehended the topics of the day, and wielded a pen as vigorous and polished as his sword. And when we contemplate in connection with his deeds the fair and lofty character that is mirrored in them, we behold one whose strong, equitable and wide-reaching mind was such that had he devoted it to jurisprudence, had made the name of Justice as venerable and august as when a Marshall enunciated the law; who, had he been a statesman, had moulded the institutions of his country, and guided its political currents with as wise, firm and temperate a hand as that of Washington; who, had he headed any of the great corporate enterprises of transportation, commerce or development in which aggregated capital relies on scientific sagacity for great works, had greatly aided the solution of many perplexing problems that now agitate the public mind; who, had he bent himself to literature, had produced a page filled with the glory and dignity of philosophic inquiry or historic truth—one indeed so perfectly balanced in mind and will, so nobly turned in moral worth, so just in heart, so clear in thought, and so authoritative in direction that in any land where the common sentiment can have spontaneous play, would, as inevitably as the sparks fly upward, and by a law scarce less fixed than that which moves the planets in their course, have been the leading man in whatever he undertook, and would have been called by one voice to become the Chief Magistrate of the people.

True Heroism—The Heroism of Lee.

As little things make up the sum of life, so they reveal the inward nature of men and furnish keys to history. It is in the office, the street, the field, the workship, and by the fireside, that men show what stuff they are made of, nor less than in those eventful actions which write themselves in lightnings across the skies and mark the rise and fall of nations. Nay, more—the highest attributes of human nature are not disclosed in action, but in self-restraint and repose. "Self-restraint," as has been truly said by Thomas Hughes, "is the highest form of self-assertion."

It is harder, as every soldier knows, to lie down and take the fire of batteries without returning it, than to rise and charge to the cannon's mouth. It is harder to give the soft answer that turns away wrath than to retort a word with a blow. DeLong, in the frozen Arctic wastes, dying alone inch by inch of cold and starvation, yet intent on his work, and writing lines for the benefit of others, deserved, as well as the Marshal of France who received it, the name of "bravest of the brave". The artless little Alabama girl, who was guiding General Forrest along a dangerous path when the enemy fired a volley upon him, and who instinctively spread her skirts and cried: "Get behind me!" had a spirit as high as that which filled the bosom of Joan of Arc or Charlotte Corday.

The little Holland boy, who, seeing the water oozing through the dyke, and the town nearby about to be deluged and destroyed, neither cried nor ran, but stopped, and all alone, stifled the opening gap with earth, in instant peril of being swept to death unhonored and unknown, showed a finer and nobler fibre than that of Cambronne when he shouted to the conquering British: "The Guard dies, but never surrenders." The soldier of Pompeii, buried at his post standing there, and flying not from the hot waves of lava that rolled over him, tells the Roman story in grander language than the ruins of the Coliseum. And, Herndon, on the deck of his ship, doing all to save his passengers, making deliberate choice of death before dishonor, and going down into the deep with brow calm and unruffled, is a grander picture of true, heroic temper than of Caesar leading his legions, or of the young Corsican at the Bridge of Lodi.

Amongst the quiet, nameless workers of the world—in the stubble field and by the forge, bending over a sick child's bed or smoothing an outcast's pillow, is many a hero and heroine truer, nobler than those over whose brows hang plumes and laurels.

In action there is a stimulus of excited physical faculties, and of the moving passions—but in the composure of the calm mind that quietly devotes itself to hard life-work—putting aside temptations—contemplating and rising superior to all surroundings of adversity, suffering, danger and death, man is revealed in his highest manifestation. Then, and then alone, he seems to have redeemed his fallen state, and to be recreated in God's image. At the bottom of all true heroism is unselfishness. Its crowning expression is sacrifice. The world is suspicious of vaunted heroes. They are so easily manufactured. So many feet are cut and trimmed to fit Cinderella's slippers that we hesitate long before we hail the Princess. But when the true Hero has come, and we know that he is here, in verity, Ah! how the hearts of men leap forth to greet him—how worshipfully we welcome God's noblest work—the strong, honest, fearless, upright man.

In Robert Lee was such a hero vouchsafed to us and to mankind, and whether we behold him declining command of the Federal army to fight the battles and share the miseries of his own people; proclaiming on the heights in front of Gettysburg that the fault of the disaster was his own; leading charges in the crisis of combat; walking under the yoke of conquest without a murmur of complaint; or refusing fortunes to come here and train the youth of his country in the path of duty—he is ever the same meek, grand, self-sacrificing spirit. Here he exhibited qualities not less worthy and heroic than those displayed on the broad and open theatre of conflict, when the eyes of nations watched his every action. Here in the calm repose of civil and domestic duties, and in the trying routine of incessant tasks, he lived a life as high as when, day by day, he marshalled and led his thin and wasting lines, and slept by night upon the field that was to be drenched again in blood upon the morrow.

Here in these quiet walks, far removed from "war or battle's sound", came into view, as when the storm o'er past the mountain seems a pinnacle of light, the landscape beams with fresher and tenderer beauties, and the purple, golden clouds float above us in the azure depths like the Islands of the Blest, so came into view the towering grandeur, the massive splendor and the loving kindness of the character of General Lee, and the very sorrows that overhung his life seemed luminous with celestial hues. Here he revealed, in manifold gracious hospitalities, tender charities, and patient, worthy counsels, how deep and pure and inexhaustible were the fountains of his virtues. And loving hearts delight to recall, as loving lips will ever delight to tell, the thousand little things he did which sent forth lines of light to irradiate the gloom of the conquered land, and to lift up the hopes and cheer the works of the people.

Was there a scheme of public improvement? He took hearty interest in promoting its success in every way he could. Was there an enterprise of charity, or education, or religion, that needed friendly aid? He gave it according to his store, and sent with the gift words that were deeds. Was there a poor soldier in distress? Whoever else forgot him, it was not Lee. Was there a proud spirit chafing under defeat, and breaking forth in angry complaints and criminations, or a wanderer who had sought in other lands an unvexed retreat denied him here? He it was who with mild voice conjured restraint and patience, recalled the wanderer home and reared above the desolate hearthstone the image of duty. And whosoever mourned the loved and lost, who had died in vain for the cause now perished, he it was who poured into the stricken heart the balm of sympathy and consolation.

Here, indeed, Lee, no longer the Leader, because, as it were, the Priest of his people, and the young men of Washington College were but a fragment of those who found in his voice and his example the shining signs that never misguided their footsteps.

Incidents of His Life and Illustrations of His Character.

Many are the illustrations and incidents which show how beautifully blended in his character were the sterner qualities that command respect, with the gentle traits that engage affection. And his quick apprehension of every natural beauty, and keen sympathy, for all living things show the exquisite sensibilities of his heart. His letters from Mexico teem with expressions of the delight with which he looked upon the bright-winged birds and luxuriant flowers of that sunny land, and during the Confederate war, when cramped resources denied bestowal of the smallest tokens of friendship, we find his letters to dear ones frequently laden with the floral emblems of his constant thought and love. In one of them he says: "I send you some sweet violets that I gathered for you this morning while covered with the dense white frost whose crystals glittered in the bright sun like diamonds, and formed a brooch of rare beauty and sweetness which could not be fabricated by the expenditure of a world of money."

And when after the war he visited Alexandria, the scene of his boyhood days, one of his old neighbors found him gazing over the palings of the garden where he used to play. "I am looking," he said, "to see if the old snow-ball trees are still here. I should be sorry to miss them." How he loved, too, these grand mountains! Amongst them, mounted on his faithful war-horse, Traveller, he often roamed while he spent his days amongst you. And here in nature's works he found refreshment from the toils of life, and looked from nature up to nature's God.

His tenderness was as instinctive as his valor. A writer who, on one occasion, stood in his company watching a fire in the mountains, relates how, when others were wrapt in the scenic grandeur, General Lee remarked: "It is beautiful! but I have been thinking of the poor animals that must perish in the flames." And another tells how, when in the lines near Richmond, the bolts of battle swept the point where the General stood, he ordered his attendants to the rear, and while himself calmly surveying the field under fire, he stopped to pick up a fledgling sparrow that had fallen from its nest, and restored it to the bough overhead.

Pictures, are these, full of infinite suggestion!

A Robespierre and a Torquemada may exhibit emotional tenderness, shallow and fitful, but that of Lee was the vital principle of a robust, exalted nature, which found its inspiration in the sacred heart of Charity, and diffused itself in ceaseless acts of magnanimity and love.

So it was while the passions of men were loosened, and the fierce work of war spread havoc and desolation far and wide, he who directed its tremendous forces with stern and nervous hand, moved also amongst its scenes of woe—a gracious and healing spirit. So it was to him a stricken foe was a foe no longer—that his orders to surgeons of his army were to "treat the whole field alike", and when at Chancellorsville, he in person led the tempestuous assault that won the victory, and stood amongst the wounded of the blue and gray, heaped around him in indiscriminate carnage—his first thought and care were for them, alike in their common suffering. So it was that whether in Pennsylvania, Maryland, or Virginia, he restrained every excess of conduct, and held the reckless and the ruthless within those bounds which duty sets to action. So it was to one homeless during the days of strife, he wrote: "Occupy yourself in helping those more helpless than yourself." So it was, that when the gallant General Phil. Kearney fell at Ox Hill, he sent his sword and horse through the lines to his mourning widow—and that when Lincoln was struck down by an assassin's hand, he denounced the deed as "a crime previously unknown to the country, and one that must be deprecated by every American". And so, too, when one day here, a man humbly clad sought alms at his door, Lee pointed to his retiring form and said: "That is one of our old soldiers who is in necessitous circumstances. He fought on the other side, but we must not remember that against him now." And this poor soldier said of him afterwards: "He is the noblest man that ever lived. He not only had a kind word for me, but he gave me some money to help me on my way." Better is that praise than any garland of the Poet or the Rhetorician.

The Relations Between Lee and His Men.

As we glance back through the smoke-drifts of his many campaigns and battles, his kind, considerate acts towards his officers and men gleam through them as brightly as their burnished weapons; and they formed a fellowship as noble as that which bound the Knights of the Round Table to Arthur, "the blameless King". His principle of discipline was indicated in his expression that "a true man of honor feels himself humbled when he cannot help humbling others", and never exercised stern authority except when absolutely indispensable, his influence was the more potent because it ever appealed to honorable motives and natural affections. In the dark days of the Revolution, two Major-Generals conspired with a faction of the Continental Congress to put Gates in the place of Washington, denominating him a "weak General". Never did Confederates dream a disloyal thought of Lee, and the greater the disaster, the more his army leaned upon him.

When Jackson fell, Lee wrote to him: "You are better off than I am, for while you have lost your left arm, I have lost my right arm." And Jackson said of him: "Lee is a phenomenon. He is the only man that I would follow blindfold." Midway between Petersburg and Appomattox, with the ruins of an Empire falling on his shoulders, and the gory remnants of his army staggering under the thick blows of the advancing foe, we see Lee turning aside from the column, and riding up to the home of the widow of the gallant Colonel John Thornton, who had fallen at Sharpsburg: "I have not time to tarry," he says, "but I could not pass by without stopping a moment to pay my respects to the widow of my honored soldier, Colonel Thornton, and tender her my deepest sympathy in the sore bereavement she sustained when the country was deprived of his invaluable services."

Three of his sons were there in the army with him; but they were too noble to seek, and he too noble to bestow, honors because of the tie of blood. One of them a private, in the artillery served his gun with his fellows. Another is in a hostile prison, and a Federal Officer of equal rank begs that General Lee will effect an exchange, the one for the other. The General declined, saying "that he will ask no favor for his own son that could not be asked for the humblest private in the army". On the cars, crowded with passengers, a soldier, scarce noticed, struggled to draw his coat over his wounded arm. One from amongst many rises and goes to his aid. It is General Lee. An army surgeon relates that while the battle of the Crater raged, General Lee rode to the rear of the line where the wounded lay, and dismounting, moved amongst them. "Doctor, why are you not doing something for this man?" he said, pointing to one sorely stricken. The Doctor raised the gray jacket and pointed to the ghastly wound which made life hopeless. General Lee bent tenderly over the wounded man and then in a voice tremulous with emotion, exclaimed: "Alas! poor soldier! may God make soft his dying pillow."

Such were some of the many acts that made the men love Lee. And in the fight he was ever ready to be foremost. Lee the Soldier, over-rode Lee the General, and when the pinch and struggle came, there he was. "Lee to the rear!" became the soldiers' battle-cry; and oftentimes, when tempest ripped the earth, upturned the forest and filled the air with death, those soldiers in their rusty rags, paused as they saw his face amongst them; and then, with manhood's imperious love, these sovereigns of the field commanded, "General Lee, go back," as their condition of advancing. And then forward to death. Was ever such devotion? Yes, Lee loved his men "as a father pitieth his children", and they loved him with a love that "passeth the love of woman", for they saw in him the iron hero who could lead the brave with front as dauntless as a warrior's crest, and the gentle friend who comforted the stricken with soul as tender as a mother's prayer.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart," Ps. 119-11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by H. Smith Orrick, of Glyndon, Maryland:

> "That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death."—Philippians 3:10.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

SEPTUAGESIMA SUNDAY

Berkeley Minor

COLLECT.

O Lord, we beseech Thee favorably to hear the prayers of Thy people, that we, who are justly punished for our offences, may be mercifully delivered by Thy goodness, for the glory of Thy name; through Jesus Christ our Saviour, who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

THE collect (says Bishop Coxe), which is the ancient one of this day throughout western Christendom, is penitential and deprecatory in its character, and seems to have reference to the many prayers which the people of God throughout the world are now about to offer up for individual blessings, and for the "good estate of the Catholic Church". Bishop Coxe calls the Paschal or Passover system of the Jews "the shadow of our Lenten season, which the Christian Church shall celebrate".

"The Church (he says) now enters the penumbra of her Lenten eclipse, and all her services are shadowed with the sombre hue of her approaching season of humiliation. The ancient name of this Sunday (Septuagesima, dies, feminine, being understood) implies that it is seventy days to the last day of the Feast of the Resurrection (Easter); i. e., it is just ten weeks from Septuagesima to First Sunday After Easter (Low Sunday). Thus we have turned our backs on Christmas and setting our faces toward the more sober but still more glorious light of Easter, we begin to remember the days of preparation which, if duly observed, will fit us to keep the Paschal Feast as the Apostle (Paul) commands: "Not with old leaven . . . . but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth" (1 Cor. 5:7 and 8).

THE Epistle for Septuagesima is 1 Cor. 9:24-27. The Christian life is in this Epistle likened to a race. St. Paul is writing from Ephesus to "the Church of God at Corinth". The year is probably A. D. 57, the third year of his residence at Ephesus. Paul had visited Corinth several times and was familiar with the customs of the place, so celebrated for its biennial games, called "Isthmian", from the isthmus on which Corinth stood. It was natural then, and very suitable, to use this symbol of a race, for illustration. All Christians, Paul says, are running a race like the foot-race in the games in many respects; but strikingly different in some important ones. "Know ye not (says the Apostle) that they who run in a race run all, but one receiveth the praise?" How different the Christian race, in which the prize is open to all! And He who offers the prize is so anxious that all should so run that they may win it. And there is no rivalry, no jealousy in this race; since the glorious reward of everlasting life is clearly set before us all. The rules and regulations of the race are exceedingly simple; I do not say that they are easy to keep, any more than the rules and regulations required of the contestants in these Isthmian games; but the vast advantage of the runners in the Christian race, is, that they may have for the asking constant assistance and guidance according to the promise (Romans 8:37): "We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us." "And every man (continues Paul) that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they (the runners in the Isthmian games) do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we, an incorruptible."

And if we doubt of our ability to practice this temperance in all things, by which alone we can run the Christian race with confidence and joy (and realizing our weakness, we should indeed doubt it), let us remember the promise of Him who came to earth and ran this race, laying aside His crown that He might show us how to win one, and giving us the Comforter, with all His quickening power.

THE Gospel for Septuagesima is St. Matt. 20:1-16. It gives us the parable of "Laborers in the Vineyard". The first thing to study in a parable should always be the lesson to be drawn from it, and in this case our Lord tells us what He meant to teach, viz.: "The last shall be first and the first last." "The last" in this parable, those who had been standing "all the day idle", received the full day's wages, a penny (about fifteen cents), what some had worked all day for, and others a good many hours. Naturally (that is, according to poor human nature), those who had worked longer were dissatisfied, and "murmured against the good man of the house". The lesson taught by the story is evidently to beware of selfishness. One commentator says: "The toil of the Christian is to be a labor of love, not of selfishness. He is to race, wrestle and fight, but not for his own hand, imitating the earnestness of worldly men, but not their worldliness."

One of the worst results of a selfish spirit is envy of those who are, or seem to be, more richly rewarded than we. The penny was a fair wage for a day's work, and those who had worked all day would have been satisfied, had they not with envious eye seen the same given to those who had "wrought but one hour". One should suppress an envious spirit, if for no better reason, for the selfish reason, that it brings to the envious soul such vanity and vexation of spirit, and makes it incapable of enjoying anything. Grumbling is a most unhappy state of mind, quite as much, to the grumbler if not more so, than to those about him. We are not told why the good man thus discriminated in favor of "the last". He only used his just right to do what he would with his own, after just debts were paid. A useful lesson may be drawn from this parable as to the true and right relation that should exist between the employer and the employed. Ruskin in his essay "Unto this Last" (the words used in this parable by the "goodman of the house", in rebuking the envious laborers), sets for us well the relation that should prevail between employer and employee. The gist of the teaching of the essay (and it is also the teaching of the parable) is that the best work and the most work is only to be gotten from the laborers by enlisting their affections.

THE CHURCH'S PROGRAM

QUESTION—

What is this Nation-Wide Campaign
We hear so much about?
Why does the busy Chairman
Send urgent letters out,
Saying that so-and-so is due
And won't we please remit?
The Church's Program isn't ours;
Why worry us with it?

Our churches need repairing;
We've building plans in view;
If we provide the funds for this,
That's all that we can do.
As for the Church's missions—
They'll struggle through somehow;
Our parish needs are much too large
To think of them just now.

ANSWER—

What is the Nation-Wide Campaign?
An effort to obey
The voice that echoes down the years
From that far yesterday—
"Go ye" into the world and preach
To every creature there
The story of redeeming love,
God's comfort and God's care.

Through shadowed, noisome jungle,
O'er trackless wastes of snow;
Through city streets, down country lanes,
Our tireless agents go;
To sickness bringing healing;
To careless lives, new zeal;
To sad hearts, hope; to sin-sick souls
His mercy to reveal.

"Go ye and teach all nations"—
No narrow walls confined
Divine love's purpose in that Gift,
The Saviour of mankind.
These stately temples builded
May shut out God's dear Son—
"This ought ye to have done, nor yet
The other left undone."

"Lo, I am with you always"—
Shall self-filled lives disclaim
All need of the indwelling Christ
Thus promised in His name?
To each the charge is given—
His Kingdom to extend;
That each may claim the promised joy—
His presence to the end.

JESUS THE MAN AND CHRIST THE SPIRIT: The Rev. George Workman. The Macmillan Company, New York, N. Y.

We have here another dogmatic denouncer of dogma. He "takes it for granted that the time is ripe for setting forth the facts of the Bible free from creedal superstitions and dogmatic assumptions". So that in spite of the anti-dogmatic efforts of the Unitarians of the past apparently their efforts have been unsuccessful and a new champion of undogmatic theology is needed.

Like all anti-dogmatists the author can be very dogmatic on occasion, the difference being that the Christian dogmatist depends upon pronouncements of large bodies of Christian men in council, the others depend usually upon their own authority. This gem stands out—"Historical exegesis makes it possible to prove that the accounts of the Virgin Birth of Jesus are traditional, that His oneness with the Father was ethical, that His resurrection from the dead was spiritual, that His state of pre-existence was impersonal, and that His place in the Trinity is experimental". Passing over the remarks concerning the birth and resurrection which are neither particularly new nor the products of "historical exegesis", we come to the peculiar statements concerning a Christ whose pre-existence was impersonal, but of whose place in the Trinity we can have experimental evidence. A mind that can conceive of a person who pre-existed impersonally, and who though one with the Father in an ethical sense only, is yet experimentally a member of the Trinity, has no need to fool with such mundane considerations as "historical exegesis" to prove whatever point he wishes to make. We concede the argument to him without question. He has evidently gotten to the point where he can think in the terms of the fourth dimension, or like Sir Oliver Lodge, he can personalize the Ether.

While his dogmatic anti-dogmatism may do for a seance, we prefer the Christ of the Ages, Virgin Born, Crucified, Risen, and Ascended. F. C.

WHAT HAPPENED AT THE REFORMATION? By Henry E. Oliver, M. A. Paper. Pp. 31. Published in the United States by the Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wis.

This is a British contribution to an ever-vital subject across the water; and is no doubt designed to affect the present controversy as to the Revised Prayer Book.

We here, as well, need to be rightly instructed; so popular is the prevailing notion that Henry VIII founded the Church of England. That intelligent Protestants should harbor this peurile misconception is hardly to be believed; yet it is undeniable. Here then, is a book at small cost to illumine the average reader as to the true historical perspective. Our author establishes the fundamental fact that the Church in the British Isles early had a place in the Councils of the Church at large. Indeed, we know that at the Council of Arles, 314 A. D., three British Bishops were in attendance; and there seems little doubt that a larger number participated in the memorable Council of Nicea, 325 A. D. This was centuries before Gregory sent Augustine to Britain to force the feeble Church to submit to the domination of Rome. What happened at the Reformation was not the forming of a new Church, but the asserting, by an over-powered Church, of its liberty. And we must not forget that the signing of Magna Carta by King John in the beginning of the thirteenth century, had so far led the people into the growing spirit of democracy, which is ever the foe of Papacy, that the Reformation in England was a national epoch, based upon the increasing sense of independence of any foreign power; as well it was an ecclesiastical revolt from a system of tyranny, exercised by an assumed follower of our Lord, who in almost every essential had departed from apostolic foundations.

This characteristic of the Reformation, as the author plainly shows, was accompanied by the substitution of a book of prayer in the vernacular, in place of the Latin missal; and then, though Henry's motive may have been questionable, the dissolution of the monasteries completed the process of house-cleaning.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

PLEA FOR WORK AMONG COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. Editor:

Having been long and actively interested in the work of our Church among colored people, I would like to know if she is not unfair to them and to herself in not exercising closer supervision over such a comparatively young branch of the Church, only recently having ministers of their own race. It is distressing to see little children brought to Confirmation to ratify and confirm vows made for them at their baptism, when they are utterly ignorant of such, many of them unable to recite the Creed, the Lord's Prayer or the Commandments, the least that could be required of candidates in this State of compulsory education where most children can read. Some cannot even tell the difference between Christmas and Easter, and have not been instructed in the mode of Confirmation; coming to the rail with hats on.

Wouldn't a certain amount of "edifying" be helpful to the candidates themselves and make them worthier representatives of our Church? Worker.

CERTAIN QUESTIONS.

Mr. Editor:

Here are certain questions I should like to have answered or discussed. By way of introduction, let me make two quotations from the last Pastoral Letter of the House of Bishops: "The first (principle) is that every baptized Christian is a member of the Catholic Church.. Whatever his ecclesiastical name he belongs to the great company of the elect."

Now, if all and singular of this is true (the Bishops say it is true), then why do we exclude them from the Lord's Table? According to the doctrine laid down in said Pastoral Letter, we are no more Catholic than they; nor are they a whit less than we, no matter what their ecclesiastical name may be.

Baptism is a sacrament. Having received that sacrament they are members of the Catholic (universal) Church; and not only so they belong to the great company of the elect. Now, while we as a Church are saying all this, and beckoning these other Catholics on to union with us, we elevate the rite (not sacrament) of Confirmation above the sacrament of baptism to its complete nullification. See last rubric in Confirmation Office. "And there shall none be admitted to the Holy Communion, until such time as he be confirmed, or be ready and desirous to be confirmed." "Every baptized Christian is a member of the Catholic Church, and belongs to the great company of the elect," yet we don't allow, we refuse to let them commune with us! Are we not just as intolerant as Rome ever dared to be, and just as exclusive as the Baptists? Why? "Because they follow not us."

If, as the Bishops say that, every baptized Christian is a member of the Catholic Church, why can't they be received, if they apply, into full membership in our churches upon a letter of transfer? Aren't they members of the Catholic Church? and do they not belong to the great company of the elect? The beautiful and impressive service of Confirmation can still be used for those baptized in infancy, and for all unbaptized adults.

Again the Pastoral Letter says: "Loyalty to the Church does not consist in meticulous obedience to the letter of rubrics and canons." Under this the ultra-ritualist and the severely conservative can find justification for his lack of meticulous obedience to the letter of rubric and canons. I do not believe in prayers for the dead, nor can I conscientiously use such; but in view of the above loophold my loyalty to the church can not be questioned.

Church Intelligence

Use the Publicity Department.

Parish paper editors, study class leaders, rural workers, rectors without parish papers, or any other Church workers to whom the material would be useful or interesting, may obtain from the Publicity Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, mimeographed Notes of Church news and other items of interest concerning the Church's work, issued twice a month. There is no charge for this material. It does not at all take the place of a Church paper, but is useful in other ways.

Avoid the Flu by Common Sense.

New York, January 22.—Scanty clothing, insufficient food, and fatigue are the flu's best weapons in making inroads upon public health. Warm clothes, food that is sufficient to furnish fuel for the body and plenty of sleep, are given in the suggestions for resisting any epidemic. So says Miss Edith Gates, of New York, director of the health activities of the nearly 600,000 Y. W. C. A. members in the United States.

"The typical scanty outfit now popular and fashionable robs the body of vital energy in Winter," said Miss Gates yesterday. "Girls surely can't realize how they are endangering their health. Being insufficiently clad makes one much more susceptible to minor drafts and exposure. In hot countries, such as Egypt you will find that the native attire includes a warm band as a protection to lower part of the body." Eating meals well-balanced in food values is another caution she advises. Skimpy, hurried, and badly chosen lunches, favorites among girls at their noon hour she names as a prime breeder of ill-health. Eight glasses of water daily, regular habits and plenty of sleep are other aids in building up health resistance.

It is the people who are under par and over tired who find it hard to throw off germs. By living by simple hygienic rules such as these any one may greatly increase their resistance. Take the item of plenty of fresh air and exercise. That alone will increase and enrich the blood supply.

The nation-wide health program of the Association is built on health education. Formerly most of the classes came mostly for recreation and play, the director said.

They are realizing, she said, that their physical well-being and energy lies largely in their own hands, and habits.

Study Africa.

The Episcopal Church in company with all other Christian bodies in the United States is directing the attention of all her people toward Africa.

It is urged that during this year, serious consideration—reading, thinking, studying—be given to our Christian relationships with the peoples and problems of Africa.

Liberia as the scene of a great century-long endeavor of our Church will necessarily have a large place in this study.

The recent emergence of Africa from her age-long obscurity and the increasing dependence of the rest of the world upon her for products of all kinds makes this a most timely subject.

Haiti Cathedral Consecrated.

Port au Prince, Haiti, January 6.—The new Cathedral of the Holy Trinity was consecrated here today by the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., Presiding Bishop, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey, the Rt. Rev. Albion Williamson Knight, D. D., Coadjutor Bishop of New Jersey and the Rt. Rev. Charles Blayney Colmore, D. D., Bishop of Porto Rico, in the presence of the full staff of native clergy, headed by the Rt. Rev. Harry Roberts Carson, D. D., Bishop of Haiti, and a distinguished gathering of Haitien and American officials, Churchmen and representatives of the native and foreign colony, including General John H. Russell, the American Commissioner General, his staff and the Naval and Marine contingent.

The occasion marked the first time that any Presiding Bishop of the Church has visited officially any foreign mission field.

The new cathedral brings to fulfillment the cherished hopes of the Church in Haiti, which date back to 1863, when the late Rt. Rev. James Theodore Holly led a group of Negro Americans from the United States and organized in Port au Prince, the parish of the Holy Trinity. Nine years later the original Cathedral of the Holy Trinity was erected, which was followed in 1874 by Mr. Holly's consecration as Bishop of the District. Before his death in 1911, Bishop Holly conceived the plan of a new and more substantial cathedral which should take the place of the frame structure that had already begun to show the wear and tear of the tropical climate. Following Bishop Holly's death the District was under the care successively of the Bishops of Cuba, Porto Rico and the Canal Zone.

It was during the jurisdiction of Bishop Colmore, of Porto Rico, that the site for the new cathedral was acquired in the centre of the city of Port au Prince, only a few blocks distant from the residence of the President of the Republic. In 1923, Bishop Carson was consecrated Bishop of the District, and under his devoted and vigorous leadership the work, crowned by today's consecration has gone forward to completion.

Aside from the pioneer work of Bishop Holly and Bishop Colmore, three significant dates mark the progress of the cathedral to the consummation in today's impressive ceremony. They are, first, the laying of the cornerstone February 8, 1925, by the Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey; second, the beginning of the work of construction October 11, 1926; and third, the first celebration of the Holy Communion in the completed cathedral June 3, 1928. Other significant details connected with the history of the edifice are the corporate gift of the women of the Church of $2,500, which was later increased to $14,000 and then to $15,000, and the gift of the American Church Building Fund Commission of $5,000.

Like details of note in connection with the history of the cathedral make it truly representative of the Church throughout the world. For instance, the beautiful stone altar is the gift of the third district of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Central New York, as a memorial to Anna Farrington Rankins. Hanging before the altar is a sanctuary lamp given by a devoted Churchman of the Panama Canal Zone in memory of a brother who died in the World War. Numerous other gifts furthering the rapid progress of the cathedral came from St. Mark's, Philadelphia; St. Luke's, Germantown; Grace, Church and St. Ignatius Church, New York, and from other congregations in Detroit, Boston, Pittsburgh and Baltimore. The people of Haiti have been especially generous in their gifts, liberal donations having come from the Dutch, English and American residents in addition to contributions from the Haitiens.

The new church, which is a handsome and imposing structure of concrete, is built almost wholly of native material from plans originally drawn by Mr. Robert T. Walker, of the Church of the Advent, Boston. In design it recalls the old Church og St. Germaine, in Paris, and its general lines follow the style of architecture prevalent in Latin countries. It is at once picturesque and dignified an dcompares favorably with that other imposing cathedral which the Church has reared at Ancon on the Panama Canal Zone. It has a seating capacity of about eight hundred and in this city of 100,000, where the Church under the consecrated and energetic administration of Bishop Carson is constantly moving forward, it meets a need which the old Cathedral for the past ten years has lacked. The order of procession at the consecration today was as follows:

Thurifer
Flag of Haiti
Cross
The Lay Members of the Cathedral
The Lay Officials of the District Chapter
Thurifer
Cross
The Reverend Clergy of the District of Haiti In the Order of their Ordination
The Reverend Clergy of the Dominican Republic
The Dean of the Cathedral
The Rt. Rev. Charles Blayney Colmore, D. D., Missionary Bishop of Port Rico
The Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey
Chaplain to the Bishop of Haiti
The Bishop of Haiti
Chaplain to the Presiding Bishop
The Presiding Bishop

Bishop Murray sailed from New York on the late afternoon of December 28, accompanied by Bishop Matthews and Bishop Knight, and arrived here on the afternoon of January 2. He was enthusiastically received by a large group of Churchmen and has been the centre of an elaborate program arranged in his honor, which has included a dinner in honor of himself and party given by Commissioner General and Mrs. Russell on Saturday evening preceding the consecration. Under the guidance of Bishop Carson, Bishop Murray has visited many of the nearby mission stations. Greatly to his regret, the Presiding Bishop is compelled to leave Port au Prince on January 9 for New York, to enable him to keep important engagements in the Far West, including the consecration of Bishop-elect Jenkins as Bishop of Nevada.

Fourth Coadjustor Elected.

The Rev. William Scarlett, LL.D., Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Ldouis, Missouri, was elected Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of Pennsylvania at the convention of that Diocese called for the purpose on January 22. Dean Scarlett is the fourth minister elected to this office within the year.

Notable Synod Sessions.

The Fifteenth Annual Synod of the Province of New York, New Jersey and Porto Rico was held January 15-17, at the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, Long Island, New York. Two hundred bishops, deputies and delegates attended.

The three most important subjects discussed were Evangelism, Religious Education and Religion in the Colleges.

Bishop Stearly addressed the opening session Tuesday evening, and his address, urging a movement of evangelism, evoked enthusiastic responses at the conferences on Wednesday.

Bishop E. H. Coley, Bishop Thomas C. Darst and Bishop Ernest M. Stires were among the many speakers who endorsed Bishop Stearly's recommendation and advocated active steps to put it into immediate practice in New York and New Jersey.

Bishop Darst announced that the program of the National Council of Evangelism, of which he is chairman, will include for the coming year the selection of seventy picked clergymen, who will conduct missions and special evangelistic services in "strategic" centres throughout the country.

A Startling innovation for religious education was announced at the Wednesday conference by the Rev. Gabriel Farrell, rector of the Church of the Messiah at Rhinebeck, N. Y.

What was described as the "Sears-Roebuck Mail Order Method of Religion" is to be tried in the isolated sections of the country by Episcopalians "to take the Church to those who do not go to church". The work will be undertaken by the Department of Religious Education of the Protestant Episcopal Church and will be directly supervised by Miss Edna Eastwood.

Mr. Farrell said that the work would be carried out on the same large scale, with the same sort of people in view and with the same methods as those of the mail order concerns.

He said a questionnaire will be sent to the prospects whose enlistment in the ranks of religion is sought with the request that they check on the printed sheet the particular field of religion in which they are interested, as Church history, Life of Christ, Church symbols, missions and the New Testament. On receipt of the desired information, the Department of Religious Education will send out religious literature, and in every way possible "try to make the most irreligious sections of the country religion conscious".

This unusual method of religious propaganda is "the crying need" to remedy the defects of too much religion in the home, "which is the trouble with the Church today", the Rev. Mr. Farrell told the delegates. He said the people are "fed up" with so much religion in the newspapers, the magazines and over the radio that "they don't know what to do with it".

Wednesday commenced with an early special communion service. The work of the day was prefaced by a prayer "of praise and thanksgiving" which was offered by the gathering standing for the passage of the Kellogg treaty, which was termed "a great step forward for world peace and international brotherhood".

There are 3,000,000 Jews in the Province of the Synod, and many of them can be converted to Christianity with "the proper education", declared the Rev. Thomas Burgess, Secretary of the Department of National Council in an address on "The Church's Work Among the Foreign Born". Following a spirited discussion of the subject, a resolution urging a vigorous campaign to convert Jews to Christianity was offered and referred to a committee for consideration as to how to put it into effect.

Another announcement of the Wednesday session was that $130,000 had been raised for the relief of the West Indian hurricane sufferers.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske and the Rev. Arthur Lee Kinsolving were the principal speakers at the Thursday session.

Bishop Fiske delivered a bitter arraignment of modern American civilization "which conceives God as a magnified Rotarian and practices sanctified commercialism as Christianity".

Coupled with the warning that this attitude is heading us to "a tremendous crash" and the return of the "war horror in its most destructive form", was Bishop Fiske's statement that religion is facing one of its greatest tasks in "correlating modern science and modern religion". He said that faith in a personal God and immortality is breaking and that ministers must teach people to go to the Bible to refresh their faith.

The Rev. Arthur Lee Kinsolving, chaplain of Amherst College, told the Synod that there was an "alarming decrease" in Church affiliation among college students "who are living in an atmosphere dominated by skeptical science, materialistic business and college professors who are not Christian".

Chaplain Kinsolving reported that religion in colleges was decreasing as education is increasing. Although there are a million college students today, there is practically no religion in colleges, he declared.

"Students are bristling with prejudices against religion and ministers. We must send our ablest leaders of the Church, men with great intellectual ability and unusual sympathy, to bring them back within the fold of religion."

Bishop Fiske declared that the difficulties of harmonizing the discoveries of modern science "which has created a universe so vast that to the laymen God seems crowded out and man sunk to utter insignificance" with the teachings of religion is just beginning to trouble the masses. He contended that this difficulty was causing persons to "lose their moral standards".

But far more difficult than the correlation of science and religion, is the problem of harmonizing the Christianity of Jesus Christ with our civilization of today, Bishop Fiske said. He said the world has turned from Jesus and is worshipping instead "the God of prosperity".

"There are almost no true Christians in the world today," he asserted. "Our people are spiritually and morally adrift, without any clear guiding principles of faith or of conduct. They see tolerated and excused by people of perfectly good standing, some of them in fact call themselves Christians, things which true Christians will unhesitatingly condemn."

The Synod decided on an intensive program to combat this irreligion.

Bishops Fiske, Stires and Stearly were among those who endorsed the program.

A message of sympathy to Bishop William T. Manning, who is ill, was voiced in a telegram sent to him by the Synod.

The sessions closed with the election of Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Rev. Dr. Howard C. Robbins, Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, as trustees of St. Stephen's College, Annandale-on-the-Hudson, N. Y. The Rev. Robert Williams, rector of Trinity Church, Princeton, N. J., and Professor Adelaide T. Case, of Teachers' College, Columbia University, were elected representatives to the National Church Council.

On Tuesday there was also held a one-day session of the Ninth Provincial Conference on Christian Social Service. Headquarters for the meetings were at the Cathedral School.

On Tuesday and Wednesday there was a two-day program of the Woman's Auxiliary, with delegates from the Girls' Friendly, Daughters of the King, Church Periodical Club, and Church Mission of Help. On Tuesday afternoon Mrs. Geo. P. T. Sargent, wife of the Dean of the Cathedral, entertained the women delegates at tea at the Deanery.

Presiding Bishop Asks Prayers for National Council.

February 5-7, 1929.

The National Council and its Departments hold their regular meetings February 5, 6 and 7, at the Church Missions House, New York City.

At this meeting the Council faces the very difficult problem of reducing appropriations to the mission fields in order to meet expected income, which is far below the budget quotas, as indicated by the reports from the dioceses.

May we have your Prayers that this difficult situation may be met with the least possible damage to the work at home and abroad.

JOHN GARDNER MURRAY,
Presiding Bishop and President of the National Council.

Dr. Temple Becomes Archbishop of York.

A colorful account of the enthronement as Archbishop of York of the Most Rev. Dr. William Temple, Bishop of Manchester, was carried by the New York Times. The ceremony took place at York Minster on January 10. Dr. Temple succeeds Archbishop Lang, who has become Archbishop of Canterbury.

"The snow-capped minister provided an admirable setting for the white robes of 1,000 clergymen the red and the gold of military uniforms in all the processional splendor which filled the long aisles.

The enthronement service was the oldest in ritual in the minster records. Prayers and petitions which were offered in Latin when Archbishops were enthroned five hundred years ago were intoned in English as Dr. Temple took his seat in the ancient choir, traditionally associated with the crowning of Saxon kings of Northumbria. As he uttered the oath to defend the "rights, privileges and customs of the Church of St. Peter and York", his hand rested on the faded pages of an Anglo-Saxon copy of the Gospels, the oldest and most treasured relic of the Minster.

Every seat in the nave was occupied by a distinguished assemblage, which included Princess Mary and her husband. They distinctly heard the Archbishop strike the doors of the Minister three times with his pastoral staff, petitioning to be indicted, installed and enthroned. His coming was heralded by a fanfare of trumpets and followed by an exultant chanting of the choir.

A feature of the Archbishop's sermon was an appeal for peace, both in the Church and in the world.

'If we loved our neighbors as ourselves,' he urged, 'the mutual suspicion of nations, the spectacle of competing in armaments, and the sacred claim of international peace would be felt as a rousing challenge to the Church. There is good will and concern for peace, but it does not strike deep enough.

'We are not, as a body, showing passionate concern and leadership as partisans of good will. If we loved our neighbors as ourselves we should think it as dreadful that our neighbors' children should be brought up in the slums as that our own should be. The misery of many of our coal fields, the continued depression due to bad trade, the inequalities of educational opportunity and the whole treatment by our country of a great part of its adolescent population would torment our conscience.' "

A Red Letter Day for Sewanee.

The University has qualified for the final balance of the $300,000 gift from the General Education Board. This means that, at last, the University has passed the million-dollar mile-stone in permanent endowment, the culmination of an effort begun nine years ago. The income from this is being used for more adequate salaries for professors and to bridge the gap in operating expenses between what the students pay and what their education costs the University.

It should be borne in mind that this achievement does not cover the needs set forth in the Sewanee Expansion Fund effort. That Fund calls for $2,000,000 additional, of which $442,000 has already been secured in cash or pledges. Part of the Expansion Fund is needed for further Endowment; but the bulk of it is for new buildings and equipment. As Bishop Gailor has well said, it is needed "not to redeem a failure, but to meet the demands of success".

One million of it is for building a new college unit. The present College has all the students it can accommodate; over one hundred applicants were turned away this year. The new college unit is a pressing necessity. Sewanee has always held to the Oxford plan of a group of small colleges, linked into the University, where the individual student is not lost in the mass. Perhaps you have read of the recent gift of $3,000,000 to Harvard for the establishment of a series of small colleges grouped round that University. This indicates that the educational world is turning towards the ideal for which Sewanee has stood for the seventy years of her existence.

The Board of Regents has unanimously elected the Rev. Moultrie Guerry to succeed Mr. de Ovies as Chaplain. Mr. Guerry has accepted and entered upon his duties at the beginning of the Epiphany Term, January 3, 1929. Thus he occupies the post which his father, the late Bishop of South Carolina, filled for so many years until his elevation to the Episcopate. Mr. Guerry was born in Sewanee while his father was Chaplain. He is in every sense a "Sewanee man", and is an admirable choice for the place.

Luncheon-Meeting for St. Luke's, Tokyo.

Women in the Dioceses of New York, Long Island and other nearby dioceses will start their active campaign for St. Luke's International Hospital, Tokyo, with a luncheon in the ball-room of the Hotel Waldorf Astoria on Saturday, February 2. This will be one of the last functions in the historic Fifth Avenue Hotel, which soon is to be torn down.

The luncheon will mark the culmination of the organization of parish committees, serving at the same time as an inspiration for the intensive work to be done in February. Mrs. Henry P. Davison, chairman of the National Women's Committee, which is working towards a goal of $1,000,000, will preside. The principal speaker will be Dr. Rudolf Bolling Teusler, founder of the hospital twenty-seven years ago and its director ever since.

In every parish a woman is accepting responsibility for securing hostesses for the different tables. Bishop Manning, in a letter written to Mrs. Davison, has signified his intention to be present. Rectors in the various parishes are cooperating and a large number of them are expected to attend the luncheon. A group of prominent Japanese women will be guests of honor.

This will be a colorful affair with Japanese flags used as decorations, young women in Japanese costumes acting as ushers, and a program of Japanese airs played by an orchestra.

Table reservations and information can be secured by communicating with Mrs. Charles Gilmore Kerley, chairman of the New York Women's Committee, at the headquarters at Room 1103, 7 Wall Street, the telephone number of which is Bowling Green 7018.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

St. John's Day Observed.

St. John the Evangelist's Day was observed at the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, Sunday morning, December 30, in order that a larger number of men might attend, and that the Bishop might be present to preach the sermon.

Since all Masonic lodges are dedicated to the Holy Saint John, it was decided that it would be fitting to invite the Masons to attend. Invitations were issued to four officers of each lodge in Atlanta, a total of one hundred and seventy-five men, because of the fact that the church has a seating capacity large enough to accommodate the communicants only. The church was crowded.

The Bishop called attention to the fact that a hundred and fifty years ago, December 27, 1778, General George Washington, Senior Warden of his church for many years, and Past Master of his lodge, with three hundred other Masons attended a service at Christ Church, Philadelphia.

The Rev. G. W. Gasque is rector of the church. G. N.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Coadjutor

The Convention of the Diocese of Maryland will be held in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels on Thursday, January 31, and Friday, February 1. The dates have been changed from January 30 and 31.

The Rev. Charles E. McAllister, of the Diocese of New Jersey, has started his new work in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore. The vestry and wardens will give Mr. and Mrs. McAllister a reception on Wednesday, January 23, in the parish house.

A conference for the Young People's Service League was held on Friday, Saturday and Sunday, January 11-13, in St. Anne's Church, Annapolis. The meetings were very successful and plans for the coming year were made.

The Church Mission of Help in the Diocese of Maryland completed its first year with much success. Tuesday, January 15, they held their first annual meeting with luncheon at the new Lord Baltimore Hotel and about two hundred people were present. Reports were given by the officers and much credit is due Miss Maria Martin, the Executive Secretary.

The Governing Board of the Blue Mountain Conference held a meeting in our Diocesan House on Wednesday, January 16, to consider plans for the Summer Conference to be held at Hood College, Frederick, Md., next summer. The Rev. Mr. M. B. Groton, of St. Thomas' Church, Whitemarsh, Pa., is Chairman of the Board. N. E. P.

WEST MISSOURI.

Rt. Rev. S. C. Partridge, D. D., Bishop.

Fortieth Annual Convention.

The Fortieth Annual Convention of the Diocese of West Missouri was held in St. Paul's Church and parish buildings, Kansas City, on Tuesday and Wednesday, January 15 and 16. It might well be called a Social Service Convention, so conspicuous was the emphasis upon that department of Christian work. The Rev. Harold Holt, assistant secretary of the Department of Social Service of the National Council was a speaker at the convention dinner and at a luncheon of clergy and delegates to the convention at which were present also a large number of the social workers of Kansas City. The Rev. Mr. Holt addressed also the convention in session on the second afternoon. The cause of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, was eloquently presented by the Rev. Richard M. Trelease, of the Field Department of the National Council.

At the convention dinner, held at the Ambassador Hotel, the work and aims of diocesan departments were presented by the Rev. B. N. Lovgren on Religious Education, the Rev. B. M. Washburn on Missions, the Rev. Robert Nelson Spencer on Social Service, and the Rev. Henry N. Hyde on general administration and outlook. Bishop Partridge presided as toastmaster.

The convention was blessed with large attendance and a general participation in its business. The date of holding next year's convention was changed from January to May, and the place selected was Christ Church, St. Joseph. Three parishes of former years in towns from which Church people have largely moved away, were changed to the status of missions: one of these was St. Mary's Church, Fayette, which gave to the Church Bishops Abiel Leonard and Ethelbert Talbot. The Standing Committee and other officials of the diocese were reelected. Some changes were made in the membership of the Executive Council. The diocese's pledge of recent years to the National Council, which yields $8,600, was renewed for 1929. Interest was shown in the work of the Student Center at the University of Missouri, for which a gift of $500 was voted. The Rev. Jas. P. De Wolfe and Mr. H. T. Poindexter, both of Kansas City, were elected trustees of the Student Center Corporation. A sum of $200 per year was voted to be set aside for Theological Education.

A complete list of the real property owned by the diocese and its churches with description of titles was furnished to members of the convention by the Diocesan Property Department, with request for verification or correction of titles. Proposed sale of the episcopal residence was reported by the Executive Council. Steps were taken for the early development of the Endowment Fund of the Diocese, to increase its capital to $100,000. Pledges made by parishes and congregations for diocesan and general missions and the Church's Program were $1,200 in excess of those made last year. The report of the treasurer of the diocese showed a surplus of $3,700. H. N. H.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

St. Paul's and St. Paul's Day.

The Bishop of Washington will administer the rite of Confirmation at St. Paul's Church on St. Paul's Day, January 25. This day is usually marked by a Confirmation service and later an informal reception in the parish house. This is also the anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Harding, formerly rector of St. Paul's Church, and second Bishop of Washington.

Arrangements are being made for a preaching Mission at St. Paul's Church during the last week of January, when the missioner will be the Rev. Julius A. Schaad, rector of St. Paul's Church, Augusta, Ga. The subject or theme of the mission will be, "Our Religion and the mission will be, "Our Religiou and How to Use It".

First Century Fellowship.

A number of Washington people attended the religious house party and the meeting of the First Century Fellowship, which was held in Annapolis, Md., January 18-22. It was unlike any other gathering of Church people, and seems to have made a profound impression upon all who were fortunate enough to be one of its number. Fellowship, Happiness and Personal Evangelism are outstanding characteristics of this house party. A similar meeting was held recently in Northampton, Mass., and this one at Annapolis was planned for the convenience of these people living farther South. Arrangements for the Annapolis House Party were under the direction of Mr. Lawrence Lee, one of the vestry of Christ Church, Georgetown.

Fellowship Dinner.

Preparations are well under way for the Fellowship Dinner in honor of Bishop Freeman, to be held at the New Willard Hotel on February 5. Mr. Bussey H. Howard is General Chairman of the Inter-Parochial Committee in charge and other members of the committee are: Mr. Edward A. Hailig, Secretary; Admiral Spencer S. Wood, Vestryman of Christ Church, Georgetown, Chairman of the Committee on Guests; Col. John H. Finney, curator of Washington Cathedral, Chairman of the Committee on Decorations, and Commander C. T. Jewell, in charge of the distribution of tickets and the handling of reservations.

Officers.

At the recent annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington held in St. John's Church, Sixteenth Street, on January 8, the following officers were elected: President, COLLECT FOR SEPTUAGESIMA SUNDAY.

O Lord, we beseech Thee favorably to hear the prayers of Thy people, that we, who are justly punished for our offenses, may be mercifully delivered by Thy goodness for the glory of Thy name, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

A PRAYER.

Teach me the truth, Lord, though it put to flight
My cherished dreams and fondest fancy's play;
Give me to know the darkness from the light,
The night from day.

Teach me the truth, Lord, though my heart may break
In casting out the falsehood for the true;
Help me to take my shattered life and make
Its actions new.

Teach me the truth, Lord, though my feet may fear
The rocky path that opens up to me;
Rough it may be, but let the way be clear
That leads to Thee.

Teach me the truth, Lord, when false creeds decay,
When man made dogmas vanish with the night,
Then, Lord, on Thee my darkened soul shall stay,
Thou living light.

—Frances Lockwood Green.

What is the Fatherhood of God?

A still deeper question relating to the personality and character of God is His relation to His creatures. Even a personal and good God might be remote from us and uninterested in us, but such a God would not satisfy our essential needs. Is God not only personal and good, but is He also our Father? This question brings God close to us and enfolds us in His everlasting Arm.

Fatherhood is the essential nature of God. He did not begin to be a Father when He created finite spirits, but He was a Father from all eternity. The Godhead, as we have seen, is essentially and eternally a relationship or society of personal distinctions in which Father, Son and Spirit exist in mutual fellowship and love. This complex rich nature of the Godhead is independent of the act of creation and is the necessary condition of the blessedness and the very existence of God. Without these internal and essential relations God would sink into a unitary Absolute or Pantheistic Fate in which all thought and love would be impossible.

The heart of fatherhood is kinship and love. It is a self-imparting and ex- [illegible] goes out to find [illegible] tion in others of its own kind. [illegible] as this Fatherhood in God tha[illegible]ed Him to create human children. His Fatherhood was eternally satisfied in His own Son, but it also sought further expression and satisfaction in created sons. His Fatherhood to His eternal Son was the pattern of created Sonship. This is the meaning of Paul when he said that He bowed his knees "unto the Father, from whom every fatherhood in heaven and on earth is named". Thus Fatherhood is essential in God, and is the eternal fountain out of which all human fatherhoods flow. We do not forget the infinite depth of this mystery, but all things run into infinite deeps and this mystery is the root of the divine Fatherhood and of our divine sonship.

All the creations of God must bear some marks or reflections of his own nature and likeness, and man as the highest creature we know most fully reflects His nature. This is the Scripture teaching. "And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him". And more definitely still: "And Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Fatherhood and sonship mutually bear each other's image and fit into and complete each other as the die the coin. Affinity is the tie that binds together the human father and son. A common nature in them is molded into the same likeness and they have common faculties and activities. The body of the son is derived from and is shaped on the same pattern as that of the father, and the soul of the father is breathed into the son. Like father like son is a world proverb. This is the relation of God to man and of man to God. God formed the human body and breathed into it his own breath of life and thus He stamped man with His own image. That God is like man and man is like God lies at the basis of all our philosophy and theology. Our minds are tiny reflections or images of God's infinite Mind, and therefore, we can think His thoughts and read the majestic language of his vast heavens and of all His creation. Our hearts bear His image and therefore we know the meaning of fellowship and love and of all the mystic emotions. Our wills are energized by His will and therefore we can do the same works that He does. The son repeats the father, and man repeats God. It is true there is an infinite difference between God and man in degree, but not in kind. The candle does not compare with the sun in size and splendor, but it is of the same substance and glory. So we are sparks of God and shine with His light. The dewdrop is tiny compared with the sun, but it reflects in its bosom the full-orbed image of the vast solar sphere. This is the high rank and dignity, the power and glory of man that he is a son of God bearing the Father's image.

Immense consequences flow from the Fatherhood of God. This imposes upon Him all the obligations of fatherhood, such as protection, care, guidance, fellowship and love. We have a right under proper caution and limitation to interpret God's Fatherhood in terms of our own and to know that all the affections of our human hearts for our children are but drops of love out of the infinite Heart of God. Whatever exists in finiteness and faultiness in us exists in Him in infinite fullness and perfection. And so we believe that the Heavenly Father will not disappoint us in fulfilling all fatherly relations. If we, being evil, give good gifts unto our children, much more shall our Heavenly Father give good gifts unto us? And God does not fulfill the fatherly relation simply because He is under obligation to do so, but He does so out of the freeness and fulness of His Fatherly nature. It is in Him a fountain gushing out in streams of affection and delight upon His children. He loves us with the same spontaneity and joy that we love our children, only in an infinitely deeper and fuller and richer measure.

Father is the most fully significant, the highest and best name for God, showering upon the most charming memories and suggestions. Other names for God, such as Spirit, the Eternal, the Mighty God, are valuable and help to fill out the picture that we strive to form of Him, but better than all these and inclusive of them all is Father. It is the name that Jesus used and filled out to fulness it had never contained before, and it is the name by which all His children know Him best. It throws its light upon Him and discloses Him to us in the most endearing relations and it lets us see into His very heart. It draws us into His everlasting Arm and presses us close to His breast so that we can feel the warmth of His love and hear the beating of His Heart. Into His Arm we fall in trust and know that all things are working together for our good. The very universe then becomes friendly, for we know it is our Father's home.—Presbyterian Banner.

THE MINISTRY OF FLOWERS.

A True Story of Two Easter Lilies.

Florence Montgomery Angell.

The last rays of the sun shone through the glass windows of the greenhouses and lingered for a moment with a caressing touch upon two tall white lilies, that stood within the shadow of the hot-house walls.

It was Easter Even. On the morrow would be celebrated the Divine Sacrifice of Our Lord, at an early hour in the church across the way. As the strong young plants stood there in the waning light, the blossoms talked together in hushed voices, for they had heard the gardener say, "Those two stately lilies over there against the wall, are to be cut for the altar at the early celebration".

Of course, you know, that flowers have an inarticulate language all their own. It is only because we mortals are so dull, that we cannot speak the language of the flowers. They knew that the morning would see a double sacrifice, and they bowed their pure, unsullied heads in meek submission.

One said softly, "It is hard to leave this world and not feel once more the warm touch of the sun", but the other replied, "Nay, not so; are we able to give our lives more beautifully than by laying them down in loving adoration of the One who gave us life"?

In the early Easter Morning, they found themselves on the altar as the minister read the words, "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above", and their hearts were satisfied. Breathing forth their beauty and fragrance, all through that Holy Day, the evening came. Two young people, as they gathered up the flowers, said, "We will take these two large lilies from the altar to one who today was compelled to keep Christ's Festival in her sick room", and they brought them to her, knowing that they would be doubly precious to one who loved the church.

And as her eyes rested upon them, memories of other Easters came, when as a child she sat beside her mother in the old church at home, and the memory of the look of holy peace upon that mother's face, brought the not unwelcome tears. Thoughts of her first Communion mingled with others not less sacred.

The days wore on, but the lilies' mission was not yet fulfilled. Her nurse said one day, "I am going to a party tonight, but I have no flowers to wear". And the dear lilies looked at their friend, as if to say, "Send us". So she said, "You must wear my white lilies; they will be just the thing with your coral dress". She demurred, but took them with her. I will let them tell their own thoughts.

One said, "How dazzling! How beautiful? Can one serve God here I wonder"? And the other replied, "I love better the solemn, holy quiet of the church as we stood on the altar". Then the first one spoke once more, "Can we not serve our Master quite as truly in this crowded place, as in the sick-room or within the Holy Church"?

And the other murmured, "Yes".

The next morning as the janitor swept up the fragments of the two torn and faded lilies, he muttered, "Foolishness", but the recording angel leaning over their souls (for flowers have souls, the theologians, notwithstandings), as they entered Paradise, greeted them with the words, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord".

IMMORTALITY.

Anne Horner Thomas.

Oh, to lift the veil of immortality,
Separating the spirit from eternity;
To look beyond the fate called death,
Which strips earth clay of its breadth.

To know what the future holds,
As the mystery of life unfolds
Of tomorrow, forgetting we are dust,
That life's path we tread in trust

We presume, in our limited sphere,
When into the future we peer,
The intervening curtain is controlled
By God, at His command unrolled.

In life's last hour, at the appointed time,
Heavenly hosts, with wisdom Divine,
Will reveal the mysteries of beyond,
The radiant glory of heaven's dawn.

When Indecision Is Cruelty.

"May I go to the canyon with you?" Nine-year-old Alice broached the question as soon as the hard, all-day trip came up for discussion in the party with which she and her mother were spending the summer. "Oh, I don't know—we'll see," said her mother gaily, interested in the plans and without giving the question any real consideration.

A decisive refusal at this point would probably have settled the matter without any great disappointment for Alice, but she speedily construed the evasive answer to mean that probably she could go, and made her plans accordingly, teasing for definite permission whenever the opportunity presented itself.

"When we go to the canyon I'm going to wear my high boots." "Shall I need my camera when we go to the canyon?" "Do you think I can ride Tex on the trail?" For a week it went on. The half-hearted "Mother is fraid it is too long a trip for a little girl", or "Mother doesn't think you had better plan on going", if heard, made no impression.

And when, on the evening before the expedition, Mrs. Morrison finally gave her decision and said that Alice could not go, what might have been expected happened. Alice begged and teased and cried heart-brokenly over the disappointment. Then her mother, torn between the desire to give in and let her go, and the fear of the dangers of the trip, added fuel to the fire by showing, only too plainly, that she was wavering. Eventually, Alice cried herself to sleep, and her mother went to bed with a raging headache.

Next morning the battle recommenced, Alice alternately teasing and crying, her mother commanding obedience and threatening to stay at home herself. Between the two, the pleasure of the start in the freshness of the early morning was spoiled for the entire party. The last glimpse from the bend of the trail showed Alice, full length on the grass, still sobbing in her anger and disappointment.

According to her grandmother, when the matter was irrevocably settled by the disappearance of the party, Alice gradually recovered her spirits and played quietly with the other children. In the evening she greeted the returning party with eager inquiries and an account of how she had spent the day. And so everything was forgotten and no harm was done — (?)

This was probably the worst demonstration during the summer, but minor ones were of frequent occurrence. Sometimes Alice won out, and sometimes her mother carried off the palm, but her mother was perfectly sincere in saying that she could not understand why Alice should be so nervous and sensitive, nor why she teased and whined and never minded until she was forced to do so.

Altogether, it somehow put one in mind of the story of the small boy who wanted to have his terrier's tail "bobbed". "But won't it hurt the dog to have his tail cut off?" some one inquired. "Oh, no, not much," he answered. "The man said he would do it a little bit at a time!"—May Whitcomb, in Nat. Kindergarten Association.

Value of Church Membership.

"Do you think a man could get to heaven without joining the church?" asked three good men of a preacher.

"I think he could."

They laughed, patted him on the back, and called him broad-minded.

"Let me ask you a question, and I want you to answer me just as quickly as I answered you," said the preacher. "Why do you want to go to heaven that way?"

They were speechless.

"Why don't you ask me another question?" suggested the preacher. "Why don't you ask me if a man could get to England without going on a boat?"

"Why," they said, "we will ask you that. Now what is the answer?"

"I see no reason why a man could not get to England without going on a ship, provided he was a good swimmer, tied some food between his shoulders to eat on the way, had strength to buffet all the waves, if a shark did not get him. And suppose you did get to England without a ship, do you think you would get there much ahead of the man who goes by ship?"—Selected.

For the Young Folks

THE GLOW-WORM.

I don't suppose a lady-bird
  Would ask a worm to tea,
She's low compared with butterflies;
  And dragon-flies agree
That worms are common, humble folk,
  Plain folk like you and me.

And yet the worm I'm thinking of Once made a painter sing;
Italia's greatest artist wrote
  A poem to the thing.
Shelley and Michael Angelo
  Both made its praises ring!

The worm they hymned is squat and brown,
  She shuns the light of day;
At dusk she brings her lantern out
  For folk who've gone astray,
And many a weary ant or bee
  She sets upon its way.

Her sphere is low and narrower
  Than any human lot,
A wheel-track or a tuft of grass
  Is all that she has got;
Love makes it seem a fairy land,
  A Sultan's garden-plot.

We plain folk can't be butterflies,
  But why should we repine?
A glow-worm looks an ugly thing
  Until it starts to shine,
And then its beauty makes earth glad,
  And so may yours and mine.

My Grandfather's Story.

Mr. Collins' bear stories so interested me that I told my grandfather about it the next day. "So it's bear stories that you want, is it?" he asked with a twinkle in his eyes. "Well, why didn't you say so? I have one or two of my own that you might like to hear."

"I certainly do want to hear them," I answered. "Will you tell them to me, grandfather?"

This is my grandfather's bear story exactly as he told it:

"I was with a surveying party up in Dakota when I was a young man. Our camp was located not far from the Black Hills. The outfit consisted of the usual number of surveyors and helpers, a camp cook and a big Scotch deer-hound named Wolf.

"The dog belonged to me. I had raised him from a small puppy and when I went out on the job I took him along with me. Before we had been in camp very long Wolf formed a great friendship with Deadshot Deadman, an old hunter who lived on a small ranch up in the hills. Deadshot made his living by supplying ranchers, mining camps and others with meat and game. He brought us everything the forest hills afforded, rabbits, squirrels, deer meat and rich, juicy bear steaks.

"Wolf followed Deadshot off the very first time he saw him and from that on they were often gone together for a week at a time. The dog proved a very valuable aid to the hunter. He was intelligent and obedient, big, long-legged, silent fellow as swift as a grey-hound.

"One day when they returned from an unusually long trip Deadshot brought back a tiny black bear cub with him. He had picked it up on the trail where it had apparently been abandoned by its mother.

"It was not long before every man in camp was making a special pet of that little bear cub. It was so ridiculously small, so helpless and hairless, so wobbly on its legs and so friendly with everybody that we just couldn't help it.

"Wolf seemed to consider it his own special charge. Whenever he wanted the cub to go along with him he would push it gently before him with his long sharp nose. Baby Bear did not like this at first, but would utter loud, frightened cries. But it wasn't long before he was very willing to trust it all to Wolf. Then almost before we knew it he had learned to run about by himself, walking in true bear fashion, which is planti-grade or flat-footed like a bare-footed man. His shambling gait and the fact that he lifted both feet on the same side of his body at the same time was very amusing to us all.

"We gave him no bear name but Baby Bear, and Wolf seemed to return to his own puppyhood, so many and so merry were the pranks they played together. They would chase each other about the camp for hours at a time and Wolf always pretended that he could not run very fast so that the cub might keep up with him.

"One of the men bought a collar for Baby Bear and had a little silver bell attached to the collar. That bell tinkled merrily in and out of the camp for a period of two years as the cub grew rapidly into a strong young bear. Then one day he disappeared. He went out into the forest near the camp for a morning walk as was his frequent habit and he never came back.

"For a time Wolf was inconsolable. He was lonesome without his playmate and hunted for him for days. Then all at once he seemed to forget him.

" 'It's a good thing that bear is gone,' said Deadshot Deadman. 'Now maybe I can get some hunting out of Wolf. He's been nothing but a bear nurse ever since I brought that cub to camp.'

"The hunter was right, for when he started out on his next trip the dog raced gaily ahead of him as if glad to go hunting again. For more than a year the hunter and the dog between them kept our table well supplied with game and meat. Then an order came from the government for our party to break camp and go to a point about fifty miles away, where our services were badly needed.

"We closed our camp very carefully. We had learned to feel very much at home there, and had been assured that we would be returned there to finish our job when the emergency work was over. I left Wolf with Deadshot. I knew he would be well taken care of and be kept active in the hunt as well.

"When we returned to the camp at the foot of the Black Hills two years later we sent at once for the hunter and dog. They came the next morning and that night we had deer meat for dinner.. We settled down to regular work again and all things went well with us in camp. We had a good cook, a reliable hunter, a dependable dog and plenty of work, so there was nothing else to do but be contented with our lot.

"One cold morning in the fall Deadshot and Wolf started out to hunt for big game. He had planned for a week's trip and we were quite unprepared for his return that very afternoon and the surprise he brought back with him.

"It seems that the hunters had not gone very far from camp when Wolf picked up a bear trail. The tracks were fresh, so the hunter and the dog followed them for several hours, up one side of a rocky hill and down another. At last they dropped abruptly down into a little valley surrounded by scrub pine trees and right before their eyes was a big black bear.

"Wolf gave a deep growl and rushed the bear only to have him disappear in a clump of trees. 'Get him, Wolf!' cried Deadshot, grasping his gun more firmly and starting after them on a run.

"Wolf covered the ground with leaps and bounds, uttering short, sharp barks as he always did when he was excited, and the hunter followed as fast as he could over the rough ground. Finally he came upon a most astonishing sight.

"The bear and the dog were standing side by side nuzzling each other while Wolf continued his short, joyful bark as if he would tell the hunter good news. Deadshot thinking that Wolf had gone crazy, advanced very cautiously his gun ready for instant action. Wolf ran to meet him barking more loudly and joyfully than ever. Then he turned and scampered back to the bear again.

"As soon as he could get close enough to see plainly, Deadshot Deadman knew by the two peculiar white patches on the bear's breast and a tiny brown mark on the muzzle, that they had found Baby Bear again. But not a baby now, for he was a very powerful and handsome black bear that would weigh apparently 500 pounds.

"The bear recognized the hunter just as he had the dog, for he stood erect on his big haunches and waddled forward in a very friendly manner. When Deadshot examined the bear's neck there was no doubt of his identity. For there were still marks of the collar which he wore when a tiny bear, although the collar itself, of course, was gone.

"Deadshot had no trouble whatever in bringing the big bear back with him. He stayed about the camp for several days, then wandered off again. But he returned at intervals most unexpectedly. He would always come sniffing up to the cook's tent begging for table scraps. He had learned to eat them as a little cub and he seemed to prefer them to other food.

"When he had eaten his fill he would always have a romp with Wolf and then they would lie down side by side for a nap, always the best of friends. Then we lost him again. He disappeared the second time as mysteriously as he had the first and we never saw him again.

"Orders came to break camp again when we had finished our surveying job to the entire satisfaction of the government. Deadshot told us that he thought he had finished hunting and would go back to his little ranch in the Black Hills. He begged me to give him Wolf and this I readily agreed to do. I knew that the old hunter would take good care of the dog who was growing old. My future plans were just then a bit unsettled and I wanted to make sure that Wolf had a good home.

"When we were finally ready to leave we saw that the old hunter had placed all of his belongings on the back of a pack mule and was ready to start also. He shook hands all round, and wished us success and good health for the future, called, 'Come along Wolf', and hunter and dog vanished from our sight along the upward trail."—Junior World.

KIND WORDS TO SOOTHE.

Martha S. Lippincott.

If you have a word to say
That will lighten some sad heart,
Quickly say the pleasant word
That will joy and peace impart.
Wait not until days of grief
Fill the heart with needless woe;
But your sweetest sympathy
On the aching heart bestow.

Thus will grief be driven back
By the sunshine of your love,
And the heart that felt despair
Be in spirit led above
To the blessed realms of hope
Where the soul, sweet peace, will find
And such comfort in your words,
Which were tender, loving, kind.

When Rosy Ran Away.

Once upon a time, there was a runaway—not a runaway horse, nor a runaway train of cars, but just a plain, little runaway duck. Now I know that will make you laugh, but when I tell you the runaway duck was lame, you will laugh still more—not because the poor duck was lame, but because it sounds funny to call a duck that is lame a runaway.

Maybe you will laugh harder, too, when I say that the duck's name was Rosy; for whoever heard of a duck named Rosy?

Anyway, Rosy was the duck's name, Rosy was lame and Rosy ran away, however hard you laugh. Poor little Rosy!

The day Rosy ran away was so cold that a pail of water which grandfather had left out near the barn froze hard in the night. He forgot to bring in the water, for he found Rosy was not in the barn, so had hurried off hard and fast to find her.

In the morning Rosy was still lost, so little Vincent and Alice said they would hunt for her in grandfather's woods back of the barn. They found her tracks in the snow and saw that they went to the fence at the edge of the woods.

"It makes me think of our Sunday-school lesson last Sunday," said Vincent, "about hunting for the one sheep that was lost, only this time it is Rosy instead of a sheep."

"Yes," said Alice, "but I think we ought to hunt just as hard as though she really were that sheep."

They did, too. Over the fence for a short space were Rosy's tracks. Then, where some logs lay, they lost the trail and hunted a long time before they found it. It took the whole morning to find poor, lost Rosy, and then they nearly did not find her, for they almost passed the place where she had crawled into a hole in a log.

Poor Rosy was too cold to quack. Vincent cuddled her inside his coat. Soon they were back in the barn. After a warm meal Rosy felt better and was glad to go to her soft nest. Vincent and Alice shut her in for the night themselves. The snow had blown so that Vincent had to push the door shut with a board while Alice locked it.

"You won't run away any more, will you, Rosy?" said Alice.

"Quack, quack!" said sleepy Rosy, and any one knows that meant "No".—Exchange.

Jingle Bells.

Missed you at the Ferrises the other night," phoned Bob Tubbin, who is head of the gym at High School. "You'd have been taking notes on the opening game. It was a new one to me, and got the crowd acquainted and happy quicker than scat! . . Some one's calling me. . . . Tell you about it next time I see you. Good-by!"

"Wish he'd have told me what they called it," I muttered as he hung up. So, having to go down town, as we call the village proper, I was stopping at the Public Garage to get full particulars from Tommy Trotter, when I heard the boss, Mr. Jenks, say to a customer, 'Can't seem to find anything the matter with your car, only she won't go. But Tom'll be back pretty soon and he'll tell us what's the matter in a jiffy. Reg'lar expert at that sort o' thing!"

Coming to the West Beecham Savings Bank, I went in to see what Howard Ferris could tell me. He's a messenger there. As though fate wished to keep me in ignorance of the new game, the boy wouldn't be in for an hour. Now, I was determined to get the information I was after, and before I went home.

Miss Zeffer was coming down the street, mincing along on her toes as usual, and looking particularly ethereal. As she was never known to miss a party of any sort, I wished her good-morning and asked how she had enjoyed the one at the Ferrises.

"Oh, we all had a most delectable time!" she gushed, with her silly whimper. "We played Hopover and Hex and everything, and I won a prize for Alpha Solitaire. But they had us begin with the most terrible nonsense—really, I thought I'd die! And in order to reach the supper table—oh, excuse me—there's Sue Brooks in her car—she promised to take me home," and over the way she started, twittering to Sue. I was desperate by this time, and hastened after her.

"Please tell me the name of the terrible game?" I called.

"What? Oh, why, they called it Jingle Bells!" she replied, as off they drove.

Well, I'd gotten something for my persistence, but was still to find out just what Bob Tubbin thought a great game and our fluffy friend an awful one.

Limp, the newsboy, came smiling along with his ware, and I asked him my oft-repeated question.

"Everett asked me to the party," he answered, "but I couldn't go, Mr. Vee. Folks are awfully good the way they invite me to their houses, and me only what I am; but my one good suit needed mending, and I side-stepped this time. People are talking about playing something called Jingle Bells, but I don't know what it is."

"Neither do I," I grunted—"but I'll canvass the town, if necessary, to find out."

"There's your chance now!" said Limpy, pointing across the street at a slouching figure. "Hank Darby was there, I know, and he's been growling ever since."

I knew just how to secure his attention, and I wasted no time about it. Inside of three minutes we were drinking ice cream sodas in the drug store, and I had asked the fateful question.

"Jingle Bells?" repeated the elderly man, scornfully. "I'll say I do know all about it. It's the drattedest mess of nonsense I ever got tied up with! Y'see, they had a room all criss-crossed with string, low and high and every-which-way, like as if a thousand giant spiders had been at work. As if that wasn't enough, what'd they done but hang little bells from the strings, here and there. And each one of us had to make our way through that tangle, from one end of the road to t'other—and if we made a bell tinkle, we had to start all over ag'in! Did you ever hear the heat?"

"I think that's one bully idea!" I commented.

"Plain to see you wasn't there!" grumbled my indignant companion, starting on his second glass. "Took me half an hour, seemed as if, to climb through the thing. And mebbe you think that was the end of it? Not much. The worst was to come. After we'd played games till we was all wore out—leastways, us older folks was—and hungry 'nough to eat horsemeat, what are we told but that every single one of us must go through that web ag'in without a tingle, in order to get to the supper table! Jingle Bells—yah! Don't say the name ag'in. Yes, I'll have one more."—Jolly Book of New Games: Revell Co., N. Y.

Crickets and Birds and the Human Heart.

The older I grow—and I regret to say that I am growing older every minute—the more painfully conscious I become of my own ignorance. As a writer I have frequent occasion for ardently wishing that I knew more, had traveled more widely, had seen more things and experienced more adventures, had studied more deeply. For one thing, I wish I were a naturalist. But when I read an author like W. H. Hudson I am in despair. I know that it takes a lifetime to know very much about any one thing, and I have begun too late. And yet I sometimes comfort myself with the thought that there are compensations in this very ignorance. It leaves the way wide open for innumerable discoveries, and discoveries are more exciting than knowledge.

One afternoon in October I went down cellar to feed a hungry furnace. At the foot of the cellar stairs I was arrested by the chirp of a cricket, so loud and so close to my ear that I was startled. I had an electric flashlight in my hand and I turned its ray full on the little creature. I found him on a narrow ledge, a projecting stone in the underpinning of our old farm-house, just on a level with my eye. For a time he did not seem to mind the glare and continued his shrill fiddling with vigor. I was within a few inches of him and was able to observe for a full minute the incredibly swift vibration of his inner wings.

I knew very well from my reading that the cricket chirped with his wings, and that it was an old story to naturalists, but never before had it been my privilege to witness the operation.. I experienced all the thrill of having made a discovery new to science, since it was new to me. I remember feeling the same exultation once when I came upon a toad on a rock in the mating season and watched his puffed and quivering throat as he trilled forth his love call.

I have several friends who can justly lay claim to a working knowledge of ornithology such as I have never fully acquired. In June I was walking in our woods with one of them when from out of the depths of a nearby thicket there sounded a rapturous, bell-like bird song that seemed to soar away to heaven.

"Hear that wood thrush!" I cried.

My friend listened till it was repeated and then shook his head.

"No," said he, "a hermit thrush."

Then he told me that the wood thrush sometimes sings a song somewhat more extended than his usual triplets and that the hermit thrush sometimes abbreviates his more sustained melody, and he tried to explain to me how to distinguish between the longer song of the wood thrush and the shorter song of the hermit.

"You can't mistake them when you know," said he.

I fear I am very stupid, but the lesson is still unlearned and I cannot yet be sure which is which. But I am sure of one thing. When that song comes tinkling to me through the woods it fills me with a joy and a sort of spiritual excitement as great as any my ornithological friend can possibly feel.

The older I grow the more firmly convinced I become that knowledge is not everything. Or perhaps I should say that there is a sort of spiritual comprehension that transcends intellectual understanding. From the naturalist's point of view I know very little about the birds and other wild creatures on my farm, but I have come to know them. And with that acquaintance has come an affection that is not mere admiration or delight in observing their beauty and swiftness and intelligence. It is rather a sense of brotherhood with them, as if they and I were members of the same family, owing one another a clannish allegiance and fraternal kindness. This feeling has grown upon me until, when I come unexpectedly upon them in their hidden haunts, or hear the exuberant songs of invisible birds,

"a sudden tremor goes
Into my veins and makes me kith and kin
To every wild-born thing".

I have sometimes wondered whether some of that feeling might not be destroyed by a more intimate knowledge of species and structure and habits Perhaps not, for the most indefatigable naturalists are unquestionably nature lovers. Witness Hudson and Thoreau, Agassiz and Burroughs. All the same, it seems fairly obvious that one can learn little of spiritual value concerning the fragrance of the rose or the song of the catbird by means of laboratory dissection.

I do not wish to seem to be disparaging scientific knowledge. I wish I had more of it myself. The point I wish to make is that scientific knowledge is not essential to a sympathetic understanding of nature. Most of us have not the time or the opportunity to acquire such learning, but that need not prevent our enjoyment of the life which so abundantly populates this fair world of ours. More than that, it need not prevent our acquiring a personal, intimate comprehension of our little neighbors. I sometimes think it might be well to study natural history less and nature more.

You may not be equipped with any of the formal facts of natural history, you may be unable to recognize more than half a dozen kinds of birds, you may not know whether the red squirrel sleeps all winter or comes out on sunny days to forage, but you can have the birds and the squirrels for friends just the same. Get out into the open where God's creatures live and let His own good knowledge find its way somehow to your heart. Go without book or chart, but go with eyes and ears open, and above all, with heart attuned to the universal harmony. Take the children with you, and observe how they react to the little discoveries of a country walk, and then try to approach nature yourself with something of their childlike wonder.

That's the way I like to know my little neighbors of the woods and fields, not as species in a text-book but as kindred in the family of nature. Let the children acquire that attitude and you will have no need to teach them kindness to animals as a moral precept. If, through frequent intercourse, you can attain to that understanding and sympathy, I cannot imagine your ever shooting a woodcock or a rabbit for sport or setting a trap for a fox.—Walter A. Dyer, in Our Dumb Animals.

A NEW INTELLIGENCE TEST.

Washington, D. C.—(Special).—Reliable statistics indicate the startling fact that the average person cannot hope to pass even an elementary intelligence test without being "up" on important political, scientific and international current events. The man or women who bases expectations of being judged intelligent on what was learned in school or college is doomed to failure. For this reason alone over 3,000,000 people make the Pathfinder their mentor and guide. This remarkable illustrated weekly magazine from the Nation's capital puts things so clearly and briefly that one is repaid a thousand fold by investing 15 cents in the next 13 big issues. The editor says it costs him a lot of money to make this liberal offer, but it pays him to invest in the thousands of new friends who are hurrying to take advantage of it. Just send 15 cents in coin or stamps to the Pathfinder, Dept. 231, Washington, D. C., and be assured of 3 months of amazingly good reading. Adv.

A Paper Which Any Church Family Should Be Proud Of

January 18, 1929.

Langbourne M. Williams, Esq.,
Richmond, Va.

My Dear Sir and Brother:

I am a clergyman of the Church and what I am going to say is a personal letter and not for publication, although if you wish to quote any part of it, you are at perfect liberty to do so, without my name.

When you first took over The Southern Churchman, I thought you were going to be too radical, but every number gets better. I glory in your loyalty and fidelity in standing for the pure Gospel of the New Testament, and the Book of Common Prayer. The Southern Churchman is a paper which any Church family should be proud to have enter the home. You stand for the Virgin Birth and Deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and I am glad you have the courage to question the intellectual honesty of any Priest of the Protestant Episcopal Church who does not stand for the Divinity of our Lord.

You also stand four-square for the teaching of the Church as found in the Prayer Book. I have no patience with the Roman Catholic element in the Church, who apparently are trying to Romanize the Anglican Church. Every one who knows anything about the Church of England and the Church of Ireland knows at the Reformation the original Apostolic and Catholic Church was Reformed, and the original Faith and Government of the New Testament was restored. The only name used in the New Testament is The Church, and in the Apostles' Creed, The Holy Universal (catholic) Church. The only name in the Bible is The Church and personally I question the right of any one to change the Bible name. Our Church was given the legal title of Protestant Episcopal after the Revolution, but it is a part of the original Church as founded by our Lord and the first Apostles, and our real name is: "The Church in the United States." I have run across many people, especially down South who have left the Church and became Baptists, because they did not read in the Bible of any Protestant Episcopal Church, or any Episcopalians, but had heard of John the Baptist. They were fairly intelligent people, too. We may think it a joke but they have left the Church for that reason.

With best regards,

Faithfully yours,

Minister.

She is also survived by a brother and sister, Mr. Robert Douthat and Mrs. Robert M. Stribling, Markham, Va.

"Well done, thou good and faithful servant" sums up her life's work. Having a religion that was as practical as it was real, she used the talents entrusted to her and returned them to the Giver with usury. Endowed with a strong mind and retentive memory, and blessed with a sense of humor and a cheerful spirit, she was delightful in conversation, especially when recalling facts and incidents connected with the history of her distinguished family. These talents of mind and spirit were unreservedly laid on the altar of her home life and most earnestly consecrated to the duties and responsibilities of wifehood and motherhood. It is as an ideal wife and mother that she will be remembered and revered. The memory of her unselfish devotion, of her labors of love and of her wise guiding hand is a goodly heritage to her bereaved children.

After a service in Leeds Parish Church, Fauquier County, on the Feast of the Epiphany, Sunday, January 6, conducted by the rector, the Rev. F. H. Hinkel, she was laid to rest with her sainted loved ones, in the presence of a large gathering of relatives and friends.

What's become of the "Superfluous Woman?"

THESE were the women that the census taker used to put down as "Females without Occupation." You know. Women with grown-up families. And the familiar ailing relatives that had to be supported by some other member of the family.

What's become of these so-called "superfluous women?" Health has everything to do with it. Just talk to women who've been successful along their own particular lines. They'll all tell you they take Nujol regularly.

"I learned that good habit from our school doctor," you'll be told. "She advised all the girls to take it, especially whenever we had to cut down on our regular exercise. You know how headachy and dull you're apt to feel. Well, you'd be surprised to see what a difference it makes if you take some Nujol for a few days beforehand."

No harm trying. For Nujol can't possibly upset you, even when you're below par. It contains absolutely no medicine or drugs. Perfected by the Nujol Laboratories, 26 Broadway, New York. Sold only in sealed packages.

Times have changed.

Nujol not only keeps any excess of body poisons from forming (we all have them) but aids in their removal. Buy a bottle of Nujol from your druggist today.

The Harness That Held.

In the recent past I saw a thrilling sight on one of the streets of Brooklyn. A fine engine, drawn by three magnificent horses, was going to answer an alarm of fire. The engine was coming down a broad avenue paved with asphalt, and the horses were galloping at their fastest speed.

Suddenly, one of the horses slipped on the smooth asphalt pavement, and losing his footing, slipped completely to the ground. It was impossible for the driver to stop the other horses, and on went the engine. At first I feared there would be a terrible accident, for the horse that had fallen could not regain his feet, and it seemed as if the engine would be wrecked and perhaps the driver would be killed.

But the harness by which the fallen horse was attached to the engine was strong, and it held the horse securely as he slipped along the asphalt pavement. For almost a block he slid along the avenue, and then at last engine and horses came to a sudden stop, as they ran up against the curb stone, where stood another horse and wagon. The shock of the collision, as the engine struck the wagon, was so great that it broke the light harness by which the horse was attached to the wagon, all to pieces, and the horse started to run away.

Meanwhile, one of the brave firemen had jumped to the ground, and quickly stopped the runaway horse. The other firemen went to the assistance of their own horse and got him on his feet again, unhurt by his long slide. They looked over the harness, and found it was still secure and unbroken, and in another minute they were galloping off again to answer the fire alarm.

It was a thrilling sight, and I thought of the many ways in which these brave men who serve as firemen risk their lives. And I also thought of the man who had made that set of harness which held the fire engine horse so firmly. That harness maker had done his work well, and in so doing he had helped to save some precious lives.—Olive Leaf.

EPIPHANY.

This is the blessed time of year
When wise men from afar
Saw in the heavens, shining clear,
The Saviour's little star.

And still He is the Star of Earth,
And still our lifted eyes
May see Him shining clear and true
Up in the tender skies.

WORK TO RECLAIM OUR OWN JEWS

Hopes that this year shall be memorable for advancement of the cause of Christianity begin to find expression in activities the first month. Among the foremost, and, in some respects most important, of these activities are the renewed and increased endeavors to carry on work here in our own country and among our own people for reclamation of the Jews, bringing them to belief that Christ really is their Messiah, already come. The importance of this great task is being understood by increasing numbers of thoughtful people who realize that many of our Jews are among the most useful, strong and intelligent citizens we have and that if an appreciable number of them could be brought to share our faith the gain would be tremendous.

Reports from New York, which may be regarded as the intellectual, social and financial center of the four millions of American Jewry, indicate that more than one church there is alive to the importance of the subject and the magnificent possibilities of earnest and faithful striving. Sunday, 20th., the Rev. Dr. Roelif H. Brooks preached in St. Thomas' Church, New York City, a very earnest and stirring sermon in behalf of the Hebrew-Christian Publication Society, Room 405 Bible House, New York, which is the leading and most aggressive organization for prosecution of this work, many members and friends of the society being present.

The Presbyterians are enlisted also. The fifteenth anniversary of the society, which has been laboring patiently and unostentatiously and against neglect and innumerable discouragements, will be celebrated February 3rd in the First Presbyterian Church, the leading church of that denomination in the city, Fifth Avenue and Twelfth Street. Dr. Brooks, S. T. D., who is rector of St. Thomas' Church, will preside. The speakers will be the Rev. George Alexander, pastor of the First Presbyterian; the Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie, president of the South American Inland Mission and treasurer of the Publication Society, and William Phillips Hall, president of the American Tract Socity.

MIRACLES

NOTHING IS IMPOSSIBLE IN GOD'S WORK

"To the true disciple miracles present no difficulties," the Rev. Dr. Joseph P. McComas, vicar of St. Paul's Episcopal Chapel, Trinity Parish, asserted in his sermon Sunday morning on "Logic of Miracles."

"The logical objection to miracles is founded on disbelief in the Incarnation, in the existence of sin, and in the atoning power of Christ," he said. "It would be illogical for an unbeliever to believe in them. But for the believer the higher law enters in. God has no limits; nothing is impossible, and all is natural. Miracles are the manifestation of the deity of our Lord and of the Church's membership in Him.

"God works miracles to-day through His Church, raising up to higher things, atoning for our sins who never live righteously and justly, sending the Holy Ghost to empower us to do His work."—New York Times.

"While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light. These things spake Jesus, and departed, and did hide himself from them.

"But though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him:

"That the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he sapake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?

"Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again,

"He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them.

"These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and spake of him.

"Nevertheless among the chief rulers also many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue:

"For they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God.

"Jesus cried and said, He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me.

"And he that seeth me seeth him that sent me.

"I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me should not abide in darkness.

"And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world.

"He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: THE WORD THAT I HAVE SPOKEN, THE SAME SHALL JUDGE HIM IN THE LAST DAY.

"For I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak.

"And I know that his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever I speak therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak."—St. John 12:36-50.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Christ did not have much to say about death. His theme was life.

The distinction between Christianity and all other systems of religion consists largely in this, that in the others men are found seeking after God, while Christianity is God seeking after men.

It is only the great-hearted who can be true friends; the mean and cowardly never know what true friendship means. —Carles Kingsley.

"One asked a sign from God and day by day
Each night the stars appeared in bright array;
The sun arose in pearl, in scarlet set;
Each morn the thirsty grass with dew was wet;
The corn failed not its harvest, nor the vine—
And yet he saw no sign!"

It is said that the Roman Pontif once said to the great Catholic theologian, Thomas a Quinas, "You see, Thomas, the Church can no longer say, 'Silver and gold have I none'." Thomas replied, "Neither can it longer say, 'In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, walk.'"

Hold fast to love. If men wound your heart, let them not embitter it; let them not shut up or narrow it; let them only expand it more and more, and be able to say with Paul, "My heart is enlarged".—F. W. Robertson.

When once Christians realize that salvation means a vital union with Jesus Christ, an actual sharing of His life dwelling and working in us, and the consecration of our whole being to live and labor, to think and will, and find our highest joy in living as a royal priesthood, the Church will put on her strength, and prove, in intercourse with God and man, how truly the likeness and the power of Christ dwell in her.—Andrew Murray.

There is no standing still. Each soul is either a little stronger or a little weaker, a little nobler or a little less noble, a little more self-reliant, or a little more dependent today than yesterday.

"The motive of our salvation does not lie in anything in ourselves at any time or in any circumstances. It lies in God's own loving and saving. Hence there are no conditions of fitness prescribed. "Whosoever will let him take of the water of life freely." "Come, buy without money and without price."

"Prayer is at least as real and living a force in the world as any of the great forces revealed to us by natural science. It seems to most of us capricious and unreliable for the same reason, for example, that electricity seemed so to a world which knew it only as flashes of lightning or sparks from a black cat; namely, that we do not understand its nature or its laws. When we do so, we shall be able to pray with power, as Christ did, and all the saints in their degree. We shall share His perfect confidence and we shall understand that we 'have not because we ask not'."—Maude Royden.

"THINGS SEEN ARE TEMPORAL; THINGS UNSEEN ARE ETERNAL."

Is it really the case that we are up in the air with regard to moral principles, and that we have to start out afresh and with the help of Natural Science create a new set of moral principles and rules of conduct to suit the taste of the age in which we live?

We do not think this can be so, for we believe that morality is based upon eternal principles which are unchangeable, though individuals and communities and nations may, from time to time, vary in their acceptance and practice of them. There have been great moral teachers throughout the ages, who have had a clearer vision of these eternal truths and principles than their fellow men, who have, however, realized the truth and value of their teaching.

We may, of course, look at things from a purely scientific point of view and trace the growth of social duties and obligations up from the uncivilized to the highly cultivated races; but this only carries us part of the way, for there are duties and obligations which have reference to our relationship with God, and which bring us into the higher sphere of religion.

If we ignore or refuse to accept the obligations involved in our duty towards God, and prefer to make life subserve our own ends, then, of course, our rules of conduct will sink to any level we choose to set them at, and in such cases standards of conduct will vary accordingly.

It is no wonder, therefore, that where one's duty towards God is disregarded by members of the younger generation they should feel themselves leaderless and should ask: "What is the use?" "What is the good?"

Now, if this is the situation, is not the Church capable of furnishing competent guidance and leadership in these matters? If not it would amount to an admission of bankruptcy on her part.

But before dealing with the message of the Church to the rising generation, it may be as well to deal with the suggestion that Science will show the way out of the present difficulties.

It seems remarkably strange, however, that at the very time when Science seems to have reached such a wonderfully high level, so far as adding to the conveniences and opportunities of life is concerned, and has done so much towards the conquest of disease, that we find morals at such a low ebb. It would seem to show that Science, in spite of all its marvellous discoveries, has its limitations, and that there is a large field left open for the supplementary work of religion. How can this great advance on the material side of life, give happiness and satisfaction to men if it is accompanied by moral and spiritual decadence?

It has been suggested that Science has brought about "a change in the moral situation", by providing a means of escape from the natural consequences of one of the sins of the flesh, but it has merely removed the dread of consequences, and thus made the temptation to sin less easy to resist. Science has not made immoral acts, moral, because they are not found out, and while the natural consequences are avoided, the more serious consequences of a moral corruption of the inner life remain the same. Science has also provided means by which a burglar can blow up a safe and rob a bank or store, but this has not changed the moral situation, the crime is still a crime, and as morally wrong as ever.

How, then, can the Church take the lead in moral progress? It is not sufficient merely to provide entertainment for the young people and give them a pleasant time in order to, at any rate, keep them in touch with her various organizations in the hope that these contacts, however slight, may lead gradually to a real interest in religion. For it is doubtful whether this form of introducing the young people to the mysteries of the Christian faith is as effective as a more direct appeal to their higher nature and by challenging them to a life of Spiritual adventure.

For Christianity teaches us plainly and clearly that we have a two-fold nature, physical and spiritual, or a lower and higher one, and that the lower must be brought under the control of and serve the interests of the higher, even when it requires self-denial and self-sacrifice to do so. For, "the flesh lusteth against the Spirit and the Spirit against the flesh and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would" (Gal. 5:17).

And the message of the Church should give no uncertain sound on this subject, and she may well take the teaching of St. Paul for the basis of her own.

For St. Paul, with his constant contact with moral conditions in Corinth, and other Greek cities, could probably give the teachers of behaviorism of the present day, some valuable information as to the effects of living after the flesh among the non-Christian population of His own time.

In fact, he gives us in his Epistle to the Galatians, an analysis of the works of the flesh as contrasted with the fruits of the Spirit, and in these works of the flesh he places first: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, and he adds a stern warning against allowing the flesh to control the life, instead of the Spirit; for he says, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption" (Gal. 6, 8).

And this warning is amply confirmed by the verdict of history on the same subject. Byron, by no means a moralist himself, in one of his poems refers to the universal "record of the past", as consisting of an unvarying sequence: "Wealth, vice, corruption, barbarism last." And it might be written as an epitaph on many of the great civilizations of the past, "Perished through moral corruption".

Christianity is not an easy-going religion with ample concessions to human frailty, for Christ Himself said: "If any man will come after me let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily and follow me."

The suggestion of "sanctified unmarried unions" is a following of Mohammed and not of Christ. It would, too, be highly inconsistent to demand as a condition of membership, in the Church, that we must renounce "all the sinful lusts of the flesh", and then turn round and sanctify them. The Church is on firm ground in withstanding the suggestion that she should let down the bars.

But her message must not be merely negative. She must set forth the higher life of the Spirit in such a way as to make it more desirable than the lower life of the flesh. The Early Church was able to do this, in spite of the fact that she had nothing to offer in the way of material advantages and attractions. There were no beautiful churches, no ornate services, and ritual, and also no social advancement, so far from that, the profession of Christianity involved social ostracism with the risk of imprisonment and even martyrdom, and yet, strange to say, the Church won its way and became the religion of the civilized world.

What the Church did once, under far more adverse conditions, she can do again, but this cannot be done by relying upon money or magnificent buildings or elaborate organization. These have their place and value, but it is not through them that the victory will be won. It is through the development of the spiritual life, by union with Christ, and the possession and exercise of spiritual power that she will win a recognition from the world of the superiority of spiritual values over the way of the flesh.

Lyman Abbott in the last year of his life, wrote in the Outlook: "Nothing does this age need more than a re-discovery of the Spiritual universe." Here is a quest which should appeal to the younger generation if the Church can only succeed in awakening its interest and firing its imagination. For if earth is the shadow of heaven, as Milton said, then the wonders of Nature as revealed to us by the Scientists are insignificant in comparison with the magnificent realities which are the heritage of the Spirit, not merely in the future life, but here and now, and which alone can give us fullness of life and abiding satisfaction.

EARLIEST OF CHURCH ASSEMBLAGES IN AMERICA

Alfred B. Williams

SWIFT GROWTH OF THE CHURCH.

At the fourteenth regular Convention, New York, beginning October 17, 1832, just ninety-six years ago, the Church may be said to have completed recovery from disasters begun seventy-five years before. It had survived results of follies, neglects and sins of its representatives on both sides of the Atlantic; the period of the most tremendous and tragic social, religious and political upheavals of the world's history; intense hostility and prejudice of one element of the population and three decades of atheism, scepticism, indifference and profligacy from the element to which it naturally looked for support. In the twenty-one years from 1811 its clergy had increased from one hundred and seventy-five to seven hundred and sixty-three, its bishops from two to fourteen, the States in which it was organized from nine to twenty-one. It had organized an active missionary society and theological seminary, and the Virginia Theological Seminary was being organized. At this Convention four bishops were consecrated—Bishops Hopkins, Vermont; Smith, Kentucky; McIlvaine, Ohio; Doane, New Jersey. This notable ceremony was in St. Paul's Church, New York, October 31, the venerable and revered Bishop White, of Pennsylvania, consecrator. New York had gained so much that it was necessary at this Convention to begin the work of dividing it into two dioceses. The time of tribulation was over.

Bishop White officiated at the consecration of the four new bishops on the forty-sixth anniversary of the day he had sailed for England on his doubtful quest for consecration for himself. The Rev. Dr. William E. Wyatt was President and the Rev. Dr. Henry Anthon Secretary of the lower House. The churches in Alabama and the territory of Michigan were admitted to representation and Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana were authorized to combine in one diocese and choose a bishop. A trouble in Kenyon College, at Gambier, Ohio, arising from conflict of authority between the trustees and the bishop, the institution being nominally under Church supervision, was compromised after two days of discussion, at times warm. All rectors were instructed to take at least one collection each year for the General Theological Seminary and the constitution of the General Missionary Society was so changed as to require it to have triennial meetings at the same times and places as the General Conventions. A rubric to regulate the posture of recipients of the Holy Communion was approved. Until this participants in the same service sometimes had taken three different attitudes—kneeling, sitting or standing.

BISHOP WHITE'S LAST CONVENTION.

The General Convention of 1825, St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, August 19-September 1, was the last presided over by Bishop White, who in several respects may be regarded as father of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. He died in July, 1836, aged eighty-eight, while preparing the sermon to be delivered at the consecration of Bishop McCoskry, having been bishop fifty years. He did much toward popularizing the Church, especially by remaining at his post and continuing performance of his duties during the weeks in which Philadelphia was being ravaged by yellow fever.

The officers of the Convention of 1835 were the same as in 1832. The diocese of Illinois was admitted, with Bishop Chase, formerly Bishop of Ohio, in charge of it. The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society was merged with the Convention and put under control of two boards, the domestic department office in New York, that of the other in Philadelphia. The Rev. Dr. Francis L. Hawks was elected Bishop for Louisiana and the territories of Florida and Arkansas, the Rev. Dr. Jackson Kemper for Missouri and Indiana. The houses agreed in a provision that the confession at Morning and Evening Prayer be repeated by the minister and congregation simultaneously.

1838—Philadelphia, September 5-17. The chief event was the consecration of the Rev. Leonidas Polk, native of North Carolina and graduate of West Point, as missionary bishop to Arkansas and Indian Territory. Afterward he was Bishop of Louisiana and he was killed in action as major-general of the Confederate Army in 1864. It is told of him that always he accompanied the order to fire on the enemy with the prayer, "May the Lord have mercy on their souls". His career was the reverse of that of Ellison Capers, of South Carolina, born in 1837, son of a Methodist bishop, who was a brigadier-general in the Confederate Army and afterward clergyman in the Episcopal Church and Bishop of South Carolina and whose son is Bishop-Coadjutor of Western Texas. This General Convention was the first to be mentioned in newspapers of the city in which it was held. The estimate by editors of the time of public interest in religious affairs may be judged by the fact that Poulson's Philadelphia Daily Advertiser, then the most enterprising publication of that city, described the Convention in nine lines, printed two days after the final adjournment and "communicated", saying that the gathering had been creditable and marked by a spirit of fraternity. Missionaries were chosen for Texas, not then in the United States, and Constantinople.

A MOMENTOUS CHANGE

By the Reverend James W. Morris, D. D.

THE Revised Prayer Book will soon be in the hands of our people. Many of the changes made, it must be confessed, are estimable and contribute not only to the enrichment, but also to the flexibility of the services. I feel sure, however, that many evangelical Churchmen, of whom a limited number at least still survive and who continue to rejoice in the blessings that came with the rediscovery of God's revealed Word at the Reformation, will be deeply distressed at the very decided recession from the Protestant and Scriptural position that the Church has persistently held for four hundred years. Ours is a Catholic Church only in so far as it is Protestant and Scriptural. No Church in these times facing subtle idolatry on the one hand and open unbelief on the other, can fail of being firmly Protestant without prejudicing its catholicity. Just as no Church in the days of the great Athanasius could claim orthodox catholicity, without at all costs asserting unyielding Protestantism against the prevailing and triumphant Arianism.

The emphasis of the Revised Prayer Book is distinctly perilous to true Catholicism in the reprehensible weakening of its Protestant witness. It seems a small matter; but it is of capital importance in that it means the surrender of a vital principle.

This is seen among other things, in the revolutionary change made in regard to prayers for the dead, and suffrages for departed Christians. Our learned reformers of the sixteenth century whose knowledge of the Scriptures and of the fathers puts to shame much of the boasted modern scholarship, carefully excluded from the final Book of 1552 the vast quantity of intercessions for dead saints and sinners with which the old mass books and the first book of Edward were loaded. They regarded such prayers as without warrant of Scripture and without support of primitive antiquity. In illustration of their care in this respect, they added to the words, "Let us pray for the whole State of Christ's Church" the significant words, "militant here on earth", so as to preclude the idea of any supplication for the saints who are with Christ in Paradise. Efforts were again made in 1662 to insert suffrages for the dead such as were contained in the first book of Edward. This pressure was resisted after full discussion, and instead expressions of gratitude to God for the virtues and good examples of those who had fallen asleep in Christ were added.

Now the Revised Book frankly adopts the doctrine and practice, repudiated at the Reformation, that the blessed dead need our prayers, and that they depend for help upon our intercessions, as surely if not so fully, as our dear ones on earth. The Scriptural and Protestant position has been abandoned for the medieval and unscriptural one.

It is acknowledged by all students of the Scripture that there is no certain warrant in God's word for such a practice. There are several passages where such teaching would naturally be expected, notably 1 Thess. 4:13-18. Our modern liturgist would surely have put some suffrage for the dead in that place, if he had written it.

The one only passage, constantly cited, is so inadequate and so evidently susceptible of different interpretations, that its citation, though confessedly standing entirely alone, is a sufficient confession of the lack of authority for such a practice. I refer, of course, to the passage in regard to Onesiphorus at 2 Tim. 1:16-18, wherein St. Paul prays for the Lord's mercy on Onesiphorus at that Day. It is inferred that the man was dead at the time, because in the same connection the apostle invokes God's mercy on the family of Onesiphorus. But is such an inference valid? Isn't the only inference this, that Onesiphorus was not with his family when St. Paul wrote the letter? Onesiphorus traveled about evidently, and Bishop Wordsworth thinks it natural to suppose that the man was not then in Ephesus. Indeed, Chrysostom suggests that he might very well have been in Rome itself. Besides, Fabricius mentions a tradition that Onesiphorus was later the Bishop of Corom in Egypt.

Let it be well weighed that in all the written Word, which is our sole certain authority in these mysterious matters, this doubtful Onesiphorus Passage is the one and only one upon which is based this doctrine and practice that is now to be spread widely over our new Book.

True, most of the prayers are optional in use; but not all. The minister will be required in the burial service solemnly to commend the soul to God as well as commit the body to the ground. Furthermore, the prayer that was for the "church militant", will now be for "Christ's Church", including heavenly as well as earthly believers, and also, I should suppose, angels as well as glorified saints. There are other places where the minister is called upon if he be a Protestant to sacrifice a very sacred principle.

The changes are quite modest, they will, of course, be regarded by many as of no consequence. But in them, may be seen the first step to de-Protestantize the Church, the first cat-like, but very sure approach to Purgatory. The way is prepared for the next revision in which full and free prayers for the tortured in Purgatory will come in. Is it said that there will be no more revisions? Let the official statements of Anglo-Catholic leaders, whose party is growing by leaps and bounds in the Church, be remembered. They explicitly declare that no stop will be made in the agitation for change till the entire canon of the mass is authorized.

But what fills one with wonder is that a body of men who obey no law but what conforms to their individual notions of "Catholic custom", and who despite solemn vows, voluntarily assumed, hold themselves free to substitute all sorts of Romish rites for our authorized liturgy, should bother their heads about revising the Prayer Book. Why not let law-abiding evangelicals have the old book in peace? Whatever is decided, they propose to keep on doing as they please, do they not? Or does the ritualistic party wish to force evangelical people to become lawbreakers? So that by being all of us lawbreakers, everybody's lawlessness may be condoned?

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

II KINGS.

This book is the continued history of God's dealings with His people Israel through their kings.

Subject.

The theme of the Spirit's message in 2 Kings is the departure from the Lord of Israel and Judah, and the departure of the glory of His presence from them (Ezek. 10: 14, 19).

I. Chs. 1-13. Manifestation of God's righteousness and grace toward Israel and Judah through the ministry of Elijah and Elisha.

1. Ch. 1 to Ch. 2:11. Elijah commanding fire to come down from heaven, and ascending into heaven in a chariot of fire.

2. Ch. 2:12 to Ch. 13. God's wonderful testimony to Israel through the miracle wrought by the double portion of the spirit of Elijah which rested upon Elisha.

II. Chs. 14-17. Failure to enjoy the blessings of God in the land, resulting in the captivity of Northern Israel.

1. Chs. 14-15. War between Judah and Israel and their deepening idolatry.

2. Chs. 16-17. The Assyrian invasion of the northern kingdom, resulting in Israel's captivity.

III. Chs. 18-25. God's mercy and grace neglected and rejected by Judah from the reign of Hezekiah unto the Babylonian captivity.

1. Chs. 18-20. God's special mercy and grace manifest unto and through Hezekiah toward Judah.

2. Ch. 21. The wicked rule of Manasseh, the wickedest king of Judah, for which cause Judah was carried into captivity.

3. Chs. 22-23. Revival in Judah during the reign of Josiah, because of God's long suffering mercy.

4. Chs. 24-25. Destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of Judah, God's mercy and grace having been rejected.

ROBERT E. LEE

By the Late John W. Daniel, LL. D.

Forgiveness.

LEE had nothing in common with the little minds that know not how to forgive. His was the land that had been invaded; his the people who were cut down, ravaged and ruined; his the home that was torn away and spoiliated; his was the cause that perished. He was the General discrowned of his mighty place, and he the citizen disfranchised. Yet Lee forgave, and counselled all to forgive and forget.

The Greek poet has said:

"The firmest mind will fail
Beneath misfortune's stroke, and stunned, depart
From its sage plan of action."

But the mind of Lee received the rude shock of destiny without a quiver; so the genial currents of his sweet, heroic soul rolled on unruffled, while in their calm, pure depths were reflected the light of heaven.

When a minister once denounced the North, and the indictment of General Lee for treason, the general followed him to the door and said: "Doctor, there is a good old book which I read, and you preach from, which says, 'Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you'. Do you think your remarks this evening were quite in the spirit of that teaching?" And he added: "I have fought against the people of the North because I believed they were seeking to wrest from the South her dearest rights. But I have never cherished toward them bitter or vindictive feelings, and have never seen the day when I did not pray for them."

Soon after the passage of those harsh acts of Congress, disfranchising Confederates for participating in the war, and while every Southern breast was filled with indignation, some friends in General Lee's presence expressed themselves with great bitterness. The General turned to the table near him, where lay the manuscript of his father's life, which he was then editing, and read these lines:

"Learn from yon Orient shell to love thy foe,
And store with pearls the hand that brings thee woe;
Free like yon rock, from base, vindictive pride,
Emblaze with gems the wrist that rends thy side.
Mark where yon tree rewards the stony shower,
With fruit nectarious or the balmy flower;
All Nature cries aloud: shall men do less Than love the smiter, and the railer bless?"

"These lines," said he, "were written in Arabia, and by a Mohammedan, the Poet of Shiraz, the immortal Hafiz; and ought not we who profess to be governed by the principles of Christianity, to rise at least to the standard of this Mohammedan poet, and learn to forgive our enemies?"

In the rush of this age, a character so simply meek and so proudly, grandly strong, is scarce comprehensible to the eager, restless competitors for wealth and place and power. And the "practical man", as he is called, who ever keeps a keen eye to the main chance, and is esteemed happy just in proportion as fortune favors his schemes of ambition or profit, is apt to attribute weakness to one so void of self-seeking and resentment, and so amiable and gentle in his feelings and conduct towards his fellow-men. But could he have seen with what patient attention to detail this ceaseless worker dispatched business and brought great results from small materials—with what quick, strong, comprehensive grasp he solved difficulties and conquered dangers—what good cheer he gave the toiling; what hopes he gave the despondent; what comfort he gave the afflicted. Aye! could he have caught the glance of that eagle eye, and looked on that serene, bold brow which overawed the field of battle, and then beheld the swift, stern, inspiring energy which propelled its forces to deeds which seemed almost impossible to man—there would have been to him a new revelation. He would have beheld a character which, to one unacquainted with it, would seem to have been idealized by the genius of the poet rather than to have existed in the flesh, and to have stepped forth from the sanctuary of romance rather than to have belonged to real history. He would have realized, by contact with this simple gentleman, that the true greatness and true glory of man lies in those elements which are superior to fortune—that he is most practical who is himself above it, and that happiness, if ever on earth happiness be found, has fixed her temple only in the heart that is without guile, and is without reproach of man or woman.

The Last Days of General Lee.

Five years rolled by while here "the self-imposed mission" of Lee was being accomplished, and now, in 1870, he had reached the age of sixty-three. A robust constitution, never abused by injurious habits, would doubtless have prolonged his life beyond the three-score years and ten which the Psalmist has ascribed as the allotted term of man; but many causes were sapping and undermining it. The exposures of two wars in which he had participated, and the tremendous strain on nerves and heart and brain which his vast responsibilities and his accumulated trials had entailed, had been silently and gradually doing their work; and now his step had lost something of its elasticity, the shoulders began to stoop as if under a growing burden, and the ruddy glow of health upon his countenance had passed into a feverish flush. Into his ears, and into his heart, had been poured the afflictions of his people, and while composed and self-contained and uncomplaining, who could have looked upon that great face, over whose majestic lineaments there stole the shade of sadness, without perceiving that grief for those he loved was gnawing at his heart strings? without perceiving in the brilliant eye, which now and then had a far-away, abstracted gaze, that the soul within bore a sorrow "that only Heaven could heal".

What he suffered his lips have never spoken. In the beautiful language of another: "His lips were closed like the gates of some majestic temple, not for concealment, but because that within was holy." Yet, let us take consolation to ourselves that there came to him much to give him joy. Around him were those united by the closest ties of blood and relationship in unremitting fidelity. Not a man of those who ever fought under him—aye, not one—ever proved faithless in respect for him; the great mass of them gave to him every expression in their power of their affection. To the noble mind, sweet is the generous and genuine praise of noble men, and for Lee there was full measure. He lived to see deeply laid the foundation, and firmly built the pedestal, of his great glory, and to catch the murmur of those voices which would rear high his image and bear his name and fame to remote ages, and distant nations. The brave and true of every land paid him tribute. The first soldiers of foreign climes saluted him with eulogy; the scholar decorated his page with dedication to his name, the artist enshrined his form and features in noblest work of brush and chisel, the poet hymned the heroic pathos of his life in tender, lofty strain. Enmity grew into friendship before his noble bearing, and humanity itself attended him with all human sympathy. And over all, "God made soft his dying pillow".

Death.

The particular form of his mortal malady was rheumatism of the heart, originating in the exposure of his campaigns, and aggravated by the circumstances of his many trying situations. He traveled South in the spring of 1870, and in the summer resorted to the Hot Springs of Virginia; and when September came, he was here in better health and spirits, at his accustomed work. On the twenty-eighth of September he conducted, as usual, his correspondence, and performed the incidental tasks of his office, and after dinner he attended a meeting of the Vestry of Grace Episcopal Church, of which body he was a member. A question as to the minister's salary coming before the Board, and there being a deficiency in the amount necessary, General Lee said: "I will give that sum." A sense of weariness came over him before the meeting ended, and at its close he retired with wan, flushed face. Returning home, he found the family circle gathered for tea, and took his place at the board, standing to say grace. The lips failed to voice the blessings prompted by the heart, and without a word he took his seat with an expression of sublime resignation on his face; for well he knew that the Master's call had come, and he was ready to answer.

He was borne to his chamber, and skilled physicians and loving hands did all that man could do. For nearly a fortnight

"Twixt night and morn upon the horizon's verge, Between two worlds life hovered like a star."

And thus on the morning of October 12, the star of the mortal sank into the sunrise of immortality, and Robert Lee passed hence to "where beyond these voices there is peace".

"Tell A. P. Hill to prepare for action," were amongst the last words of Stonewall Jackson. "Tell Hill he must come up," were the last words of Lee. Their brave Lieutenant, who rests under the green turf of Hollywood, seems to have been latest in the minds of his great commanders, while their spirits yet in martial fancy, roamed again the fields of conflict, and ere they passed to where the soldier dreams of battle-fields no more.

The Lessons of His Life.

And did he live in vain, this brave and gentle Lee? And have his works perished with him? I would blush to ask the question save to give the answer.

A leader of armies he closed his career in complete disaster. But the military scientist studies his campaigns, and finds in them designs as bold and brilliant and actions as intense and energetic as ever illustrated the art of war. The gallant captain beholds in his bearing, courage as rare as ever forced a desperate field, or restored a lost one. The private soldier looks up at an image as benignant and commanding as ever thrilled the heart with highest impulse of devotion.

The men who wrested victory from his little band, stood wonder-stricken and abashed when they saw how few were those who dared oppose them, and generous admiration burst into spontaneous tribute to the splendid leader who bore defeat with the quiet resignation of a hero. The men who fought under him never revered or loved him more than on the day he sheathed his sword. Had he but said the word, they would have died for honor. It was because he said the word that they resolved to live for duty.

Plato congratulated himself, first, that he was born a man; second, that he had the happiness of being a Greek; and, third, that he was the contemporary of Sophocles. And in this vast throng today, and here and there the wide world over, is many an one who wore the gray, who rejoices that he was born a man to do a man's part for his suffering country; that he had the glory of being a Confederate; and who feels a just, proud and glowing consciousness in his bosom when he says unto himself: "I was a follower of Robert Lee. I was a soldier of the Army of Northern Virginia."

Did He Wield Patronage and Power?

No, he could not have appointed a friend to the smallest office. He could bestow no emolument upon any of his followers. But an intimation of his wish amongst his own people carried an influence which the command of the autocrat can never possess, and his approval of conduct or character was deemed an honor, and was an honor, which outvied the stars and crosses and titles conferred by kings.

Did He Gain Wealth.

No. He neither sought nor despised it. It thrust itself upon him, but he put it away from him. He refused its companionship because its people could not have its company. He gave what he had to a weak cause, and to those whose necessities were greater than his own. And home itself he sacrificed on the altar of his country. But he refuted the shallow worldling's maxim that "every man has his price", and proved that true manhood has none, however great.

The plunderer of India defended himself by exclaiming that "when he considered his opportunities, he was astonished at his own moderation". Mark Antony appeased the anger of the Roman populace against the fallen tyrant by Caesar's will, wherein he left them his rich and fair possessions—to them and their heirs forever. The Captive of St. Helena, aggrandized with the tears and blood of Europe, drew his own long will, dispensing millions to his favorites. Lee had opportunities as great as any conqueror and took nothing—not even that which others pushed upon him.

But he has left a great, imperishable legacy to us and our heirs forever. The heart of man is his perpetual kingdom. There he reigns transcendent, and we exclaim: "Oh, king, live forever!"

Did He Possess Rank?

Not so. Far from it. He was not even a citizen. The country which gave the right of suffrage to the alien ere he could speak its language, and to the African freedom ere he could read or understand its laws, denied to him the privilege of a ballot. He had asked amnesty. He had been refused. He had not been tried, but he had been convicted. He forgave, but he was unforgiven. He died a paroled prisoner of war, in the calm of peace, five years after war had ended—died the foremost and noblest man in a Republic which proclaims itself "the land of the free and the home of the brave", himself and his Commander-in-Chief constituting the most conspicuous of its political slaves. But as the oak, stripped of the foliage by the winter blast, then, and then only, stands forth in solemn and mighty majesty against the wintry sky, Robert Lee, stripped of every rank that man could give him, towered above the earth and those around him, in the pure sublimity and strength of that character which we can only fitly contemplate when we lift our eyes from earth and see it dimmed against the Heavens!

Did He Save His Country From Conquests?

No. He saw his every foreboding of evil verified. He came to share the miseries of his people. He shared them, drinking every drop of Sorrow's cup. His cause was lost, and the land for which he fought lives not amongst the nations. But the voice of History echoes the poet's song:

"Ah! realm of tombs! but let it bear
This blazon to the last of times;
No nation rose so white and fair,
Or fell so pure from crimes."

And he, its type, lived and died, teaching life's greatest lessons "to suffer and be strong" and that "misfortune nobly borne is good fortune".

There is a rare exotic that blooms but once in a century, and then it fills the light with beauty and the air with fragrance. In each of the two centuries of Virginia's Statehood, there has sprung from the loins of her heroic race, a son whose name and deeds will bloom throughout the ages. Each fought for Liberty and Independence; each against a people of his own race; each against the forms of established power. George Washington won against a kingdom whose seat was three thousand miles away, whose soldiers had to sail in ships across the deep, and he found in the boundless areas of his own land its strongest fortifications. August, beyond the reach of detraction, is the glory of his name. Robert Edward Lee made fiercer and bloodier fight against greater odds, and at greater sacrifice, and lost—against the greatest nation of modern history, armed with steam and electricity, and all the appliances of modern science; a nation which mustered its hosts at the very threshold of his door. But his life teaches the grandest lesson how manhood can rise transcendent over Adversity, and is in itself alone, under God, pre-eminent—the grander lesson, because as sorrow and misfortune are sooner or later the common lot—even that of him who is today the conqueror—he who bears them best is made of sterner stuff, and is the most useful and universal, as he is the greatest and noblest exemplar.

And now he has vanished from us forever. And is this all that is left of him—this handful of dust beneath the marble stone? No, the Ages answer as they rise from the gulfs of Time, where lay the wrecks of kingdoms and estates, holding up their hands as their only trophies, the names of those who have wrought for man in the love and fear of God and in love unfearing for their fellow-men.

No! the present answers, bending by his tomb.

No! the future answers, as the breath of the morning fans its radiant brow, and its soul drinks in sweet inspirations from the lovely life of Lee.

No, methinks the very heavens echo, as melt into their depths the words of reverent love that voice the hearts of men to the tingling stars.

Conclusion.

Come we then today in loyal love to sanctify our memories, to purify our hopes, to make strong all good intent by communion with the spirit of him, who, being dead, yet speaketh. Come, child, in thy spotless innocence; come, woman, in thy purity; come, youth, in thy prime; come, manhood, in thy strength; come, age, in thy ripe wisdom; come, citizen; come, soldier, let us strew the roses and lilies of June around his tomb, for he, like them, exhaled in his life Nature's beneficence, and the grave has consecrated that life, and given it to us all; let us crown his tomb with the oak, the embelm of his strength, and with the laurel, the emblem of his glory, and let these guns, whose voices he knew of old, awake the echoes of the mountains that Nature herself may join in his solemn requiem.

Come, for here he rests, and—

"On this green bank, by this fair stream,
We set today a native stone,
That memory may his deeds redeem,
When, like our sires, our sons are gone."

Come, for her the genius of loftiest poesy in the artist's dream, and through the sculptor's touch, has restored his form and features—a Valentine has lifted the marble veil and disclosed him to us as we would love to look upon him—lying, the flower of knighthood, in "Joyous Garb". His sword beside him is sheathed forever. But honor's seal is on his brow, and valor's star is on his breast, and the peace that passeth all understanding descends upon him. Here, not in the hour of his grandest triumph of earth, as when mid the battle roar, shouting battalions followed his trenchant sword, and bleeding veterans forgot their wounds to leap between him and his enemies—but here in victory, supreme over earth itself, and over death, its conqueror, he rests, his warfare done.

And as we seem to gaze once more on him we loved and hailed as chief, in his sweet, dreamless sleep, the tranquil face is clothed with heaven's light, and the mute lips seem eloquent with the message that in life he spoke:

> "There is a true glory and a true honor; the glory of duty done, the honor of the integrity of principle."

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted By Rev. Frank Cox

249 West Forty-third Street, New York, N. Y.

A WELL-KNOWN New York columnist, erstwhile Episcopalian, and even now not so far from many of our less spiritual church folk in his views, has given us the benefit of his religious opinions in a recent article. Needless to say they are not particularly new, or original, or deep, but widespread—constituting the reaction of the ordinary pagan (in church or out) toward religion.

Our friend cannot feel that he is any the worse now that he has grown slightly more lax in his religious views, but rather the better, and takes issue with the opinion that if religion were outlawed the world would sink into moral chaos. We are not going to argue that question, but note the misunderstanding, shared by some religious people, that only the immoral are irreligious. We could have plenty of morality of a sort and still be absolutely blind about God. We prove our point from the columnist's own words. He says, "Basically every system of ethics depends upon enlightened self interest". That statement would be echoed, in practice if not in theory, by many who call themselves Christians, but it condemns the one who holds it.

The man who makes a statement like that may be worse than a thief or a harlot. The thief or harlot may still believe in something better, but the one who announces that all ethics is based on self has capitulated to its sway. He is not only personally selfish, but has made selfishness his creed. A man like that condemns the memory of his own mother. He suggests skeptically that it was enlightened self-interest that led her to give herself for his welfare; he puts Christ Himself in that category and makes the Cross a revelation of self-seeking.

True our friend does not carry his creed out logically. He admits a certain fervor in those who willingly lay down their lives for their fellows, but does not profess to understand it. We would think he would wish to, for their deeds are a refutation of his shallow teaching. He calls for a new definition of sin, but his new definition is old, as the New Testament, and sin is just that seeking of self in place of God that he glorifies as the foundation stone of ethics and that many nominal Christians practice.

Many nominal Christians become peeved when they are told that they must be born again or be converted. They suppose that only the openly immoral need such doctrine. Even some good Christians take that attitude, like the one who wrote to our columnist and so laid himself open to his shallow reply. The servant of self needs conversion. The glorification of self was the old pagan creed and of the new pagan, too. I was speaking with one woman who is one of the leaders of women's work in her diocese and she admitted that at heart she was a pagan. She needed to be converted, and that conversion comes only through the Cross the direct answer to all pagan creeds based on enlightened self-interest. All true Christians hold to the uniqueness of the Cross, because upon that point self-interest and self-sacrifice part company. It is the light that reveals and the power that changes one to the other.

One of our own Church columnists agrees with the pagan strange to say. An English Bishop had preached a sermon calling for the conversion of the Jews. A Rabbi took exception, saying that there was no more reason for that than that Jews should convert Christians, but that both should work together for a better world. Our columnist agreed with the Jew. So the unregenerate Jew and the professed Christian clergyman stand together in rejecting the Cross.

Is there any wonder that some of our leading laymen and women can admit themselves to be pagans when their clergy know nothing of the Cross and of its practical effect, the New Birth, that alone distinguishes between the changes a pagan (baptized or not) into a real Christian. We need not only a new definition but also a new conviction of sin, and then a real consecration to Christ that shall bring victory over sin—beginning at the Church in its pagan members and from them extendng to the self-satisfied pagans without content with their own litfle standards of morality based on enlightened self-interest. Most people forget that the New Birth was proclaimed first to a nice self-satisfied church member of irreproachable morality.

The China Famine Situation

The story of the terrible famine in China increases in definiteness and volume as the weeks pass. Recent letters and telegrams from Peking, Tientsin and Shanghai and also from Hon. C. T. Wang and Hon. Sun Fo of the National Government at Nanking bring the following facts:

A two-day conference in Tientsin (November 15-16) of representatives from eleven provinces came to the conclusion that at a minimum 12,000,000 destitute men, women and children were at that time facing starvation and that the number would be increased to 20,000,000 by spring.

The amount needed for famine relief at the very lowest before next summer would be $20,000,000. Of this sum, the China International Famine Relief Commission is asking the National Government and Chinese individuals to provide $8,000,000 and appeals to generous minded people in Europe and American for $12,000,000.

Since that date telegrams show that famine conditions are even worse in certain areas than had been estimated. General Feng Yu-hsiang has wired that not less than $20,000,000 will be needed in Shensi and Kansu alone.

The latest cable is from Peking of December 22. It reports results of a conference of the International China Famine Relief Commission with the National Government leaders, Chiang Kai-shek, Feng Yu-hsiang, C. T. Wang and others. They pledge fullest cooperation with famine relief measures with security for workers and funds. The Government is doing all it can, but the destitution is so vast that private help is imperatively needed to prevent great loss of life.

In a word, the suffering is practically beyond imagination and the call for generous American response exceedingly urgent. Large sums should be going out to the relief agencies every week from now on until summer.

Contributions may be sent direct to China Famine Relief, Bartholomew Building, 205-217 East Forty-Second Street, New York City, or The Southern Churchman will be glad to forward any contributions sent to its office.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart"—Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by the Rev. Giles B. Cooke, of Mathews County, Va.:

> "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths. Be not wise in thine own eyes; fear the Lord, and depart from evil."—Prov. 3:5-7.

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

CREEPING INTO OUR INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. Editor:

Do not trouble to answer this letter. You have many of them to answer.

I enclose a statement made by Bishop McConnell. Isn't it amazing? And so we, who believe in Jesus Christ as God, and Lord, and Saviour, are the heathen! And the Christian is the man who takes Jesus simply for His character and for the ideal that He is!

I have ordered some extra copies of The Southern Churchman, containing your article on Smith College. It is great. Not only Unitarianism, but Atheism and Communism are being taught thousands of young men and young women in some of our educational institutions. You are evidently aware of this.

This thing is creeping into some of our Southern institutions, as it is in some of our Southern pulpits. What amazes me is the utter blindness of so many good Church people.

"Christian".

Enclosure: Francis G. McConnell is a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North. He is also the newly elected President of the Federal Council of Churches.

In his book, "The Christlike God", published by the Methodist Book Concern, Bishop McConnell says on page 15:

"Is not the tendency to deify Jesus more heathen than Christian? Are we not more truly Christian when we cut loose from a heathen propensity and take Jesus simply for the character that He was and for the ideal that He is?"

PRAYERS FOR AND OF THE DEPARTED.

Mr. Editor:

I am interested in the article under the caption "Prayers for the Departed", and would beg leave to ask if St. Paul's wish as expressed on behalf of Onesiphorus, 2 Tim. 1:16-18, does not constitute a prayer for one (no longer living on the earth) that he might find favor with God in the day of Judgment.

The case of Dives, does not, to my way of reading that passage, suggest prayers for the departed, but rather points to prayers of the departed for those still living on the earth.

It is the frequent meditation upon all that may be involved in this Dives account which leads me to believe that the whole point is not so much that the departed need or are benefited by our prayers, but rather our own need of the prayers of the departed who are in the nearer presence of God.

While I personally may not pray for the departed, yet do I daily plead to God for the prayers of my beloved departed and feel I am not only helped tremendously by their prayers, but that to pray for me among others, is part of their service in that phase of life to which they have gone.

THE BIBLE TRUTH AND EVOLUTION.

Mr. Editor:

I believe that the right and ultimate basis of religious faith and religious teaching is and ought to be the TRUTH as it comes to us from God, and that we ought to be loyally ready to receive and live by the truth by whatever means it may come to us.

I believe and teach that the most important single source of truth is the Bible, and that in it we read the word of God and are made wise unto salvation.

I also believe that life and the universe are full of contacts with God, and that we are meant to live and learn by them also. I believe that His Spirit speaks in our hearts; that His Providence is shown in our lives and in the history of humanity; and that His creative and directing power are shown in the material composition and order of the world and of the universe—that the Heavens do declare the glory of God and the firmament shows His handiwork.

My key to the study and interpretation of the Bible is a pregnant phrase of that great, wise and devout leader, Dr. Wm. R. Huntington—that one which he embodied in the proposed preamble to the Constitution of the Church which was considered at the Richmond General Convention of 1907. That phrase defines the Bible, in part, as "The record of God's revelation of Himself in His Son".

That point of view—for me—sets everything right and clears away most of the difficulties. I am not troubled by the so-called moral difficulties of the Old Testament, such as the slaughter of the Canaanites and the damnatory Psalms, for I say that those things were done by men who lived in times when God's revelation of Himself was incomplete—who knew His justice and righteousness, but had not learned the scope of His loving kindness.

Believing that Christ is Lord of all, I believe that His ministers should take cognizance of other domains of truth, and should be willing to modify dogmatic doctrinal statements of religion to conform to new revelations of truth, in order that religion may hold its rightful position of leadership in the field of "all truth", that it may hold the allegiance of sincere truth lovers, that it may be able to purify and guide modern life, and that it may keep in living contact with the life of God, and that it may loyally and faithfully follow the guiding Spirit of Truth.

There is, of course, a right and a wrong way to do this. It does not mean being blown about with every wind of doctrine; it does not mean the absorption of our religious lives in a constant effort to hear or to tell some new thing; but following the leading of a living and active Spirit can not mean sitting still. I believe that practically it ought to mean an intelligent acquaintance with the progress of truth, and a conservative but willing acceptance of scientific doctrines which have attained general acceptance and which seem to fill a real place in the cosmic scheme.

For that reason—and it is, perhaps, here that you would most strongly differ with me—I accept Evolution as the method of creation. By this I mean that it seems to me the most probable explanation of how God worked; but I do not think of evolution as in any way a contradiction of the fundamental and eternal truth that "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth".

I believe absolutely that the Bible contains the word of God. I believe as absolutely that the Book of Nature contains the word of God. I am perfectly sure that when we rightly interpret the word of God in the Bible and the word of God in the Book of Nature that each will be in perfect accord with the other. The records of the Book of Nature are written in the stars, in the rocks, in the mechanical and chemical nature and behavior of matter, and in plant and animal life; and they are written with God's own hand. The truth is there if we are able to read it, and ultimately it is spiritual truth.

I do not think that there is any vital conflict between the doctrine of Evolution in its broad outlines and the first chapter of Genesis. The general order of creation is practically the same in both. . . . . Of course, I think of the days of creation as geological epochs—long periods of time, but it is quite Scriptural so to interpret "Day".

It is a tragic mistake to say that Christians who accept evolution are infidels who deny the teachings of the Bible and have betrayed the faith and led men astray. They may be humble and sincere students of both the Books which have come to us from God and which contain His word. It is a grand and inspiring conception, perfectly loyal to the Divine teaching, both of Holy Scriptures and the Book of Nature to think of the Spirit of God as brooding over the face of primeval chaos, warming it into life, animating and guiding its development, lifting it up always, unhasting and unresting, to higher things; and the possession of that faith and a study of the history of creation from that point of view leads to an abiding and confident trust that, as God's will has been done, God's will shall be done, and that the process will go on under the guidance of God's Spirit and with irresistible Divine power until His plan finds its consummation in having made ready a people prepared for the Lord.

SMITH ALUMNA.

Mr. Editor:

I was very much interested in your article on Smith College in the issue of January 12. I am a graduate of Smith, class of 1910, and I love my college and what it then stood for very dearly; but I love my country and my God more, and I feel it is only such pitiless publicity as you have given her that will force the board of trustees and alumna association to drive out the evil spirits with which she is now possessed. As a group the graduates of the college are infatuated by President Neilson. I do not know why, though I have met him and heard him speak. I know one exquisite little Frenchman who hates the college on a number of counts. One was for the extremely unpatriotic address made there Armistice Day. When I asked her about the psychology she passionately burst out, "Oh, no, no! I shall never take pschology. When the girls start to discuss it I turn pink all over and leave the room." And she has been brought up in a physician's family where I am sure the conversation was not guided by the shade of Jane Austen.

I am enclosing a copy of a correspondence I had with Smith College in answer to the letter Miss Chapman sent to you. I feel it was most enlightening.

I agree with all you say about the dangers of the college, but I do not understand your allusion, at the top of the second column to "torturers and murderers of children".

Very sincerely,

Alumna of Smith College,

Believer in Christian civilization, but not a believer in Russian Bolshevist immorality as exposed at Smith College.

THE FACE OF CHRIST: By John MacBeath, M. A. Marshall Brothers, Ltd., London. Edinburgh.

The very title of this book is interesting, and the summary of the chapters is productive of stirring thoughts for the follower of the Master. Each chapter is built around a passage of Scripture centering on the thought of the face of Christ as studied in its various aspects, such as—The Revealing Face, The Attractive Face—through The Dishonored Face and The Submissive Face, until we reach The Glorified Face. It is a subject that in addition to the author's treatment should yield rich fields for meditation.

DIOCESAN COUNCILS

DIOCESE OF TEXAS.

The Eightieth Annual Council of the Diocese of Texas was held at St. Paul's Church, Waco, Texas, January 13-15, inclusive. In connection with the Council, the annual meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary, Daughters of the King, Church Service League, Students' Council and Young People's Service League also took place.

The special Council preacher this year was the Rev. Charles T. Warner, D. D., rector of St. Alban's Church, Washington, D. C. Other outside speakers were Dr. L. W. Glazebrook, the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn and the Very Rev. R. S. Chalmers, D. D., Dallas.

The budget of the diocese was adopted with the provision that if full assurance by the various parishes was not given by April 1, the Executive Board is empowered to cut expenditures accordingly.

The Council marked the tenth anniversary of Bishop Quin's consecration and was the first Council over which he presided as Bishop of Texas.

A memorial communion service was held January 15 in memory of the late Bishop Kinsolving, who for so many years presided over the diocese.

The reports of the dicerent departments of the Executive Board of the diocese all showed great progress during the past year and the general impression was that the Diocese of Texas is keeping up, both spiritually and materially, with the great progress of the State of Texas.

The results of the various elections are as follows:

Secretary, the Rev. DuBose Murphy; registrar, the Rev. G. L. Crockett; treasurer, W. S. Farish; standing committee, Clergyman, the Rev. C. W. Sprouse; clergyman, the Rev. Peter Gray Sears; clergyman, the Rev. W. N. Claybrook; lay, Dr. W. J. Battle; lay, Hon. M. H. Royston.

Board of Examining Chaplains: Clergyman, the Rev. Edmund Gibson; clergyman, the Rev. Charles W. Sheerin; clergyman, the Rev. C. W. Sprouse.

Deans of Convocation: Northeast, the Rev. S. M. Bird; northwest, the Rev. F. H. Stedman; southeast, the Rev. W. M. Brown; southwest, the Rev. Hugh Murray.

Trustees of Church Corporation: Clergyman, the Rev. C. W. Sprouse; lay, K. E. Womack; lay, E. L. Neville; lay, J. D. Farish; lay, R. W. Franklin.

Executive Board: Clergyman, the Rev. E. H. Gibson; clergyman, Rev. C. W. Sheerin; lay, Harry Hilliard; lay, T. K. Lawrence; lay, Will Morgan; lay, J. L. C. McFaddin.

Board of Regents of Grace Hall: Clergyman, the Rev. DuBose Murphy; clergyman, the Rev. Beverly M. Boyd; clergyman, the Rev. Harris Masterson; lay, F. W. Catterall; lay, R. B. Walthall; Mrs. E. A. Peden, Mrs. E. A. Temple, Mrs. J. K. McClendon.

Board of Regents of Autry House: The Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, D. D., chairman ex-officio; the Rev. Claude W. Sprouse, the Rev. Peter Gray Sears, Mrs. E. L. Neville, Mrs. J. C. Tolman, Prof. R. A. Tsanoff, K. E. Womack, W. H. Kirkland, H. C. Weiss, J. W. Evans.

Deputies to the Synod: Clergyman, the Rev. B. M. Boyd; clergyman, the Rev. C. A. Summers; clergyman, the Rev. F. P. Goddard; clergyman, the Rev. Lyle Barnett; lay, E. R. Bolton; lay, Richard Corner; lay, A. W. Hart; lay, Jackson Kemp; chancellor, S. S. McClendon; vice chancellor, W. G. B. Morrison.

DIOCESE OF ALABAMA.

The Ninety-Eighth Annual Council of the Diocese of Alabama was held January 23-24, in St. Paul's Church, Selma, Ala. On the afternoon of the preceding day there was a conference on lay evangelism, composed of Council delegates and a number of laymen from neighboring towns, especially invited for that purpose. The conference was conducted by Mr. Leon C. Palmer, formerly executive secretary of the National Commission on Evangelism. Its purpose was to train laymen and women as leaders for the morning conferences on Evangelism in the parochial crusades, for which Mr. Palmer's book, The Ministry of Laymen, is to be used as a basis. The same evening Mr. Palmer addressed a large congregation on the same subject.

The Council was opened with the celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop of the diocese, the Rt. Rev. Wm. G. McDowell, D. D., assisted by the Rev. Messrs. T. R. Bridges, D. D., G. W. Ribble, D. D., Cary Gamble and E. W. Gamble, rector of the parish. The last two are twin brothers, and, as is said of a certain other pair of twins, "they look alike", to the great confusion of their friends.

The Bishop, in his address, dealt largely with matters of diocesan policy, and urged that the Episcopal Endowment Fund be increased three-fold as soon as possible, as the interests of the diocese require additional episcopal supervision. He spoke in loving terms of Bishop Beckwith, who has been called to the Church Triumphant since the last Council. He referred to the large number of confirmations during the year, due in part to the influence of the Crusade on Evangelism.

The Council was reminded that practically every church and mission in the diocese was supplied with regular ministrations, and that several candidates for the ministry would soon be ready for ordination. Three churches had been consecrated during the past year, and several building projects begun.

A memorial service to Bishop Beckwith was held. The Council respectfully stood while Bishop McDowell sketched the life and character of this stalwart servant of God, whose last message to his people was, "Tell the Diocese of Alabama, I still carry on". Resolutions of respect and affection were read by representatives of all diocesan organizations. Mrs. Beckwith was present at this service.

Arrangements were furthered for a vigorous Crusade on Evangelism, to reach even the smallest missions. Every clergyman in the diocese is to be enlisted, and several from without.

The work of the women was presented by Mrs. Albert F. Wilson, President of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary; Miss Ruth Betner, representing the Wilmer Training School for Deaconesses, and Miss Helen Beggs, representing the Young People's Service League.

All diocesan officers were reelected with the exception of the Standing Committee, which is composed of the following: the Rev. Charles Clingman, D. D., Birmingham; the Rev. P. N. McDonald, Montgomery; the Rev. R. A. Kirchhoffer, Mobile; Mr. Algernon Blair, Mr. R. J. Williams and Dr. W. B. Hall.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod were elected as follows: Clerical—the Rev. G. C. Tucker, Mobile; the Rev. V. C. McMaster, Birmingham; the Rev. P. N. McDonald, Montgomery; the Rev. J. M. Stoney, Anniston; the Ven. V. G. Lowery, Ensley, and the Rev. J. W. Heyes, Eufaula. Lay—Messrs. Algernon Blair, W. T. Archer, Frank Feltus, W. S. Adams, Herbert Tutwiler and S. J. B. Whitlock.

At the evening session the choir rendered a musical program of wonderful beauty and scope. This was followed by addresses by the Rev. Charles Clingman, D. D., and the Rev. Richard M. Trelease, field secretary of the National Council, who brought to the Council a vivid presentation of the work and needs of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Japan.

Church Intelligence

Dean Robbins' Resignation Accepted.

At the meeting of the Trustees of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine Tuesday afternoon, January 22, which, on account of the Bishop's illness, was held in the Bishop's House, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the following minute and resolution be adopted and entered upon the minutes:

The Bishop and Trustees have considered with great care the letter received from the Very Rev. Howard C. Robbins, D. D., Dean of the Cathedral, dated December 26, 1928, in which the Dean states that more than a year ago he reached the conclusion that he ought to devote himself to preaching and literary work in the field of religion, and tenders his resignation to take effect as soon as may be convenient, and asks for an immediate leave of absence.

The Bishop and Trustees contemplate with the deepest regret the severance of that relationship between themselves and the Dean which has existed so happily for eleven years, almost eight of these during the administration of the present Diocesan, and they unanimously place on record their high appreciation of the service which the Dean has rendered to the Cathedral during these years by his preaching and his spiritual gifts and in other ways.

In view, however, of the fact that the Dean wishes, as stated in his letter, to devote himself to preaching and literary work, the Bishop and Trustees feel that the only course open to them is to accept the resignation offered by the Dean, which they hereby do, to take effect March 31, 1929, and they grant the Dean the leave of absence for which he asks.

In accepting most regretfully the Dean's resignation, the Bishop and Trustees wish the Dean every happiness in the special field of labor to which he has decided to devote himself and they express their earnest and united hope that the Dean may continue his relationship with the Cathedral as one of its stated special preachers."

Welcome to Colonel Zouboff.

The great Parish House of St. Augustine's Chapel, Trinity Parish, New York, is doing a great work for the Russians. Houston House, as it is called, is run as a community center by the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society under the direction of Mr. Raymond E. Cole. One of his main activities is the Russian Department. The Russian Cathedral next door is now a part of St. Augustine's Chapel, transformed into a beautiful Russian Church through the munificence of Trinity Parish. Here thousands of Russians on the East Side worship under Metropolitan Platon and his staff. In Houston House, the Russian Department, which includes all sorts of social activities, is under the direction of Colonel Zouboff. Houston News, the publication of Houston House, contains the following account of the welcome of Colonel Zouboff:

"Prince Serge Gargarin, Chairman of our Houston House Russian Committee has the following to say about Mr. Zouboff, recently appointed Director of our department of Russian activities:

" 'Colonel Peter Zouboff is a descendant of one of the oldest and best families in Russia. After graduation from college in law, Colonel Zouboff joined the Chevalier-Guard Regiment of the Russian Army. With that regiment he fought all through the war with Germany. In 1918-1919 he took part in the civil war, being in command of a large detachment of the army of General Yudenich, which was advancing on Petrograd. For the last several years he lived in Esthonia, where he and his friends undertook to save the Russian Church from persecution. He has done a marvelous piece of work, succeeding in getting all Russian churches united and protected. He came to this country primarily with the purpose of assisting in the present struggle of our Church here.

" 'Houston House could have hardly found a better man for its Russian activities, which you so wisely put in close cooperation with our Cathedral, of which Colonel Zouboff is also the Treasurer.'

"Our Russian Membership Welcomes Mr. Zouboff: Houston House, and especially our Russian organizations, welcomes Mr. Peter Zouboff as Director of Russian activities. He is well fitted to do this work, because of his enthusiasm, experience and connections. In addition to his work at Houston House, he is Treasurer of the Russian Cathedral and member of the Russian Orthodox Church Protective Committee. We all give him the hand of fellowship and wish him great success in his endeavors.

"All Russian organizations who wish to use the facilities of Houston House should make their arrangements through Mr. Zouboff."

The Seabury Society.

Eugene M. Camp.

The Rev. Morgan Cilley, advanced to the priesthood in St. Stephen's Church, Romney, W. Va., on December 16, is one of one hundred and eighty-seven men who formed a voluntary force of Christian workers in New York City since 1904. Mr. Cilley belonged in a group numbering eighty-three, and he is the eighteenth out of the group to enter the Christian ministry. He is middle aged, an engineer by profession, and in New York served for years as Lay Reader, later going to Virginia Seminary. As deacon he has been serving two churches in the West Virginia Diocese.

The work in question began in small ways in 1904 and was fostered by Bishop Greer, later by Bishop Burch and in Church extension efforts did, as a Seabury Society, its work under the Rev. Dr. George F. Nelson, during his ten years as Archdeacon of New York. Churches founded by these volunteers include St. Margaret's, the Advocate, St. Simeon's, Holy Nativity, St. Martha's, Good Shepherd, Emmanuel in the Bronx, but efforts extended to Brooklyn and Westchester County, and New York men, removing to other cities, kept up the work, so that the number of churches growing directly from Seabury Men's efforts is nineteen. Most of them are now strong parishes.

With the one hundred and four others were a few women and some of them came from the Middle West, the South and New England, to study religious bodies, their histories, organizations, programs and who's who, that they might return to their home cities and serve on the staffs of great daily newspapers. Many of them are now so serving in many cities as far West as Missouri and South as Louisiana, and one is serving in California, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago, and principal dailies in all large cities have been served.

At the beginning of the century press associations and daily newspapers gave small space to churches, and often used that space badly. Men urging them to progress were scoffed at. Few papers provided trained reporters to report General Conventions and General Assemblies and fewer still reported sermons on Mondays preached in their cities the day before. All is now changed, chiefly because newspapers recognized the importance of changing, and with some help by New York promoters of the change. These promoters were always maintained by the newspapers, never by the churches.

As is well known, one of the efforts of the New York Seabury men was the founding at Richfild Springs of the Church Workers' Conference, later taking it to Cambridge, where, in 1900, a regular committee was formed to take charge and for years it has successfully met at Wellesley College. It is believed that it was the first such Summer Conference in the Church. The work with which the Rev. Mr. Cilley was most closely identified was done under the name of Applied Christianity, and the aim now is to obtain the counsel of leaders among ministers and laymen of all religious bodies, and in all parts of America, on precisely how men and women of church pews, and others who ought to be in such pews, but are not, may apply their religion—work that begins where sermons end. During the past year Mr. Eugene M. Camp, identified with the company of one hundred and eighty-seven New York men, personally conferred with Christian leaders in England, Germany, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, Italy and France, on methods that may result in greater numbers of men and women responding to appeals for service, when made by preachers.

Churchman Holds Overeating Beats Liquor as Home-Breaker.

(Special to The New York Times.)

Atlantic City, N. J., Jan. 26.—Overindulgence in eating is breaking up more homes in America than overindulgence in liquor, Archdeacon Joseph H. Dodshon, of New York, who is spending a week here, declared today.

"Intemperance in eating is not controlled by law. Yet it causes much domestic unhappiness," he said. "Overeating causes men and women to have poor disposition and ultimately results in bad health and various diseases."

The Archdeacon was emphatic in speaking of the ill effects of prohibition. "I admit that in the beginning I was in favor of the law," he declared, "but now I can see the ill effects."

Another Gift to Trinity College.

In a letter to The Southern Churchman, published December 22, 1928, Judge Buffington, of Philadelphia, tells about the triple Tudor window from a part of Whitehall Palace, built by Cardinal Wolsey, which had been given to Trinity College, and which will be placed in the new chapel, which the architects of the Cathedral at Washington are designing.

Recently writing of another interesting gift, he says that "since that time the authorities at St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, the second oldest college in England, have presented two stones to Trinity College, which will also be placed in the Chapel. The first is a Caen stone from Normandy, taken from St. Ethelbert's Tower of the Abbey Church, built about 1080. The other is a piece of Roman tile from the Chapel of St. Pancras at Canterbury. This chapel is said to have been a pagan temple and to have been made into a Christian Church in 598. It is thought that the building was Roman and that it was an ancient British Church before it became a Saxon temple. This Roman tile runs back through 1700 years of Church use".

YOU DID IT. WHAT?

Collected and paid practically all of that $805,782, which we reported as due on December 1, on what you had told us to expect.

When our books closed for the year we had received since December 1, $782,944, or all but $22,838 of what was due. Substantial over-payments by thirteen dioceses and districts helped a lot.

This percentage of collections, namely, 99.2 per cent compares with 98.5 per cent in each of the two preceding years.

Out of the ninety-seven dioceses and districts to which quotas were allotted, seventy-two have paid what they told us to expect and two more have promised to make up their deficit. This is a slight recession from 1927, when the number was seventy-nine, but we may reach that figure later. Every diocese in the third province paid what it told us to expect and the first province will have a similar record when Vermont makes a promised remittance.

Due to this splendid support we will close our books for 1928 with a balance on the right side.

Sincere thanks from the National Council to all of you in dioceses and parishes who have worked so hard to achieve this happy result.

Faithfully yours,
LEWIS B. FRANKLIN,
Treasurer, National Council.

Consecration Service.

The Presiding Bishop has taken Order for the Ordination and Consecration of the Reverend John Insley Blair Larned, Suffragan Bishop-elect of the Diocese of Long Island, on February 11, 1929, at 10:30 A. M., Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, New York.

The Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., Bishop of Maryland, Presiding Bishop, will be the consecrator. Co-Consecrators are the Rt. Rev. Junius Walter Atwood, D. D., and the Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop of Michigan. Mr. Larned will be presented by the Rt. Rev. Warren Lincoln Rogers, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Ohio, and the Rt. Rev. Frank William Sterrett, D. D., Bishop of Bethlehem.

The Rt. Rev. Ernest Wilmore Stires, D. D., Bishop of Long Island, will be the preacher. Others in the chancel will be the Rev. A. Arthur Dodd, D. D., Hoyde Park, Mass., and the Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Very Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, Garden City, N. Y., will be master of ceremonies, and the registrar will be the Rev. Charles L. Pardee, D. D., New York City.

Miss Maryland B. Nichols.

With deep regret the Department of Missions has received a message from Bishop Campbell telling of the death of a member of the staff in Liberia, Miss Maryland B. Nichols, a teacher at the House of Bethany, Capt Mount. The cable, received January 29, said that her death occurred at Grand Bassa, on January 24, from blackwater fever.

Miss Nichols sailed for Liberia on December 5, 1925. She had not since returned to this country, though her mother spent three months holiday with her in England. Her parents are Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Nichols, of Bloomfield, New Jersey. She had studied at Columbia, the New York School of Social Work, and the Philadelphia Deaconess School. At the time of her appointment she was a member of St. Luke's Church, Rossville, Staten Island.

Burial Pit at Abraham's Home Yields Treasures.

Philadelphia, Jan. 22 (A. P.).—A mammoth death pit, in which the bodies of forty-five victims, sacrificed in accordance with ancient Sumerian burial rites, were found amid an amazing wealth of gold, silver and semi-precious stones, has been discovered in Ur of the Chaldees, home of Abraham, by the joint archaeological expedition of the University of Pennsylvania Museum and the British Museum.

The death pit is larger than any found heretofore in the 5,000-year-old cemetery at Ur, and although it has been only partly cleared it already has yielded thirty-four gold head-dresses, inlaid pendants, wreaths and hair ribbons, many silver "combs" and other ornaments, according to a report from J. Leonard Woolley, director of the expedition.

Three harps of unusual design and a pair of statues of rams, made of gold, silver, white shell and lapis lazuli also were found. These statues were described as "two of the most remarkable objects of antiquity that Sumeria has yet produced". Mr. Woolley declared the pit should be the introduction to an actual tomb and that the workers were now digging down from the modern surface.—New York Times.

Cable From Shanghai.

That China is in great need of assistance from her American friends is an indisputable fact. Following cable received from Shanghai:

"January 21, 1929.

To Association for the Welfare of the Children of China, Inc., 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City:

Authoritatively estimated twenty million in Kansu, Honan, Shensi, starving and freezing this winter.

Chekiang flood damaging fourteen districts. Shantung famine remains serious. Government appropriate two million more to raise through surtax.

Leading Shanghai shops giving five per cent daily gross income. Seven thousand Honan refugees arrived Nanking. More coming for food. Association started Nanking Branch to participate in extensive children relief.

Cooperation of other Philanthropic bodies encouraging. Funds all allocated for children relief in various famine regions.

National Child Welifare Association of China."

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop

New Rector Installed at Christ Church, Roanoke.

On Sunday morning, January 13, the Rev. William Taylor Willis was formally installed as rector of Christ Church, Roanoke; the services of institution being conducted by the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of the diocese.

The Psalter was read by the Rev. G. Otis Mead, former rector of Christ Church, who is now taking a much-needed rest at Altavista, Va.

The Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey, of St. John's, Wytheville, read the Lessons. Following the institution by the Bishop, the keys were handed to the new rector by Mr. C. Edwin Michael, Senior Warden of Christ Church.

The Rev. Carleton Barnwell, rector of St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, preached the sermon.

The Rev. Mr. Willis, in a brief address, spoke of his plans for the future of Christ Church and of the splendid spirit of loyalty which he has already found to exist in his new congregation. This he ascribed to the wise administration of his predecessor and the affection of the people for Mr. Mead, and pledged his own best efforts to the work of shepherding this flock and in making for himself a place of usefulness as the rector of Christ Church and a citizen of Roanoke.

While it was not possible to have the service of institution until this time, Mr. Willis actually began his work in Christ Church November 1, 1928, coming from Chicago, where he was assistant at St. Chrysostom's Church. On Saturday, January 5, Mrs. Willis, with their small son, joined her husband in Roanoke, after a visit of some months with her own family in Corinth, Miss.

The Rev. Messrs. Barnwell and Gwathmey, who took part in this service, were classmates of Mr. Willis at Virginia Seminary.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Justice For Negroes Urged.

Richmond papers have given editorial space as well as front-page headlines to the sermon preached by the Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, on January 27, the Sunday nearest St. Paul's Day, celebrated as the birthday of the parish.

Dr. Tucker sought to arouse his congregation to some high ideal, and he specifically selected the situation created by the introduction of a segregation ordinance before City Council.

His text was from St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, the third chapter, twenty-eighth verse: "There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male nor female; for you are all one man in Christ Jesus."

After tracing the history of the Church as a history of progress toward this ideal of unity and brotherhood, Dr. Tucker said that, in spite of the unprecedented spirit of brotherhood abroad in the land, yet there are many barriers to be broken down before the ideal is reached, that he spoke in particular of the racial and social barrier between our white and colored populations. He said that "it must give some shock to our idealism to ask what are we doing as a Christian Church and community to carry out the plain dictates of brotherhood, the elementary principles of justice and mercy—in our relations with the Negro population which lives in our midst.

"There is a natural segregation of the two races in their social and racial integrity which we are committed to preserve for what we believe to be the best interests of both races. That is a higher loyalty that we do not argue—we simply assume. It is the unwritten law of every Southern community, and in the main is carried out with splendid understanding on the part of the leaders and the members of both races.

"Where I believe we fail is in doing equal justice to the Negro population in the provision of the public utilities of the community.

"The surest safeguard to segregation would be to do plain justice by the Negroes—clean up the districts in which they live at present by providing decent streets and sewerage, and then plan for their expansion into some new suburban district where the same public facilities are afforded to the Negro population that are given to the whites under similar conditions.

"As we set before ourselves the ideal of St. Paul, 'in Christ Jesus there can be neither bond nor free', we may despair of ever bringing the gulf that seems to be fixed, but it is not for us to be anxious for the morrow nor to solve all the problems of the future—sufficient for the day is it to take one actual step that leads towards that ideal knowing that the time and season of Christ's appearing are in God's hands who will use us in proportion as we give ourselves for the establishment of His kingdom upon the earth."

Church and Sunday School.

As Sunday School is preparation for service as members of the Church, familiarity with the church and church services, is a very essential part of the children's training. The children of St. James' Sunday School, Richmond, will meet in the church once every month from last Sunday on, instead of always in the parish house for their joint assembly service. They have their own choir to lead their singing at these services, as well as at the special children's Lenten services.

Lenten services for children will be held one afternoon each week during Lent. Dr. Gibson, the rector, announced to the members of the Sunday School last Sunday, January 27, that every one who attends all of these services will receive a certificate of honor at Easter. Another prize for the children to work for is a prayer book which Dr. Gibson has offered to every child who learns dring Lent to repeat perfectly the Catechism.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

All Souls' Mission to Have Church.

A diocesan lay committee to further the project of building a church for All Souls' Mission, Capital Heights, has been organized and a meeting of the committee was held recently at Washington Cathedral. The new church is planned as a memorial to the late Rev. Reginald John Ripley, who worked so well and faithfully at Capital Heights.

Mr. H. D. Amiss, of Advent Parish, is chairman of the committee, and the other members are William A. Oanley, representing the people of All Souls' Mission; William F. Bowen, W. H. Goldsmith, Francis Wallace, Stuart B. Marshall, Busey H. Howard and Edwin N. Lewis.

At the meeting held at the Cathedral, Mr. Oakley reported that an adequate site for the new church on Central Avenue had been bequeathed to All Souls' Mission by the late O. B. Zanzinger several years ago. The preliminary foundations have been dug by the residents of Capitol Heights who are interested in this project and they have also made a good beginning on raising the necessary building fund.

As soon as an architect for the building has been selected and an estimate made on the total amount of money needed to construct and furnish an adequate building for the mission, Mr. Amiss and his associates plan to bring the project to the attention of all laymen in the Diocese of Washington. This plan has the approval of Bishop Freeman, who has been deeply interested for several years in the work which the late Canon Ripley was doing at Capitol Heights.

Changes in Washington Cathedral Staff.

The Rev. Robert Lee Lewis, Curator of Washington Cathedral for more than two years, has been made field representative of the National Committee for Washington Cathedral with special duties in connection with work among members of the Masonic fraternity.

Colonel John H. Finney, an active layman of the Diocese of Washington, has been appointed Curator to succeed Mr. Lewis.

Daughters of the King.

The service for the presentation of the self-denial offering of the Daughters of the King will be held on February 23, at 8 P. M., in Ascension Church, that day being the Feast of the Purification of Mary the Virgin. Junior Daughters of the King will act as ushers. The sermon will be preached by the Rev. Dr. G. Freeland Peter, Canon of Washington Cathedral. This day will be observed throughout the Church as a national day of corporate intercession for the Daughters of the King.

Church Mission of Help.

The Eighteenth Annual Meeting of the Church Mission of Help in the Diocese of New York, which was the first annual meeting of the Society in the new Church Mission of Help House, at 27 West Twenty-fifth Street, New York, brought together a large number of people interested in the very useful branch of the Church's program. The work of the past year was vividly pictured by members of the staff who gave talks answering the repeated question:

"How do the girls come to you?"

"What are they like?"

"What happens to them?"

THE PURIFICATION OF ST. MARY THE DIVINE.

(February 2.)

Almighty and ever-living God, we humbly beseech Thy Majesty, that, as Thy Only Begotten Son, was this day presented in the temple in substance of our flesh, so we may be presented unto Thee with pure and clean hearts by the same Thy Son, Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

REX CHRISTUS.

H. Raynesford Mulder.

Men strive for gain, yet Jesus had
  But borrowed manger crib. Nor owned
A single acre to give glad Reward for labor spent. Twelve loaned
Their lives to follow Him who talked
  So intimate with God, and claimed
Relationship as Son, yet walked
  A patterned way on earth. He blamed
But sin, hypocrisy and pride
  For all men's ills.

He had no church
Or pulpit. Sea, the mountainside,
  Desert, and even Temple porch
Witnessed the matchless faith he voiced:
  For sick rose healed to worship God,
Lepers were cleansed, the blind rejoiced
  To see again the sun and sod.

More, Jesus rode a borrowed colt
  Into Jerusalem. "The Lord hath need
Of him" was he said, if dolt
  Or man should question why the deed;
Yet what world Emperor could ride
  With such authority and know
The end? Again, He called aside
  Peter and John, bidding them go
Into the city. "Follow there
  A man bearing water, even
To his house, ask of him the spare
  Guest room that Sacrament given
May oft remind all men of Me."

The tomb was His last borrowing,
He would share Eternity
With us.

Meditation Chapel.

On the first Sunday in December the big Hotel Biltmore, in New York, did a very significant thing. It opened and dedicated a beautiful little chapel on the third floor of the hotel to be known as "Meditation Chapel". This little chapel is for the use of guests or any others who may be in any way connected with the hotel. There are to be formal religious services conducted in the chapel. It is a place for meditation and prayer. Any one who wishes to be alone with himself or with God for a quiet hour can step into the little chapel. The architecture and furnishings are designed to promote reverence and worship. The door of the chapel is never to be locked, day or night.

The management has announced that a similar chapel will be opened in each of the entire chain of hotels which are under the same management as Hotel Biltmore. The idea of having a "Meditation Chapel" in the hotel was not suggested by a minister, but by a lawyer, a Mr. Wilson, of Philadelphia. That in itself is significant.

It is a heartening sign, when the managers of a big corporation realize the importance of having a quiet place and a quiet hour for prayer and meditation. Life is very tense in a city like New York. Men are under a terrific strain. Besides the noise and confusion are at times enough to drive a man mad. What a blessed thing it is in the hours of strain and stress to have a quiet place to which one may repair and think of things that are unseen and eternal.

I never quite realized until last summer how difficult it is to find a quiet nook in the heart of a great city, where one can even sit down for a moment. At the beginning of the summer a young college graduate in whom I am deeply interested took a position down in the heart of New York, near Wall Street. His position was very exacting. There was a half hour for his lunch. He would get a light lunch and then try to get a few moments of rest and quiet. But there was no place even to sit down. At length the idea struck him that he would go into old Trinity Church each day at that hour. So he stepped in and found it the most restful, the most helpful place in the city. It is a blessed thing that there is such a place as old Trinity Church right close to Wall Street. There men can find rest for their souls and bodies.

But New York is not the only place where men and women need a "Meditation Chapel". Life is crowded everywhere, even out in the country districts. We rush from one thing to another, and from one place to another. There is noise and confusion everywhere. Everybody is on a tension. Our nerves are ready to snap. Sometimes we wonder what it is all about. It would be a fine thing for every human being to have an hour or half hour alone each day for meditation and prayer.

Some time ago I came into possession of a quaint little book which I prize very much. It is the "Early Religious History of John Barr", written by himself and left as a legacy to his grandchildren. John Barr was born of Scotch-Irish parents in Pennsylvania in 1749. When he was but a child his father moved to Rowan County, North Carolina. John Barr grew up to be a very earnest Christian and was for many years an elder in Thyatira Presbyterian Church. He has been dead for nearly a hundred years, but he left an indelible impression upon his church and upon the community.

In this religious history he lays great stress upon meditation. He says: "When we had no church service, I usually spent my Sabbaths alone in some retired place. This I found to be attended with its advantages, according to the state of my mind. When my mind had gotten a right bent or direction, its exercises were more free and uninterrupted. . . . Whilst musing as I walked along, on the ungovernable madness of my heart, these words came with impressive force into my mind: "Son, give me thine heart.' My heart promptly replied, with the aid of my voice, 'Lord, take my heart to Thee; let it be Thine this day, and Thine forever—the day is Thine, may the work be Thine—let no vain thought intrude upon these sacred hours'. I presently felt a calm and composure of mind to me unknown for some time before."

This is but a sample of the religious experiences of John Barr, and a sample of the way in which God's saints in those olden days took time to be holy, time for meditation and prayer. Every soul needs its meditation chapel.

Our churches ought to offer us larger opportunities for meditation and prayer. We ought to feel free to go to them during the week for a quiet hour. But some churches are closed, and even locked, for six days in the week. They ought to afford us more silence for meditation and prayer on the Sabbath. Many of our modern churches are very noisy places on the Sabbath.

Several years ago I ran across a chapter on "The Worship of the Church", by Raymond Calkins, which greatly impressed me. I have turned to it again and again. Here is a paragraph from it: "The Spirit of God has hard work to cast its spell upon a congregation which is engaged, up to the moment the service begins, in more or less noisy talk and interchange of greetings and remarks. For silence is the very secret and medium of spiritual efficacy. It is one of the most evident and indispensable conditions of real worship. The words, 'Be still and know that I am God', might well be placed before the eyes of many a modern congregation. Of the spiritual possibilities of stillness every one of us must have had some vital experience. Thus nature ministers to us. And the church needs to recapture this ministry of silence. Whoever has knelt in a great cathedral or in a little chapel, where nothing could be heard, save the beating of one's own heart, has felt himself in the very presence of the Eternal. The friendly nonsense and sibilant conversations appropriate enough at other times and places, when carried on as they are thoughtlessly in the moments preceding the service of worship, are the source of untold loss in the spiritual ministry possible to the church in our modern world." There is need for "meditation chapels" in our churches and in our church services.—Rev. Walter L. Lingle, in The Presbyterian of the South.

Singleness of Purpose.

It is hard for persons who are aware of a variety of purposes that they would like to carry out, and that seem to them of equal importance, to concentrate their attention effectively on achieving any one of them. A boy who aims at being the best football player in the school, the best scholar, the most popular fellow and the brightest talker, is a boy of a number of purposes; but in the act of preparing for the fulfilment of one of them the idea of preparing for the fulfilment of some of the others is likely to present superior attractions—and the ultimate result is that the youth becomes a mediocre performer in all respects.

Lack of singleness of purpose is a symptom of various undesirable traits—vacillation, jealousy, superficiality. Most of the people who suffer from it are unhappy. They don't really know what it is to have a purpose. The man who has one and is loyal to it is always reasonably happy and contented in working and aspiring toward it, even if his chances of accomplishing it are faint. But a man who substitutes a desire for a purpose is unlikely to be happy even in the acquisition of superficially desirable things. Perhaps most young Americans would admit if pressed that their real purpose in life is to become rich—rich enough to live comfortably and not to have to work for a living. A goodly number of Americans attain that condition, only to find that with the attainment their lives become emptier instead of fuller than before. To get rich in order not only to live comfortably, but to do something creative or constructive that it is impossible to do while you are engaged in the arduous struggle to earn a living—that is, to have a real purpose. And singleness of purpose of that kind, even though it never attain fruition, is likely to keep in a man's heart a sense of hopefulness and satisfaction that the lives of those who confuse purpose with desire will lack.—Youth's Companion.

Stewardship—It Must Be Studied.

There is sound philosophy in the dictum of the statesman, "What you would put into the life of the people you must put into its school". Experience has borne out the fact that the educational process is the surest way to guarantee any reform. We have need for reform in our policy of stewardship if it is to attain the high place of spiritual significance which it ought to achieve. If this reform is to be realized, the religious educational process must be utilized toward that end.

One of the most ancient, as well as the most powerful, patterns in worship is that which recognizes two alternating elements—the sacramental and the sacrificial, the grace of God and the offering of man. Nearly every adequate pattern of worship, in some manner or another, incorporates each of these two elements Our giving is thus more than merely contributing our bit to a collection—it is a fundamental and indispensable part of worship. The offering which is dedicated to God includes, not only the gift of gold and silver, which we bring to the altar, but it includes also the dedication of the whole of life. We consecrate our wealth, our efforts, and our lives on the altar of the living God. If this conception of stewardship is to become the prevailing view, it will do so only after the Church has emphasized its significance through a thorough educational process.

Stewardship is a thing of such momentous importance to the growth of the Church and to the development of the spiritual life of its constituency, that every legitimate agency of the Church ought to recognize its importance and share in its teaching. Sunday-school classes, young people's organizations, special classes of various age groups, leadership training classes, meetings on church nights, college courses, pastors' seminaries, summer schools, and various other teaching agencies ought to share in teaching the significance of it. The teaching agencies in the local church, as well as the denominational and interdenominational agencies, must seek to raise stewardship to a high spiritual plane through its religious educational program.—Rev. S. H. Humphrey, in Herald of Gospel Liberty.

However good you may be you have faults; however dull you may be, you can find out what they are; and however slight they may be, you had better make some patient effort to get rid of them.

For the Young Folks

RATHER THAN.

I'd rather lose than play the cheat,
I'd rather fail than live a lie,
I'd rather suffer in defeat
Than fear to meet another's eyes.
I'd rather never win a prize
Than gain the topmost rung of glory
And know I must myself despise
Until death ends my sorrow story.
I'd rather fail in every test
Than win success by base deceit,
I'd rather stand upon my best,
Be what it may, than play the cheat.
I'd rather never win men's praise
Nor share the victor's sum of laughter
Than trade myself-respect for days
And hate myself forever after.

The Glory of God.

Scientists are helping to confirm the teaching of the Psalmist of old, who said, "The heavens declare the glory of God". The men of that day knew little of the heavens compared with what the astronomers of today have learned. We wonder if these modern scientists have any more reverence for God than had the star gazers of old. But the astronomers and other scientists of today are giving to the world information that ought to make every man stand in awe and amazement, when he thinks of the God who created the universe.

Many people seem to feel, as the little girl once said, that the stars are "pin holes in the sky, letting the glory of heaven come through". They do not take into consideration that each of them is an immense world or sun. Nor do they realize that they cannot see the limits of God's universe.

Telescopes already made reveal many millions of stars which cannot be seen with the eye alone. And now another and more powerful telescope is to be made by the California Institute of Technology at Pasadena. It will have a reflecting mirror of 200 inches in diameter, which is double the diameter of the largest such reflector ever made, and its power will be from five to ten times that of any other. It is expected that this telescope will bring to view countless millions of stars that are now invisible, some of them so far away that it takes billions of years for their light to reach the earth. No man believes that even this powerful instrument will reach the outer confines of the material universe. Truly our God is great, and greatly to be praised.—The Presbyterian of the South.

The Under-Water World.

Jean and Helen lived on a mountain lake far from other little folk. The lake has another name, but they call it the "Lake of Clear Water". Mountains shelter it on three sides and dozens of little streams rush down to empty into it.

The two girls live in a house boat. When the winds are still the water is as clear as glass and they can look down into it for ten or twenty feet. They have dicovered a whole new world under the water. The bottom in places is covered with moss and the tall water weeds seem like big trees. If they look very closely they can often see fish swimming about.

In the deep water trout with their beautiful speckled bodies dart to and fro, and in the late summer and fall salmon can be seen. They have come up from the ocean to spawn in the little creeks that feed the lake. When they first come into the lake they are a deep bluish color. Then they change to purple and as the spawning time draws near they turn quite red. One moonlight night the little girls were allowed to stay up late to see the salmon jumping. Their dripping bodies shone like silver in the moonlight. It was a sight the children will never forget.

Near the shore great numbers of small fish live. Helen and Jean like to feed them. Have you ever helped to feed the chickens at the farm? Well, feeding the fish is very much like that. They crowd near the top and try to snatch the biggest crumbs. There are dace, which never get more than four or five inches long, little squawfish, baby trout and sometimes even baby salmon.

Of course, some of the crumbs fall past the feeding fish right to the bottom. But usually there is an old sucker waiting to get what sinks past the more active little fish. The sucker has always been known as a scavenger of the lake bottom, but Helen and Jean have given him a new name. They call him the "vacuum cleaner". Indeed, he is very much like one, only he draws up water instead of air. He keeps the carpet of moss on the bottom quite clean. He swims close to it and with his mouth sucks up bits of food. The water is strained off through his gills and the food remains.

One day daddy called Helen and Jean to watch a stickleback. They knew this little fellow very well, but they had never seen him build a nest. They call him the "Knight of the Waters", because he has weapons to fight with and wears a suit of armor. His weapons are spines or stickles on his back and his fins, and his armor is made of little bony plates overlapping on his sides. This little knight builds a fine castle for his fair lady.

He spends many days gathering tiny sticks and bits of sand which he fastens together with glue from his body. The nest is all one room, has two doors so he can go in one way and out the other. This is where the eggs are laid. They are about the size of a pin head and there are several hundred of them. All the time he is building his castle Sir Stickleback is very much on guard. Let another fish come too close and he will drive him away, even if the other one is much larger than himself.

Helen and Jean have many other friends among the fish and are making new ones every week. They find them quite as interesting as the animals and birds of the woods and air.—Our Dumb Animals.

The Story of a Little Seed.

Once upon a time there was a tall milkweed that stood in a fence corner at the very edge of a large wood. As the summer advanced, the milkweed was covered with long green pods; and by and by these pods burst open, and dozens upon dozens of tiny seeds with soft, downy tips, came peeping out. "My children, my lovely little seed children," murmured the milkweed, a she swayed to and fro in the summer breeze, "you must fly away now and leave me, one by one. But the good God meant that every one of you should sink down into the cool, damp earth and grow up to be a big, splendid milkweed just as I am."

"And so we will; and so we will!" cried all the downy seeds together; "we will not forget what you have told us. Goodby, dear mother, good-by". Just then a gay little breeze came dashing by and caught them up in his arms and away they flew, here and there, and everywhere. But wherever a seed dropped into the cold, damp earth, the milkweed mother knew that a tall, splendid plant like herself would be growing next summer.

One little seed, smaller than the others, with downy wings that glistened in the sun, shrank back into the green pod and refused to go with the rest. "I like the sunshine and the pure, sweet air and the bright blue sky," she cried; "don't cast me on the ground, Mr. Wind, but take me sailing away and away, and ever and ever so far!"

Now the wind was a jolly, rollicking fellow, so crying, "All right, here we go!" he caught her up and carried her off in a hurry. On and on she flew with breathless haste, through the woods and over the brook to a wheat field that stood fair and shining in the sun. At last she caught on a prickly ear of wheat and hung there, breathless.

"And who are you?" she cried at last, when she was rested enough to speak.

"I am a stalk in a wheat field," answered the wheat politely.

"And how came you here?" said the seed gazing down at the long yellow stalk.

"Oh, I was a tiny grain once," said the wheat. "But a farmer planted me in the cool, damp earth, and I grew up to be the splendid stalk that you see."

"I don't want to be planted," said the little seed saucily. "I had much rather fly about in the sunshine. Take me up again, Mr. Wind," and away she flew.

When she stopped again, after a long, glorious flight, she caught on the rough bark of a broad, graceful tree, covered with green leaves and lucious fruit.

"And who are you?" she asked again.

"I am an apple tree," said the big tree, kindly.

"An apple tree, and how came you here, pray?" asked the seed.

"Oh, I was just a tiny apple seed once,' said the tree, "but I sank into the cool, damp earth just here, and now I have grown into a great, broad tree and bear ever so many delicious apples every year of my life."

"That's all very well," said the little seed, "but I like better to fly in the sunshine", and away she went, rolling and tumbling and laughing in the summer breeze.

She flew back into the large, dark forest this time, and when she stopped again she found herself in the arms of a great forest tree, larger and more splendid than any she had ever seen.

"And who are you?" she asked of the big, rough tree.

"I am an oak," was the answer in big, kindly tones.

"And where did you come from?" asked the seed.

"Oh, I was nothing but an acorn once," said the tree, "but I sank into the cool, damp earth just here, and now I am a great fine tree, with ever so many birds nestling in my branches."

Just then the seed looked down into a hollow in the great, gnarled branches and saw a little brown something, ugly shriveled and old.

"And who are you?" she said with a little shrug of contempt.

"Oh, I am an acorn," came the answer in a shrill, cracked voice, "a last year's acorn that didn't want to be planted. Just see how safely I am hiding."

The tiny seed looked at the poor, wizened acorn and at the big splendid oak and hung very quietly in her place for a long, long time. At last she called out, very gently: "Take me down to the cool, damp earth, Mr. Wind, for I want to be a milkweed like my mother!"

"All right," said the good-natured wind and away she flew.—The King's Builders.

IN TRUST.

"He who thinks and stands alone,
Alone shall surely fall—
Our very woes are not our own,
But held in trust for all.

. . . .

For we who work, and we who weep,
Nor weep, nor work in vain,
If other hands our harvest reap,
And other hearts with joy shall leap,
To garner up our grain."

—Whyte-Melville.

Brick by Brick.

"I wish I could do something great or be a great man."

The family gathered about the library table for the evening looked up at Robert in surprise. He had laid aside "Scottish Chiefs" for the moment, and with his chin in his hands and his elbows on his knees he was gazing into the fire, dreaming of the great deeds of the heroes of ancient Scotland.

"You can if you will," said grandma.

"How?" asked Robert.

"By building brick on brick," said grandma, "little by little, one thing at a time."

"Doesn't sound like so much," commented Robert.

"No, that's the trouble with most of us," said grandma. "We see the result, but not the cause; the great deed, but not the long preparation for it. Your books tell about the wonderful things accomplished by the Scottish war leaders, but they say little about the many years of training they had to have before they were ready to become leaders.

"Did you ever hear the story of the humble bricklayer and Thomas Carlyle, the famous English writer? One of Carlyle's most notable books would probably never have been given to the world had it not been for the faithfulness of a poor bricklayer who never dreamed of the great thing he did and whose name the world will never know.

"When Mr. Carlyle had finished the second volume of his famous work on the 'French Revolution', he loaned the manuscript to a friend to read. One day a careless servant, looking for something with which to start a fire, saw the manuscript and used it for kindling. It was the only copy, and when the author heard of the accident he was in despair. So discouraged was he that for days he did not have the heart to work on anything.

"But one morning while sitting by an open window he noticed a bricklayer hard at work on a wall near by. Brick by brick, brick by brick, with care and precision the mason was slowly building a high, strong wall.

" 'How foolish I am!' exclaimed Mr. Carlyle to himself. 'That humble workman puts me to shame.' And with fresh courage and new zeal he set to work to rewrite the book.

"That bricklayer never knew what a great deed he had done, but he did know that he was faithful in doing the thing it was his duty to do. And by doing his duty he gave inspiration to another to do a greater and more useful work.

"I never thought of it that way," said Robert, as grandma ended her story. "But I am going to begin laying my bricks right away. It may be that I can do something great after all."

"I'm sure you can," said grandma, patting his arm. "I'm sure you can if you keep on trying. And don't forget that it is brick by brick a little at a time that the greatest lives are kindled." —William T. McElroy, in Western Recorder.

B. A. M. Schapiro, Managing Director

To the Readers of "The Southern Churchman".

Dear Friends:

The purpose of our Society is, and has been, during its entire fifteen years of activity, to present the Gospel of our Lord to the Jews through the printed page. Many Jews are reading the New Testament with open minds; they are asking sober questions as to the Messiahship of the Christ.

Our Society publishes literature adopted to the Judaic mind, and this literature is supplied without cost to those who apply for it. Demands come from all over the world for our publications.

We have no other income, but depend entirely on voluntary contributions for the support of this work. We, therefore, ask you to uphold our hands and to help us to do this work for our Lord. You may do this either by making a gift or by becoming a member of the Society. Foundation Member, $100.00; Sustaining Member, $25.00; Active Member, $10.00; Contributing Member, $5.00.

We need funds to reprint some of our old tracts, for which there are persistent calls, and to print new ones which already have been prepared. Contributors to the work of the Society are entitled to all of our publications.

Yours sincrely,
KENNETH MACKENZIE, Secretary-Treasurer.

"How long do you keep them?"

The Rev. J. Wilson Sutton, D. D., who is President of the New York Branch and also Chaplain, comes in very close contact with the girls under care and he spoke on the spiritual side of the work. Miss Mary S. Brisley, Executive Secretary, told in her report of over six hundred girls under care during the past year in New York City and the West Chester County Branch. Of the new girls received during the year less than half were unmarried mothers and less than one-third were Episcopalians, which showed that while the Episcopal Church cares for the respective Episcopalians the benefit is non-sectarian.

In reporting on the new Church Mission of Help House, the Treasurer, Mr. Harry Pelham Robbins, thanked the friends of the Society who, by their generous gifts, provided the required furnishings so that none of the ordinary income was used for the establishment of the work in its present very complete headquarters. The operating expenses in 1928 for the Diocesan work, which includes the active Branch in West Chester County, with its headquarters at White Plains, were $36,625.67, about one-fifth of this amount having been spent for the West Chester work. One-half of the income was provided by the Church in the diocese and in looking forward to the new year the Treasurer asked for generous individual gifts to meet the large portion of the budget which is not provided for by the Church.

The Rev. Caleb R. Stetson, D. D., presided at the meeting and expressed the satisfaction which Trinity Corporation feels in having the old rectory turned over for this useful purpose. The expense of remodelling the House has been shared equally by the Church Mission of Help House and Trinity Corporation and the House is rent free. The library in which the meeting was held is now serving a useful purpose for conferences and is known as the Laurette Pease Library in recognition of the valued services of Mrs. L. Frederick Pease in Church Mission of Help and other social work.

The gift of a small chapel in the House has recently been made by members of Trinity Chapel and, although not yet completed many guests enjoyed seeing the room which will soon be the heart of the work. This is associated by the donors with the spiritual work of the present Chaplain and President, Dr. Sutton.

THE DIVINE PLAN

BY

REV. HOWARD G. ENGLAND, B. A., D. D.,
Church of the Holy Comforter, Rock Creek Parish,
Washington, D. C.

THE JEWISH CHURCH.

The government instituted by Moses differed from all others, ancient or modern, in that it claimed to be that of the Creator, and that the people were held accountable to Him; their laws and institutions, civil and religious, claimed to come from God. The Tabernacle, in the center of the camp, had a "Holy of Holies", where Jehovah as their King manifested Himself by supernatural means, whence they received instruction for the proper administration of their affairs as a nation. An order of priests was established, which had complete charge of the Tabernacle, and through them alone access and communion with Jehovah was permitted. Israel's government was a democracy; but, regarded in the light of its own claims, it was a theocracy, i. e., a Divine government.

"The Lord said unto Moses, gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel whom thou knowest to be elders of the people and officers over them, and bring them unto the Tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee. And I will come down and talk with thee there, and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee and will put it upon them, and they shall bear the burden of the people with thee, that thou bear it not alone" (Num. 11:16, 17). So completely was the government of the people put into their own hands that though it was stipulated that the weightier cases, which those governors and judges could not decide, were to be brought unto Moses, yet they themselves were the judges as to what cases went before Moses: "The cause which is too hard for you, bring unto me, and I will hear it" (Deut. 1:17). The ministry consisted of High Priest, Priests and Levites. The High Priest offered the Sacrifice in the Holy of Holies once a year, on the Day of Atonement, for the sins of the whole nation, presided over the Sanhedrin and blessed the children who came to the Passover, when twelve years of age, as in the case of our Lord Jesus Christ. The priests offered the daily sacrifices in the Temple at nine o'clock in the morning and three o'clock in the afternoon, and also taught the people out of the Law. The Levites assisted the priests in their office. This Divine organization was known as the Jewish Church. Its message was mostly for the Jewish people. It did not send out missionaries to convert the Gentile nations to the truth of God. The Jewish Church gave the Old Testament to the world. It also carefully preserved it. The teaching of Genesis that man was tried, in a state of original perfection, is one representative; that he failed, and that the present imperfection, sickness and death are the results, but that God has not forsaken him, and will ultimately recover him, through a Redeemer, born of a woman (Gen. 3:15), is kept up and elaborated all through the writings of the Old Testament.

A Saviour.

The necessity of the death of a Redeemer as a sacrifice for sins and of His righteousness as a covering for our sin is pointed out in the clothing of skins for Adam and Eve; in the acceptance of Abel's offering; in Isaac on the altar, in the death of the various sacrifices by which the patriarchs had access to God, and of those instituted under the Law and perpetuated throughout the Jewish age. The prophets, though credited with understanding but slightly the significance of some of their utterances (1 Peter 1:12), mention the laying of the sins upon a Person instead of a dumb animal, and in prophetic vision they see Him who is to redeem and to deliver the race led "as a lamb to the slaughter"; that "the chastisement of our peace was upon Him", and that "by His stripes we are healed". They pictured Him as "despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief", and declared that "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isai. 53:3-6). They told where this Deliverer would be born (Micah 5:2) and when He should die, assured us that it would be "not for Himself" (Dan. 9:26). The prophet says: "Jehovah hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all—as a Lamb that is led to the slaughter" (Isai. 53:6, 7); that He would be betrayed for thirty pieces of silver (Zach. 11:12); that He would be numbered among the transgressors in His death (Isai. 53:12); that not a bone of Him should be broken (Psa. 34:20; St. John 19:36), and that though He should die and be buried, His flesh would not corrupt, neither would He remain in the grave Psa. 16:10; Acts 2:31). In due time an angel named Gabriel was sent from God to a priest in the Temple at Jerusalem to say that his wife Elizabeth should bear a son who should prepare the way of the Lord. The same angel was sent to a pure Virgin named Mary to tell her that the Holy Ghost should overshadow her and that she should be the Mother of the Son of God and that His name sould be Jesus. All these wonderful prophecies and the words of the angel weref ulfilled to the letter. Jesus Christ the Saviour, the Anointed of God, was born in Bethlehem of Judea. The angels of God announced His birth to the shepherds on the hillside and sang the first Christmas carol. Many were attracted to Him by His wonderful teaching and miracles, when He opened the eyes of the blind, the ears of the deaf, cleansed lepers, cured all kinds of sickness, cast out evil spirits, raised the dead to life.

Winnsboro Granite Monuments Maintain Memories

*"Thou turnest man to destruction * * * They are like grass which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down and withereth."*

How these words have been impressed upon us. There are some losses we will never forget; some memories we will always cherish.

Visits to the cemeteries where graves are marked reveal that many of the markers and monuments are also of few days, some discolored, others cracking and crumbling, as the ravages of time take their toll.

What a consolation to know that Mother's monument has been cut from a more lasting stone—genuine Winnsboro Granite. How the very rock itself brings back the tender memories of her. One can almost see a vision of childhood days in the stone itself.

OF ALL THE GRAY GRANITES,

Winnsboro Granite

stands preeminently the most lasting, the most beautiful and inscriptions on it most legible.

Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty, because they contain more deleterious elements, such as water, lime and iron. These elements tend to disintergration and discoloration.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument you purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B. H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below.

Entered into rest eternal, ELLA HUBARD LLOYD, widow of the Rev. John J. Lloyd, D. D., on January 9, Lynchburg, Va.

Closed the tired eyes in the frail little body; gone the brave spirit that no ills could down; quiet the feet ever on mercy's errand bent; at rest the generous hands. Cast off the old worn garment of the flesh, put on the bright raiment of "Well done, thou good and faithful servant".

MRS. FRANCIS J. DIXON.

January 7, 1929, at the rectory of St. Matthew's Church, Kenedy, Texas, the residence of her son, the Rev. J. H. S. Dixon, MRS. FRANCIS J. DIXON, daughter of Lady Georgina Keppel Hill and Captain Edward Hill, of England, passed to her eternal rest. She was born in Cephalonia, Greece, October 10, 1834. The body was taken to Corpus Christi, where it lay in state in the Church of the Good Shepherd. Services were conducted by the Rev. J. W. Sykes at the church and at Rose Hill Cemetery.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

The New Prayer Book and the New Year.

As we approach a turning point in the life of our Cathedral, I should like to be the well instructed scribe who brings forth out of his treasures things new and old.

A new Dean is about to enter into the sacred inheritance of the oldest Cathedral of our Church in this country, and I am confident that he will unite us in veneration for the past and in enthusiasm for the future.

Soon after his coming we shall have our old Book of Common Prayer in its revised form, which has become our authorized standard of faith and worship.

In preparation for the use of this Book it is proper for me to submit a general plan of services in the Cathedral in accordance with our traditional use accommodated to the principles which have led to the latest and most successful revision of our liturgy.

It is unnecessary to mention the slight alterations which will be found in the daily and occasional offices, and I may direct principal attention to the service appointed for eleven o'clock on Sundays and on the greater Feasts of the Church.

In accordance with the custom which has prevailed from the beginning of our Cathedral life, the Chief Service on the Lord's Day will continue to be that which was ordained by the Divine Head of the Church as a perpetual commemoration of the world's redemption.

On the greater Festivals of the Church the Order for Holy Communion will be preceded by a Procession and the Te Deum.

On the first Sunday of each month, the Litany will be said before the Communion in accordance with ancient usage and as a suitable preparation for the Eucharist. On other Sundays, the preparation will consist of a short office of devotion taken from the Order for Morning Prayer.

In this way we shall observe strictly the injunction that no one of the services may habitually be disused, and we shall dignify the Chief Service of the day by approaching it in a spirit of true devotion.

It should be noted that provision for this service was the result of long and careful study on the part of men who are learned in the history of Christian worship, and, in making a short portion of Morning Prayer a definite part of the Communion service, the Commission on Revision presented an order which brings it into conformity with one of the finest Liturgies of the Western Church.

In the Mozarabic Rite, which was used in the independent Church of Spain, an outstanding feature was the reading of three selections from the Holy Scriptures; one from the Old Testament, one from an Apostolic Epistle, and the Holy Gospel as a fitting climax.

In adopting this practice our Cathedral service will preserve the best traditions of the Westefn Church, and will meet a real spiritual need in the lives of those who worship in the Diocesan Church.

In arriving at this decision I have been moved by respect for the best experience of the centuries past, by a desire to show loyalty to the authority of the Church and by the hope that a devout use of this dignified service will bear fruit in deepening our devotion to Him who is Head over all things to the Church.

On this foundation we may hope to build securely for the years that are to come, making increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.

Woman's Auxiliary Convention.

The ninth annual convention of the Woman's Auxiliary of this diocese was held at historic old St. Philip's Church, Charleston, January 9-10. An early service of the Holy Communion was celebrated in the church Wednesday morning by Bishop Thomas, assisted by the Rev. S. Cary Beckwith, rector of the parish, and the Rev. Harold Thomas, rector of St. Luke's.

About two hundred and fifty delegates and visitors were welcomed by Mr. Beckwith at the opening session in the parish house, at eleven o'clock.

Bishop Thomas made an address.

Registration of delegates and visitors then took place before the regular meeting was called to order by Mrs. Louis D. Simonds, president.

Mrs. Huger Sinkler gave a brief and cordial welcome in behalf of the hostess branches of the local parishes, and Mrs. Ernest Duval, of Cheraw, responded, expressing the appreciation of the visitors.

The presiding officer's chair was occupied by Mrs. W. S. Poynor, the secretary, while the events of her first year in office were reviewed by Mrs. Simonds. The report stated that since the last annual meeting two new branches of the diocese had been established and that the year showed a gain of fifteen members in the auxiliary. In the name of the auxiliary the president deplored the sudden death last summer of Bishop Guerry.

Mrs. Simonds urged the members to take individual responsibility as the keynote for the coming year and to stress the importance of personal evangelism more than ever before.

There followed the annual reports of the secretary, Mrs. W. S. Poynor, of Florence, and of representatives from the districts of Beaufort, Charleston, and Orangeburg. The reports included that on the Florence District by Mrs. R. W. Sharkey; Georgetown District, by Mrs. H. D. Bull; Sumter District, by Miss Annie Keels, and the Church Periodical Club, by Mrs. I. G. Ball.

The Rev. L. G. Wood, speaking on St. Luke's Hospital and its founder, Dr. Teusler, said that this is one of the greatest institutions for missionary work.

Wednesday evening there were addresses by the Rev. James M. Magruder and the Rev. David Cady Wright on the subject of "Personal Evangelism".

The convention adjourned Thursday afternoon.

Fifty-Third Anniversary.

The Rev. Charles H. Smith has been rector of St. James' Church, Buffalo, for fifty-three years, and he celebrated the anniversary Sunday with a rarely beautiful sermon on the texts: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" Acts 9:6; "Seek first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you," St. Matthew 6:33.

Rather than gaze retrospectively over the history of the church, Mr. Smith felt that it would be better to look to the future, in order that it might be seen what requires attention and service, and he urged that all his congregation apply to their own lives the substance and spirit of the text, of his sermon, asking himself and herself the question, and carrying out God's answer. He decried the practice of people of today of being thoughtful only for themselves, providing not only the necessities, but the luxuries, and perhaps extravagances, so that there is very little, if anything, left to God.

During the fifty-three years of Mr. Smith's charge, records of the church show that 5,600 persons have been baptized: 3,411 have been confirmed; 2,365 marriages have been solemnided, 3,362 persons have been buried.

Conference for Church Work.

The women of the Diocese of Maryland held a Conference for Church Work in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, January 22-24, inclusive. Bishop Helfenstein opened the conference with the celebration of the Holy Communion and the following topics were discussed: "Christ's Challenge to Youth," by the Rev. Stephen Webster; "Africa," by the Rev. Stephen Webster; "The New Africa," by Mrs. Wright be Haff; "The Lord's Prayer," by Dr. Wm. C. Sturgis.

Medal of Distinction.

St. John's Church, Mt. Washington, was awarded a medal of distinction by the Baltimore Sun as being the best type of church architecture in Baltimore during the year 1928. The Rev. R. S. Litsinger is rector.

N. E. P.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Robert J. Belt, of St. James' Parish, Mansfield, Pa., has been appointed to take charge of the Church of the Resurrection, Baltimore, and will begin his new duties on February 1. This church was formerly under the care of the Rev. Joseph M. Waterman, who is now in Parkersburg, W. Va.

The Rev. William F. Bumsted, formerly rector of Fluvanna Parish, Columbia, Va., has accepted a call to St. Peter's Church, New York City, with address at 346 West Twenieth Street, New York City. The change to be effective February 1.

The Rev. James A. Dick, formerly of St. Luke's Mission, Kingstree, S. C., is now rector of Christ Church, Pulaski, Va., with address, Box 813, Pulaski, Va.

The Rev. Ralph C. Putney, of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., has received a call as rector of Trinity Church, Monroe, Mich. It is expected that Mr. Putney will assume charge of the work in the early summer.

The Rev. Charles O'Meara has retired from the rectorship of Trinity Church, Monroe, after twenty-seven years' work. Mr. O'Meara was for several years in the service of the Canadian-Pacific Railway and resigned as General Freight and Passenger Agent to study for Holy Orders. He was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Huron in 1881 and the priesthood the following year.

The Rev. Percival C. Bailey, missionary in charge of St. Hilda's, River Rouge and St. Michael's, Lincoln Park, Mich., has resigned this position to become the assistant to the rector of St. Matthias' Church, Detroit, the Rev. A. S. Gill. Mr. Bailey will assume his new duties on the first Sunday in February.

DEATHS.

Dr. Alexander C. McCabe, Archdeacon of the Diocese of Tennessee and Chaplain of the Tennessee Hotel Men's Association, died suddenly at Dyersbur, Tenn., on January 19. Dr. McCabe was seventy-two years old.

The Rev. George J. Prescott, of Boston, Mass., died December 26, 1928, after a rectorship of fifty-one years of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Boston. At the time of his death he was eighty-one years of age. This is one of the longest rectorships in the history of the Church.

"EVOLUTION"

MEANS UNROLL; THE MORE YOU UNROLL THE LESS YOU HAVE LEFT

VERBAL SMOKE SCREENS

Get this, if you can. "Evolution is a change from an indefinite, incoherent homogeneity to a definite, coherent heterogenity, through a process of differentiations and integrations," which means that a vague somehow-or-other can't-stock-together all-alike-ness is changed to an easily described hang-togetherness that is unlike anything that is different, through a process of separating for cause and combining for convenience. The wonder is, so many people take it seriously. Evolution means to UNROLL. Any schoolboy knows that the more you unroll a thing, the smaller it gets. The famous phrase—"The survival of the fittest"—has for years been relied upon to explain the process of evolution. It sounds pretty, and seems pious, but what it really means is, "Might makes right"; "Dog eat dog"; "Root hog or die"; "The weak to the wall." With such a theory, "modernists" propose a compromise—"Let us slip God in somewhere, and you may evolve the Bible also." The scholar who believes the "fact" of evolution doubts the infallibility of the Bible. I know of no exception.

OUGHT NOT RELIGION TO ADJUST ITSELF TO SCIENCE?

There are no adjusters on true religion or real science. If you have enough big words you can label anything "science." For a few thousand dollars you can hire a battery of "scientists" to testify under oath to the effect that the bigger devil a criminal is, the less he is to blame. One of the last babies the devil had, he called his middle name "science." Hear a parable: Once there was a boy who rode a broomstick. He said "Choo-choo" and whistled at the crossings. He went so fast the telephone poles couldn't keep up. "Man-made religion" may follow the bandwagon and leave the oracles of God behind for all I care, but the faith on which I stake my soul must be constant. Lightning-bugs are scientists in their own sphere; they know how to do some things better than I do, but I want the stars, in the "valley of the shadow." "Scientists" have changed their pronouncements so many times that they ought to be lenient with us if we wait until they agree on just what tinkering our Bible needs and stay agreed for ten years. I cannot face eternity with an opinion and a smile. Foghooks make poor anchors in a storm.

"CHRISTIAN'S BELIEF"

I.

The Bible, consisting of all the books of the Old and New Testaments, is the Word of God, a supernaturally given revelation from God Himself, concerning Himself, His being, nature, character, will and purposes; and concerning man, his nature, need, duty and destiny. The Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are without error or misstatement in their moral and spiritual teachings and record of historical facts. They are without error or defect of any kind.

II.

There is one God, eternally existing and manifesting Himself to us in three Persons—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

III.

Our Lord Jesus was supernaturally conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit and born of a virgin—Mary, a lineal descendant of David. He lived and taught and wrought mighty works and wonders and signs exactly as is recorded in the four Gospels. He was put to death by crucifixion under Pontius Pilate. God raised from the dead the body that had been nailed to the cross. The Lord Jesus after His crucifixion showed Himself alive to His disciples, appearing unto them by the space of forty days. After this the Lord Jesus ascended into heaven, and the Father caused Him to sit at His right hand in the heavenly places, far above all rule and authority and power and dominion and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come, and put all things in subjection under His feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the Church.

IV.

The Lord Jesus, before His incarnation, existed in the form of God, and of His own choice laid aside His divine glory and took upon Himself the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men. In His preexistent state, He was with God and was God. He is a divine person possessed of all the attributes of Deity, and should be worshipped as God by angels and men. "In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily." All the words that He spoke during His earthly life were the words of God. There is absolutely no error of any kind in them, and by the words of Jesus Christ the words of all other teachers must be tested.

V.

The Lord Jesus became in every respect a real man, possessed of all the essential characteristics of human nature.

VI.

By His death upon the cross, the Lord Jesus made a perfect atonement for sin, by which the wrath of God against sinners is appeased and a ground furnished upon which God can deal in mercy with sinners. He redeemeth us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse in our place. He who Himself was absolutely without sin was made to be sin on our behalf that we might become the righteousness of God in Him. The Lord Jesus is coming again to this earth, personally, bodily, and visibly. The return of our Lord is the blessed hope of the believer, and in it God's purposes of grace toward mankind will find their consummation.

VII.

The Holy Spirit is a person, and is possessed of all the distinctively divine attributes. He is God.

VIII.

Man was created in the image of God, after His likeness, but the whole human race fell in the fall of the first Adam. All men, until they accept the Lord Jesus as their personal Saviour, are lost, darkened in their understanding, alienated from the lifeof God through the ignorance that is in them, hardened in heart, morally and spiritually dead through their trespasses and sins. They cannot see, nor enter the kingdom of God until they are born again of the Holy Spirit.

IX.

Men are justified on the simple and single ground of the shed blood of Christ and upon the simple and single condition of faith in Him who shed the blood, and are born again by the quickening, renewing, cleansing work of the Holy Spirit, through the instrumentality of the Word of God.

X.

All those who receive Jesus Christ as their Saviour and their Lord, and who confess Him as such before their fellow men, become children of God and receive eternal life. They become heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ. At death their spirits depart to be with Christ in conscious blessedness, and at the second coming of Christ their bodies shall be raised and transformed into the likeness of the body of His glory.

XI.

All those who persistently reject Jesus Christ in the present life shall be raised from the dead and throughout eternity exist in a state of conscious, unutterable, endless torment and anguish.

XII.

The Church consists of all those who, in this present dispensation, truly believe on Jesus Christ. It is the body and bride of Christ, which Christ loves and for which He has given Himself up.

XIII.

There is a personal devil, a being of great cunning and power. "The prince of the power of the air." "The prince of this world." "The god of this age." He can exert vast power only so far as God suffers him to do so. He shall ultimately be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone and shall be tormented day and night forever.

Every member of the Board of Directors, and every teacher and missionary is required to sign this Statement of Doctrine the first of every year; and no one can ever preach or teach in our buildings any doctrine contrary to it.—Bible Institute of Los Angeles.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Love never works by the clock."

"Whenever a Christian has a need he should also remember that he has a God."

It is not by understanding God, but by trusting in Him that souls are made good.

"When a man is on his deathbed he has nothing to say about the hypocrites in the church."

Joy in the heart will be pretty sure to write its name upon the face.

"Oh, empty us of self, the world, and sin,
And then in all Thy fullness enter in!"

God gave us memory," says Sir James M. Barrie, "that we might have roses in winter."

"Example is as contagious as the small-pox.

Surely it is a poor creed that will allow us to trust in God only for ourselves.—George Macdonald.

There is nothing laid down as a duty, but grace is promised to enable us to perform it.—Rowland Hill.

No man has done his best work who has never allowed Christ to operate through him.—Rev. Wm. Porkess, D. D.

Do your work—not just your work and no more, but a little more for the lavishing's sake; that little more which is worth all the rest. And if you suffer as you must, and if you doubt as you must, do your work. Put your heart into it and the sky will clear. Then out of your very doubt and suffering will be born the supreme joy of life.—Dean Briggs.

"If you are in doubt about the Christian faith, you cannot do better than to live up to the light you have. Do the next duty, pray for light, and the promise fulfilled in thousands will be fulfilled in you."

It is our own fault if we make not free with the riches of our God. Never want while thou hast God to go to, never fear or faint while thou hast God to help thee.—Spurgeon.

"O GOD, THY ARM WAS HERE, AND NOT TO US, BUT TO THY ARM ALONE ASCRIBE WE ALL"

Shakespeare's Henry the Fifth After the Battle of Agincourt.

In 1781 when the messenger from Yorktown announced to the Continental Congress sitting at Philadelphia that Lord Cornwallis had surrendered to Gen. George Washington, Edmund Randolph got up and moved that Congress adjourn to the Dutch Reformed Church to render thanks to Almighty God who had given us the victory.

Sailors of the Italian steamship Florida, who were rescued by the Americans of the steamship America, sought a church of their faith as soon as they were ashore in New York. They went twice every day to offer, in their humble way, thanks and praise to God for their almost miraculous deliverance. Captain Fried, of the rescuing ship, drove her through hundreds of miles of fierce storm and whelming waves to the dangerous task of saving strangers of country and race far separated from his, having no claim on him except that they were fellow men and brother mariners in deadly peril. First, Officer Manning made sea history, with his eight volunteer oarsmen, by the unexcelled courage and skill with which he reached, took off and conveyed to safety the thirty-two men of the Florida's crew over a quarter mile of tumult of heaving and crashing mountains of water and screaming, raging wind. Amid the acclamation of an admiring world, Fried and Manning told reporters they felt that they could not have succeeded in their splendid endeavor, but for the mercy and help of God. Dick Byrd is brother of the Governor of Virginia and descendant of the founder of the City of Richmond and commands and leads the most daring of all expeditions to the South Pole. The other day in a crash and break up of the ice to which Byrd's ships were moored, one of the crew, named Roth, went overboard. Byrd, with already five medals for life saving, quickly plunged into the freezing water amid the grinding huge ice cakes to aid his comrade. When, later, Byrd's almost lifeless body had been hoisted aboard his ship, New York, his first question, as he regained speech, was, "Is Roth safe"? and, being answered in the affirmative, his next words were, "Thank God!"

In Washington a week or so ago General Charles Manly Stedman—good old historic Baptist name—celebrated his eighty-first birthday. He volunteered as private in the Confederate Army, served faithfully to the end of the Confederacy, was thrice wounded in battle and after each wound returned to duty as soon as strength permitted. He is serving his tenth term in the House of Representatives from North Carolina. Talking of his life, when he was being honored by his fellow members of both houses and parties, he expressed his humble thanks to God for the years granted him.

All these men are real men. At thought of them the hearts of manly men and womanly women swell and thrill and take warming comfort in assurance that the old breed of heroism and valor, loyalty and high chivalry, is not extinct, that it is yet a living and present part of our life, along with the old loving and guiding faith and trust in the Almighty Creator and dutiful reverence for Him. It is instructive to consider them and their sturdy characteristics, conduct and achievements compared, for instance, with the attitude, utterances and acts of persons like President Neilson and his associates, Professor Barnes and Hankins, all of Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, an endowed institution for the education of young women. The three, regarding their positions, in the elegant and elevating language of Professor Barnes, as simply "jobs", seek distinction by obtruding themselves continually on public notice, through newspapers, and, consequently, suggest measurement of themselves with the sailors and the veteran who have become widely prominent.

The president and the professors demonstrate their valor by vociferous sacrilege, defiance of the Almighty and proclamation of contempt for Him, cheap, vulgar, common, flashy flippancy, of which the cheapest and commonest clown in the meanest of travelling side shows would be ashamed. They illustrate "progressive thought" by insults to the ordinary decencies and restraints of civilization at which the clown would balk. Manning, of the America, straining through cold and tempest for the lives of men he never had seen, his own life in jeopardy every second of a long two hours—strong, fearless, generous—called on God for help and told afterward of his dependence on God and gratitude to Him. Professor Barnes, secure and comfortable in his "job" at Northampton, speaks derisively of God as "the Celestial Papa" and declares his hope to "cut the girls of the college"—prospective mothers and guides of future American citizens, some of them, probably, descendants of strong people who dared and conquered wilderness and savage foes, trusting always in the help of God and who later faced and overcame the world's mightiest power in the Name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress—"loose from God's apron strings."

Aside from their persistent intrusions on public attention, the three learned professors require notice because of the "jobs" they hold, giving them influence on the minds of young women at an emotional and impressionable stage of life. No one of the three has exhibited qualities or capacities to make him important as a menace or serious as an offense in any other imaginable position. Let us view a little further the difference between the two groups and their respective claims on respect and emulation.

It is the difference between the high souled and the soulless. The sailors and the veteran have encountered and met triumphantly the realities and the real tests and stress of life, young as some of them, old as some of them, are, have proved themselves men. They know and obey their souls, following human, wholesome, natural, God-given instincts. As E. Stanley Jones, missionary to India, says in his recent book, "Christ at the Round Table", the human soul, like nature, abhors a vacuum; therefore seeks a God to worship, causes to love and strive for, good to do. Reaching always toward the great mysteries, the unseen and infinite and impenetrable, it attains heights of beauty and purity and nobility of hope and readiness for self sacrifice inconceivable to those choosing to grovel in materialism and dirt. The learned professors under discussion carefully direct their attenuated, shallow, "job" absorbed minds away from the soul and belief in it and from the God the soul craves. The human mind trained or torn from the soul is like a plant placed in a dark cellar. It may live, but its life is sickly, its growth is pallid and deformed, it is dull, coarsened, void of color and fragrance. Its fruit is fetid perversion, desire to destroy and debase, as the fruit of the strong, clean soul, growing in the light, is service and longing to build and to save.

According to the teachings of some of the instructors of youth at Smith College God is an illusion, patriotism is a lie, love of country and people a sham to be derided; womanly chastity a matter of personal preference and convenience. Professor Hankins sanctioned, if he did not originate, circulation among girls of his class in sociology of a questionnaire too indecent in suggestion and terms for publication in any family newspaper. President Neilson, addressing a pacifist organization, sneered at the salute to the flag and declaration of respect and fidelity to it in the schools, decried teaching of the greatness and power of this country and asserted that we would become "the most dangerous people in the world", as if we attained world power we could not be such good sports as to refrain from "betting on a sure thing". Americans may be very thankful that this president is not native here, but is an importation. This may explain his distrust and dislike of the American people and institutions; but, on the other hand, it seems that having become a naturalized citizen, as his supporters proudly announce, and having taken the oath of allegiance at ripe age and with full knowledge of facts and conditions, his detraction of country, people and government savor strongly of rather degraded hypocrisy, when he swore to respect and obey the constitution. Professor Barnes, of the same institution, told another pacifist gathering that George Washington fought in the Revolutionary War to retain land he owned in the West—an attribution of motive and estimation of ethics entirely and exactly appropriate for a learned citizen entrusted with the mental training of American young women and cheerfully intent on his "job". The same professor informed the same audience that President McKinley lied to the American people to force them into unjustifiable war with Spain. All three of these learned and improving persons hold their "jobs" and draw their comfortable salaries from money bequeathed by a pious New England woman whose will specifically provides: "All the education and discipline shall be permeated by the evangelical Christian religion."

Every dollar these men draw from the estate of the dead woman is a separate robbery, betrayal of trust, obtaining of money under false pretenses. Each drop of poison they instil in the minds of young women—poison of atheism, infidelity, disregard of the moralities and decencies, the obligation of citizenship and all that clean thinking Americans hold sacred—is a separate treason and violation of the laws of honesty and honor by which normal Americans are governed. It is acceptance by the heads of an educational institution in the United States of the ethics and methods of Soviet Russia, with which the president and professors have demonstrated many times their cordial sympathy, along with their admiration for Sacco and Vanzetti, the Italian anarchists and murderers.

The culminating demand for contempt for the Smith College authorities is given by an exhibition of pitiful but appropriate cowardice. A graduate of the college, of 1910, startled and dismayed by what she read of the utterances of the three self-advertising members of the faculty, wrote President Neilson, in February of 1928, asking, courteously, plain questions regarding his teachings and the doctrine taught at the institution and requesting plain answers. Neilson, the coward, lacked the courage to stand to his own declarations. "I do not think it wise to send you replies," he wrote. So every craven, feeling secure in his "job" and somehow convinced of immunity, meets challenge. President Neilson defies God and the instincts and traditions of the American people in his ambition to be classed as "liberal", but slinks and skulks abjectly from the straightforward call of one honest American women to declare his beliefs, and reveal his methods. Misusing the property and betraying the trust of a dead woman, he cringes before the protest of a living woman.

Belief in religion and the soul needs no stronger support than to stand these three professors of irreligion and no soul side by side with the sailors and the veteran. Look at them. Let the trustees of the college, whoever they may be, consider them and decide which are the better guides and teachers and exemplars for Americans of the future, for the descendants of the trustees themselves. Measure and compare. Fried and Manning gallantly fighting fearful storm to save lives. Byrd daring imminent death for one of his men. The venerable veteran and the thousands dead and hundreds living, North and South, with records like his made serving the causes they believed right. With them study the three learned professors.

The Southern Churchman began, months ago, warning to its readers to inform themselves of the institutions and faculties and influences asking to have young men and women entrusted to them. It continues that warning. This college at Northampton, under present management, illustrates the existence of insidious dangers, of sneaking attacks on the foundations of our civilization, government, laws and peace. There may be more to say presently of this institution and of others of like kind.

It is time that we have had examples of real Americans with souls and illustrating American traditions and faith to stand side by side with these pretentious exponents of "progressive thought" and its educational system. It is interesting and profitable to study the self-vaunting foes of religion along with the unpretentious, unheralded believers in religion and God. Put Neilson, Barnes and Hankins, Fried, Manning, Byrd and Stedman shoulder to shoulder. Compare them, what they have done, are doing, what they mean in and for the world, in the sight of mankind and for history.

Look at them!

Sounding Brass and Tinkling Cymbal

Perfect, puerile, pettyfogging prejudice and consummate condensed, concentrated self-conceit, ignorance and error of Editor Lewis Gibbs, of Staunton, so says The Southern Churchman.

"Now that the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion have been kept in the Revised Prayer Book and the Church saved by its friends, we can perhaps discuss one feature of the frenzied campaign to retain them. . . . We have been told that between thirty and thirty-five thousand laymen rallied to the call of the defenders of the faith and signed a memorial to the General Convention, asking that the Articles be retained in the Prayer Book. . . How many of the signers could say that they had ever read the Articles, and of those, how many that they understood them?

"We seriously question the propriety of any individual or organization going over the heads of the Parish Clergyman in an effort to secure names to a petition of this sort.

. . . . . .

"The Clergy are the official leaders in our Church and if any movement has to resort to an appeal over their heads to an uninformed constituency, it gives the impression that it is weak and is making its appeal to ignorance and prejudice.

. . . . . .

"We hold no brief for Anglo-Catholicism, although it has much to teach us if we would stop our imputations of bad faith long enough to listen, but we do object to the use of such tactics as was resorted to during the recent campaign to stir up the Church against the brethren of our own common household of faith."

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

II. KINGS.

Purpose.

The Spirit's design in writing the book of II Kings for us is to teach us typically the causes and results of the apostasy, or falling away from faith in God, of the professing church (1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Thess. 2:3-12; Heb. 4:11).

I. Chs. 1-13. "The light in a dark place" that shone through Elijah and Elisha, now shines into our hearts through the Word of God which gives us His counsels concerning past, present, and future (2 Peter 1:19; Isa. 61:1-3; 2 Cor. 4:6).

The light of God's will heeded makes possible a clearer knowledge of Himself and His plan for us in redemption John 16:13-15; Eph. 1:3, 17-19).

1. Ch. 1 to Ch. 2:11. The fire consuming Elijah's enemies and carrying him into heaven, pictures to us the Holy Spirit overcoming the power of Satan, sin, and self, and lifting us into the enjoyment of God's blessings in the heavenly places in Christ (Rom. 8:2; 1 John 4:4; 5:4; John 16:13-15; Eph. 1:3, 17-10).

2. Ch. 2:12 to Ch. 13. "The double portion" of the Spirit, is the portion of every member of "the Church of the first born". Through Spirit filled believers, God is giving a testimony of His grace and power in order to win unbelieving church members to faith in Christ (Deut. 21:17; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:14-22).

II. Chs. 14-17. Failure through unbelief and idolatry to enjoy God's blessings, gives Satan occasion to control, oppress, and lead into captivity those who may be known by the name of Christian (Matt. 5:13-16; Rom. 14:13; 2 Tim. 3:1-9).

1. Chs. 14-15. Divisions and conflict among those who profess the name of Christ not only leads to the sin of idolatry, but gives Satan opportunity to hinder God's purpose to bless and make His children a blessing (1 Cor. 1:10-17; 3:11-17).

2. Chs. 16-17. Satan and the world easily lead into captivity the one who professes the name of Christ, but who is not yielded to God to trust and obey Him (Rom. 12; 2 Cor. 6:17, 18).

III. Chs. 18-25. God's mercy and grace neglected or rejected leaves nothing but the wrath of God (John 3:36; Heb. 2:3).

1. Chs. 18-20. In sovereign grace, God raises up those to whom and through whom He can reveal Himself in order to lead His people into the enjoyment of His blessings (Phil. 2:19, 20; Col. 1:29).

2. Ch. 21. God's blessing upon Israel was always commensurate with the character of the king in power. The enjoyment of His blessings by the Church of Christ is dependent upon the character of those who stand in the place of leaders, pastors, and teachers (2 Peter 5:1-15; 1 Tim. 4:12-16).

3. Chs. 22-23. Spirit given revivals are always a testimony of God's overflowing blessing which His people have not enjoyed because of sin (1 John 3:21, 22).

4. Chs. 24-25. The destruction of Jerusalem, as a judgment from God, pictures the awful judgment which will surely come upon the apostate church, after the true Church has been caught up to meet her Lord and Bridegroom in the air (1 Thess. 4:13-18; Rev. 17).

SEMITIC EXAGGERATION

By the Reverend James W. Morris, D. D.

SUCH is the caption under which "Time", a well-known news weekly, comments on a New Commentary on the Scriptures, lately published in England. It is edited by Bishop Gore, considered the greatest theologian of the English Church. Collaborating in it, are some fifty brilliant scholars.

"Time" reports with great glee the wonderful findings of these supreme scholars in their study of the Old Testament. To them, the old book is a tissue of "Semitic exaggerations". David for instance did not kill Goliath. That feat was done by one Elhanan, as obscurely stated at 2 Samuel 21:19. The exploit is assigned to David to enhance his prestige! Also the account of Moses at Mount Sinai is another "Semitic exaggeration"; it was "probably (?) the hallucination of some one scared by a thunder-clap". The deluge is a "hysterical account" taken from stories of local floods in Babylon (hysterical as describing the stately story in Genesis! Wonderful scholarship!) These and much else, as "Time" enjoys telling us, are ascribed to the "well-known Semitic habit of exaggeration".

"Time" avers that such views have been held in advance Protestant circles for quite a hundred years, and are so trite and generally accepted that eminent Unitarian and liberal Protestant theologians are rather amused that such mighty English scholars should think it worthwhile to write heavy and learned books about them! Men who have long accepted a simple human Jesus, putting by all supernatural elements ever since the times of Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Payne, wonder at all this fuss about such to them old and established facts!

But what surprises is that when these ponderous thinkers come to the New Testament, they demand an entire change of front: they insist that here the miraculous account be accepted as overwhelmingly established.

They warn everybody, after having scrapped Moses and the prophets and after eliminating miracles from the Old Testament, not to dare impugn any of the great miracles that signalize the life and ministry of the Lord Jesus. They appear to think that their Olympian scholarship can make unbelief go so far and no further—believe and not believe as they dictate.

The Lord seems, indeed to afflict with a sort of wise insanity or insane wisdom men who undertake to correct and rewrite the Bible. For what wilder folly could be imagined than this notion that men may be taught to flout the Old Testament and its supernatural events, and yet at the same time believe in Jesus Christ and accept the witness of the apostles? The thing is absurd in face of the undoubted fact that both our Lord and His Apostles fully received the Pentateuch as God's revealed Word through Moses.

If our Lord knew what these modern scholars pretend to know as to the unreliable and indeed fraudulent character of these old writings, He most surely acted deceitfully in His use of them. If He did not know what these modern scribes say they know then neither can they nor anybody else accept His claim that the Father hath put all things into His hands. The profane folly of such a position makes one think of the terrible words at Ps. 2:4: for these wise men of our day bring upon themselves the open signs of divine derision.

And as our paper "Time" in its mocking way enjoys this wise foolishness of men sworn to defend the faith, it would seem well for Dr. Gore and his exalted colleagues to remember Romans 2:24.

But "Time" has something further to say—a something that should make us pause. It declares that the findings of these great English scholars came as a shock only "to fundamentalists of the evangelistic type, like John Roach Stratton, who insist that every phrase in the Bible is Gospel truth inerrant".

Passing by the old, old trick of damning a great truth by exaggerated mis-definition, ignoring the bitter gibe at Dr. Stratton and all evangelistic preachers, let us take such sneers of scoffers at the truth as a call to arms.

If believing that Moses, the friend of God, was the author of the first five books of the Bible, if accepting fully the historicity of the Old Testament miracles, if taking God's Word as really God's Word (as we ministers are sworn to do), and therefore just as true in its use and application as God is, if being assured that Christ Jesus knew and was fully aware of what He said when He declared that Moses wrote of Him and that Moses gave the law to the people, if that is to be fundamentalist and unscholarly and narrow, then let us accept the impeachment and rejoice in it—glad to be in the class with the Lord and His apostles. We remember the great words of St. Paul at 1 Cor. 1:20 to end. We who earnestly believe that the Word of God, and not the shifting sand of each wise man's experience or reason or scholarship, is the final test in religion and in morals, need to stand up fearlessly and be counted. If we are despised and belittled for Christ's sake, happy are we.

It is disturbing to be told, that "The Churchman" of New York thinks these views to be now almost universally accepted by the clergy of our Church. They do not proclaim these ideas, we are told, because they do not wish to disturb the simple faith of the pious old people of their congregations. But truth is truth, and always the best thing to proclaim. If the Old Testament is a tissue of "old wives' fables", the sooner the fact is known and declared, the better.

All evangelicals that are left should pray the Lord God that Jer. 5:30, 31 do not come upon us.

BUCHMANISM

Josiah R. Ellis

MUCH is being said and written at this time in Church conferences and the Church papers about this new cult now just rising over the Christian horizon. As usual, the pros and cons are giving vent to their views—those for it expressing themselves enthusiastically in its favour, while those opposed are as loud in their condemnation.

The middle grounders are perhaps nearer right, there are perils and dangers in its unguarded use and much good to come of it if used with proper safeguards.

Boiled down to its first analysis it seems to be held together by a "Mutuality of Confession", based on the Scriptural injunction, "Confess your faults one to another" (Jas. 5:6), and in this it seems to be well founded; but it will be readily seen, that with this wide latitude of thought and conduct, these confessions may easily stray into forbidden fields, as is charged has been the case; or, again, held in check by common sense and common decency much good may come to those engaged in it. From the published criticisms of this cult this seems to have been the case. The more radical seem to have taken up sexualism, which affords a fertile field for vileness and indecency, while the more conservative have used it for that honest confession, which is always good for the soul, meanwhile holding the exercise under proper control and in legitimate channels.

These published reports state that it was started by Dr. Buchman of the Lutheran Church (because he thought "the churches impotent to renovate lives"), by bringing together the young people in house parties, with both sexes present, out of which the intense adverse criticism may have arisen. And, indeed, the very word "house party" would invite criticism, since house parties have not always been free of criticism. However, latterly it seems, as the idea has developed, they meet now in groups of not more than twenty in each group, wherein the sexes are separated. This is manifestly an improvement, but even here it is fraught with danger and peril, unless held in check in proper channels by proper persons. One might ask in passing if this may not be the old Methodist Experience Meeting in a new guise. If so, unless carefully watched, it will go the way of the Methodist plan which had to be abandoned because of the egotism, exaggeration and "self-expression with nothing to express", which these meetings had engendered.

Since writing the above I have read the first of the two articles of the Rev. Sam Shoemaker (it is said that he likes to be called "Sam"), in which the cult is given the wider name of "The First Century Christian Fellowship". In reading the article one is struck with the evident saneness and sincerity with which the subject is approached and handled. Moreover, in reading the accounts recently appearing in The Southern Churchman of the practical manner in which his ideas are introduced by his helpers and workers, one is again struck with their saneness and may conclude that under his control and guiding hand, with God's blessing, much good and little harm may be done. But one wonders how long it will take to lose the individuality which is advocated when forty come together at one luncheon at one time?

What one would like to know is what is to become of these new converts in the future? How will he save them from the same fate that it is said befalls the Sunday converts? Does he hope that each one of them will become an active worker in this field of new experience? If so, is he not expecting more than the history of Christian movements generally justify? When one looks at the list of the Apostles, for instance, there is a wide difference in their field of operation of those who worked and, so far as the record goes, some who had no outward field at all to work in. Only four, the inner circle, were actively at work; then another four and then—the outer circle—the fringe, attaching to all circles of usefulness, in which was Judas, whom the Saviour sent to his own place. Then to fill the place lost by Judas in the Apostleship, Matthias was selected, which was the last we hear of him. He seemed satisfied, so far as the record goes, to get his name on the church books. Few, then, engaged in active work. But this may not indicate, nor do I mean to say, that they had no part in the spread of the Gospel, but that going back home and telling by their example of what the Lord had done for them as well as in prayer and meditation they did their part in their quiet way, to help along the Kingdom. If, then, the setters forth of this movement hope to have all of their converts at work actively, as seems to be their object and expectation, are they not doomed to disappointment? And may we not say, in passing, to those who are more or less downcast as they view the few of their own members who are actively at work that in reviewing the lives of the Apostles and the small numbers thus engaged that here is comfort for them? Though there may be only a few actively at work, back home they are taking their part in prayer and meditation, let us hope, in holding up the rectors' hands and helping to spread the Gospel.

Again, referring to "Sam's" article, as he iterates his "rediscoveries", it looks as if it is the Episcopal Church in action, and he is using in intense form what has always been known and used in the Church. In other words, the same convert, but a new or more active method. He gives six of these new or "rediscoveries", and conning them over we find three of them—Individuality, Sin and the All Sufficiency of Christ—emphasized over and over again in the Prayer Book with constant consistency; while the other three grow out of these and have their proper place with proper emphasis in the same Prayer Book.

This is no new thing, may I presume to assert, in the history of the Church, or experience of any man who has been for any length of time in the ministry. The fear is that "Sam", though he insists sincerely that he is working and using the individual, is consciously, or unconsciously, most probably the latter, driven along by mob psychology, which seems to do its work most perfectly in religious matters. It is to be hoped that he presents each of his converts with a Prayer Book with the General Confession marked that such convert may use what this Church has insisted on from the beginnings, whereby its adherents and followers have built up a character for honesty, probity and integrity which gives them in their community and in civic life generally a place in the esteem and confidence of the public far and away out of proportion to their numbers when compared with the other denominations.

To show that the arm of the Lord is not shortened and that He uses any and many means in the Bible and out of it to further His ends, and draw men into the Kingdom, provided those means are honest and honorable, I am giving two cases out of my own experience, though reluctantly injecting myself into this article, with the knowledge that many of the brethren in and out of "this Church" could duplicate them many times with slight changes in the circumstances. It will be noticed that they differ in every particular in the forming, but with the same result in the end—Confirmation.

I had not been in my first charge three months before I was mixed up in a street fight! Standing one day in the postoffice in the little town where I lived, I looked out of the window and saw a fight going on, in which one man was vigorously contending against three other burly men. Appealing to those standing by to go to the help of the man I was astonished to see fear depicted on each face and no man responded to the appeal. Meantime the man was being pressed down by two of the men, though he was contending to stay them, while the third man was pecking the poor fellow's head with a long handled hammer. I rushed out and into the scrimmage, though in no trim for a fight as I had on thick overshoes and a heavy overcoat, and caught one of the men by the nape of the neck and pulled him off, which gave the man a chance to assert himself. This he did vigorously, and soon gained his feet and went at once home, and the crowd took to cover. The man I had tackled came rushing up, insisting that I had kicked him in the face, and would have done me serious harm, no doubt, but for "ole Wash", my sexton, the only man who had not left me alone with this man. I found out that I had tackled the town gang which always did up the town when drinking, and seeing the man attacked, who was a drummer, had gone after him as stated. The result was that by my withstanding them the gang was broken up. One left the town and another one was singing in my choir in less than a month. The Mayor of the town, whom I had criticised publicly in his presence for the lenient sentence passed on these men, presented himself on Sunday morning for Confirmation at the next Visitation of the Bishop.

The other case, far different in every way from this one, was in another parish far away from this one. I had occasion in my parish work to stay at the house of a gentleman who was a communicant, but whose wife, though most attractive in many ways, was not a communicant, and there was, as I then thought, an insuperable barrier to her ever becoming one. To this home I went periodically for two years to meet this pleasant lady as hostess, wondering each time if I might not mention the subject of religion to her. One day, on one of these visits, I timidly asked her if I might talk the subject over with her. To my amazement, and no little chagrin she answered, I've wondered why you have never, in all this time, done so! With this opening we then and there began conversations that lasted over two years with no apparent success in coming to a conclusion, except that she said she would be confirmed if I told her to do so. This I, of course, declined to do, which I explained to her as out of my province, and must be decided by herself as God gave her guidance. So the matter stood till the Bishop's next Visitation when she told me if she might be baptized privately in the church she would be ready for confirmation when the Bishop arrived. She was so baptized. I shall never forget the calm and sweet repose that came into her face that blessed day to which all of her friends and myself had been anxiously looking. She was confirmed, and today, and ever since, she has been doing splendid work for the Church in one of its hardest special departments. The one brought about by a street fight, the other by a patient, prayerful waiting for four years and the results were the same—souls were brought into the Kingdom of God.

While, then, we may ask God's blessing upon this movement, we must at the same time remember that this has been going on in "this Church" all these years, and that the influence of its communicants as stated is far and away out of proportion (when numbers are compared), to the other denominations: that in the opinion of this writer it is not to be expected that every one shall be drafted to go out Rotarian-like as a "go-getter", but the quiet unobtrusive, prayerful life has its merited place in the Church; that this new cult's House Parties, which appear of the earth, earthy, seem to tie the movement to using the ways of the world in carrying out its high purpose and that comparing it to the Methodist movement of years gone by is like taking one of John Wesley's most sacred hymns and singing it to a jazz tune. In the words of another, "Repetition is better than effort; mastery, depends more upon doing things over and over again than in putting forth great effort." That is what "this Church" does through the Prayer Book with fine effect. We commend its way to those who claim to be doing such splendid work with "the First Century Christian Fellowship", and to those who think, perhaps, it might be an improvement on the Prayer Book way. Indeed, the slogan must be kept up now as heretofore—back to the Prayer Book.

WITH THE CRAIGHILLS AT NANCHANG

The Rev. Lloyd Rutherford Craighill, a native of Lynchburg, Virginia, and Mrs. Craighill, formerly Miss Marian Wakelee Gardner, have been in charge of the American Church Mission at Nanchang, Kiangsi, China, since 1918. Periodically they send a joint mimeographed letter to their various friends "back home", telling of their work in the mission field. The following letter is dated December 18 1928, from Nanchang, Ki., China:

Dear Friends Back Home:

In reading over our last Nanchang letter in order to get a point of departure for this new installment I am struck with the contrast in the situation which the intervening nine months have brought about. At that time I had just completed my first extended visit to Nanchang since the evacuation, and was quite conscious of being looked upon as a stranger if not as an intruder by many in that familiar city; now we are received in a much more friendly spirit. Then much of the mission property of Nanchang was occupied by soldiers; now they have all been cleared out. Then we were on the defensive in our church and school activities, merely trying to hold what we had; now we have begun to reach out into new fields again. Then our little family were sojourners enjoying the hospitality of our Shanghai friends; now we are once more comfortably settled in our own home with some chance of consecutive work.

Most of the revival of church life and the reaching out into new endeavors have been made possible by some of the recent additions to our staff. The Rev. Kimber Den, who has spent the past two years studying at the Virginia Seminary and General Seminary, has returned to us full of his former energy and optimism and eager to put to the test under Chinese conditions some of the ideas he has gathered while abroad. He is again in charge of St. Matthew's Church and school, while the Rev. Daniel Liu, who has stood by the ship so courageously during the past two years of rough weather, is now in charge of the work at the other compound across the city.

Mr. Den has revived the Wednesday night prayer and discussion groups, where the church members have a chance to express their needs and their experiences of the Christian life. In November we observed a special Prayer Book Sunday. Instead of the sermon there was given at the beginning of the service an address on the origin of the Prayer Book, and as the service proceeded, further explanations were made of the use and meaning of the various parts. The experiment has resulted in a more reverent and worshipful spirit in the service.

Another venture in connection with the school has been the establishment of a night school for working boys and illiterate men. Chinese language and arithmetic are taught by the voluntary services of some of our day school teachers and the older boys of our school. A similar class for boys and girls who have had no schooling is taught every afternoon by Miss Chang, the woman evangelist, over at the Langhorne Kindergarten.

Self-support, one of the topics before the Chinese Church these days, has come in for a share of attention at St. Matthew's, too. Under the leadership of Mr. Den the staff and congregation were organized with the objective of raising $150—and they raised $280. This may not seem much, but if you could know the poverty of most of our church members you would realize that this has meant real sacrifice. It is one index of the earnestness of the group.

For a long time we have felt the need of some one who could give special attention to work among young people, could organize the play life of our school boys and show them religious values in actual practice. Then there is that large group of government school students among whom we were doing hardly anything. This long-felt need is being met by Mr. Quentin Huang, who has just come back to China after reciving his B. D. from the Philadelphia Divinity School and an M. A. from the University of Pennsylvania. Already Mr. Huang has made a good beginning among our boys on the playground, and is building up a nucleus for a St. Andrew's Brotherhood as well. His skill in tennis and football are already opening to him the doors of several government high schools. Partly as the result of these contacts he and I have started an English Bible Class for government school students. Last Sunday morning the group who came to our home for this class had grown to twenty-five. I only have to think back to six months ago to realize how conditions have changed to make such a thing possible.

I am tempted to go on and tell you what the coming of Miss Margaret Monteiro has meant in the way of new beginnings, but that would infringe on Mrs. Craighill's field and I must leave that to her. But share with us our thankfulness for these new beginnings. It may be several years yet before we see very concrete results, but that doesn't so much matter so long as we are on the move once more in the right direction.

And here comes the lady of the house, or rather one of them, for I know Mary Katherine would dispute the title with me; and how tempted I feel to indulge in my all too ready verbosity and tell you just what has happened during these last two months. But I could use pages on a mere description of our descent from Kuling: babies, boxes, food, pussy cat, and all the rest of it; collecting more of our belongings at Kiukiang, piling up a freight car with our sixty-nine pieces plus those of the Allens of the "Y"; then both families with their retinue and Bishop Huntington all adding themselves to the remaining space in the above freight car and bumping and thumping and shaking out a very hot day of travel to Nanchang.

Finding a group of dear friends to meet us at the station was another experience as I began to realize that I was really home at last after a year and a half away.

The first weeks we lived at the Allen's with daily trips to our own house nearby, where we sorted out the most marvellous collections in store room and attic and cellar until our minds were almost paralyzed. The receipt for the plumb pudding I've just been making tells me to stir it for twenty minutes. I am confident our house was stirred continuously from our departure till our arrival, but the marvellous fact was that there was something there to stir! Almost nothing has been lost in all these months of absence. Unspeakably dirty the whole place was, and the furniture showed pretty hard usage by the officials who had occupied the place, but we didn't lose much. The painters and masons worked as zealously as we did, and now at this Christmas time we are rejoicing in a house which looks cleaner and fresher and more attractive than ever before, and in a nursery with just double the number of inmates it had in March of '27.

Of course, a reunited family in a home which we had thought we would probably never see again is reason enough for rejoicing, but Mr. Craighill has told you of some of our other causes for happiness as we look forward into the possibilities of the future. I am so glad he is letting me tell you about Miss Montiero, for it does mean so much to me personally to have her here this winter, while we are still without Deaconess Pitcher. Her years of work at Anking have made her able to get right into things without any preliminaries at all, and she has many fine ideas with all sorts of experience to help in carrying them out. She has started a flourishing Church School Service League among the younger school children, which meets Saturday afternoons, and which the youngsters adore, judging from the growth in two weeks from twelve members to forty-two. She and Miss Chang have a busy schedule which includes a weekly trip to the women's prison, where one of our church members is matron and where there is a warm welcome for them whenever they come. They discovered that seven of the women prisoners were entirely without bedding, and in danger of freezing to death this winter if nothing were done, so they raised a contribution from church members and their friends and have given a very practical demonstration of Christian service to those forlorn souls.

The kindergarten had just been started when we last wrote. Now it is well along in this second term, and is a very flourishing and attractive feature of our work. Our fine, capable teacher, Miss Fu, has remained and has a right to be very proud of the appearance of that attractive room and the courtyard full of sand and equipment for the children's play. The babies are most adorable. Little Lloyd is wild to join their ranks, though I consider three a little young for it.

The children are both well and are filling most of my time although I manage to get in to some part of almost everything that goes on. It is so good to get back and to find that there is a very genuine welcome for us, and more things for us to do than we can possibly hope to have time to accomplish. I continually marvel over the way this old city has come out of the horrors it went through with two years ago. It deepens one's faith in the endurance and pluck of these people, and the future which must lie ahead of them. Pray for us, especially that we may be able to meet this new day with fresh optimism and minds open to see new ways of approach. And thank God with us that there is so much life in the Church in China.

Book Reviews

HOW ONE MAN CHANGED THE WORLD: By the Rev. Ferdinand Q. Blanchard. Cloth. Pp. 130. Published by the Pilgrim Press, Boston, Mass.

A book designed to reveal in simple ways the life of our Lord to the mind of childhood. We are led through the marvellous life to the Cross. No attempt is made to explain the spiritual meaning of Calvary; nor is the resurrection in the last chapter most briefly mentioned explained as the secret of the transcending influence of the exalted life which has been the secret of the world's transforming. Perhaps the author felt it were better to hold simply to bare facts. No doubt it would lead to further inquiry on the part of the young minds which are affected by it. We may hope so. For to eliminate from the universal potency of our Lord, the germinal facts of His putting away sin and rising in power illimitable, from the grave to sit at the right hand of God, is to defeat the very primal essence of the Gospel. K. ETTING ACQUAINTED WITH GOD: By R. W. Barsow. Cloth. Pp. 115. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York City.

Another book for the young folks and a good one, too. A passage of Scripture, judiciously selected and with some brief explanation is followed by a prater fitting to the teaching. This would take but a few minutes after breakfast (or, if better, following the evening meal), and make God more close and real to the juvenile mind. Wanted: A father who will enter into this exercise. He will be amply repaid in spiritual dividends. K. M.

THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM: By Philip Mauro. Hamilton Bros., $1.20 Tremont Street, Boston.

When Evan Roberts was leading the revival that stirred Wales a generation ago, he said that his chief difficulty was with the saints. When he could get them stirred up like they should be he was successful in winning the outsiders to Christ. There seem to be any numbers of side pockets for unwary Christians to get settled in, where they may vegetate in quiet. John Wesley found that his converts were tempted by a certain group to an antinomian quiet, leaving zealous working to settle down with folded hands, content that they were saved.

The same temptation comes today. People who are great Bible students and earnest Christians are telling the new converts that the first three Gospels, the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Prayer are not for Christians; that once converted they may dismiss from their minds all danger of falling away, in spite of Christ's warning that every branch that beareth not fruit is cut off.

Mr. Mauro meets these novel views with the Bible properly interpreted, and in our judgment has proved his case. The book deserves a wide reading for it exposes the false teachings that are undermining the usefulness of many conservative teachers.

John Wesley found that he must preach the law to convict of sin and that after grace had made men whole, he must mix the preaching of grace in proper proportions with the new law of Christ in order to keep his new converts alive and growing. We commend Wesley's methods to those who wish to win men as he did. Mr. Mauro's book has done splendid service in preparing the way for a fresh revival by exposing the unscriptural teachings of those who are minimizing the law of Christ, and are lulling the consciences of converts with a low standard of Christian living. F. FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart," Ps. 119-11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by the Rt. Rev. James R. Winchester, D. D., of Little Rock, Arkansas:

> "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him" (1 John 4:9).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

"THIRTY-FIVE THOUSAND."

Mr. Editor:

Since writing you a few days ago relative to an article appearing in the "Southwestern Episcopalian", under the title "Thirty-five Thousand", in which the writer, who signs himself "G" (presumably the modernist, Rev. Lewis Gibbs), scores the action of the laity in circulating the recent memorial to the General Convention without first securing the permission of Parish Clergy, my attention has been further directed to an expression in that article which deserves notice:

> "We hold no brief for Anglo-Catholicism, although it has much to teach us if we would stop our imputation of bad faith long enough to listen."

What has "Anglo-Catholicism" to teach us? Faith in Jesus Christ, the Christian life, reverential worship, proper use of the Sacraments of the Church? Love of and charity towards our fellow man? Through study of God's Word and use of the Book of Common Prayer these things have all been taught for centuries before the "Anglo-Catholic", or "Back to Rome", movement was ever heard of.

What essential truth, then, has the "Anglo-Catholic" movement to teach us? Is it the Reservation and Adoration of the Sacrament? The doctrines of the Real Presence? The celebration of Masses? Worship or "Veneration" of so-called sacred images and relics? The doctrine of Purgatory? Prayers to the Virgin Mary? The thumbing of beads? Confession to a Priest and the imposition by him of the so-called "Sacrament of Penance" as a prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins and the Holy Communion? Excepting these doctrines and practices, has "Anglo-Catholicism" anything to teach beyond what God, through the Holy Scriptures, and the Church, through its Book of Common Prayer, have taught? If so, what is it? Protestant Episcopalians would like to know.

On the other hand, when "Anglo-Catholic" Clergy declare, as was done at the recent "Catholic Congress", that they do not intend to be bound by the legislation of any Convention in which the laity have the veto power (meaning thereby, of course, our General Convention), can they deny that they are disloyal to the Church which has ordained them? Can they deny that they are spreading anarchy and disloyalty in the Church?

When a Bishop or Clergyman takes a solemn oath to "banish and drive away all strange doctrine contrary to God's Word", meaning thereby God's Word as this Church has received the same, and then proceeds to preach and teach doctrines and observe ceremonies which this Church expressly repudiates, has he violated his ordination oath? Is he engaged in undermining its doctrine and worship? Have the laity no right to object to these things without first securing the permission of their Parish Clergyman to make the objection?

"Anglo-Catholics" have done many charitable works and may be entirely sincere in the view that they are doing God's Work in spreading Roman Catholic doctrines in the Church, but does the fact of their good works and of their sincerity justify their action in spreading disloyalty, discord and disruption in the Church? The leaders of the "Holy Inquisition" may possibly (?) have been sincere in their belief that they were doing God's Work in slaughtering hundreds of thousands of His servants because they would not accept the very doctrines which the "Anglo-Catholic" party is right now trying to foist upon this Church, but no bloodier page disgraces the history of mankind than the story of their proceedings.

No, if "Anglo-Catholicism" has anything worthwhile to teach, it will all be found within the covers of Holy Writ and of the Book of Common Prayer.

The principal products of the "Anglo-Catholic" movement are disloyalty, discord and disruption.

HAVE BEGUN TO BUILD.

Mr. Editor:

You kindly published some weeks ago, a notice of our plan to build a chapel at Stony Point, Albemarle County, Virginia. Many of your readers generously encouraged us with gifts in response to this notice, adding fifty dollars to our building fund. We should appreciate it if you could let these readers know that we have begun to build, that the cost will be $1,585, and that at this writing we are needing only $250 to complete the total amount.

AGGRAVATING.

Mr. Editor:

How aggravating the remarks of the Southwestern Episcopalian! If the laity have a vote, why may they not be "stirred up", to use it appropriately?

Many laymen may not have read the Thirty-nine Articles, but those who have, if of ordinary intelligence, find no difficulty in understanding them.

If some had not read them, all had been informed of their import.

Thank God, for one who could give a fitting answer to such remarks—for a David who lays low the giant (I read that at least modern giants are really weak physically) of false doctrine and disloyalty.

The laity are to submit to the rule of their ministers! Indeed! When they have no Episcopal Church to attend except where the incumbent teaches false and disloyal dogmas! Not Anglo-Saxon laymen; not spiritually-minded laymen.

In Christian fellowship,

CHRIST PREACHED OVER RADIO.

Mr. Editor:

One of our workers will prepare brief notices of the radio work from time to time. This radio work becomes increasingly necessary and we are seeing real results. We are getting letters from people who tell us that they want to be born again, and others from people who tell us that they have been born again, as a result of these messages. We have taken into our church membership on confession of faith a man who has not been in a church in twenty years, and another for twelve years. People in Illinois, Indiana, New York, etc., have been definitely reached by the Gospel who were outsiders before. We need definite prayer that Satan may not be allowed to attack us. He is the prince of the power of the air and does not want these messages going through His realm. My hope and prayer is that we will be able to increase the number of stations taking our broadcast. The Columbia chain offers us several supplementary services if we had the money to take them. For example, in your own territory we could have three more stations on our broadcast: Richmond, Norfolk and Asheville, at a cost of $180.40 per Sunday, but we have to wait until the receipts justify this expenditure. Gifts are coming in and the gifts are growing. There has been a steady climb until now we are receiving more than fifty per cent of our expenditure and these gifts come from all over the United States.

Contributions to this radio can be sent to the Tenth Presbyterian Church, Postoffice Box 2000, Philadelphia, Pa.

(Rev.) D. G. Barnhouse.

OLD CLOTHES DRIVE

Mr. Editor:

At this time may we announce to your readers the opening of an Old Clothes Drive on Monday, February 4, throughout the Episcopal Diocese of New York? The purpose of this drive to be conducted by the Episcopal City Mission Society is to secure good used or discarded clothing suitable for outfitting destitute men, women and children. Scores of stricken individuals are referred by this organization's chaplains in sixty-three hospitals, prisons and community centers, to the Relief Department at the Mission headquarters at 38 Bleecker Street.

Many are men and women just out of hospital wards, weakened from illness and without their old places of employment to which to return. Others are wives and children of prisoners and patients who have not had experience in getting along when the bread-winner is take from them.

Our Relief Department has constant call for clothing to meet emergency needs of those left suddenly stranded. Comfortable neat garments are an important help to any discouraged man or woman in seeking employment. At St. Barnabas' House, for instance, where the Society opens its doors day and night to women and children left suddenly homeless, we can never get as many contributions of women's and children's garments as we can use. Those who come to us for temporary shelter usually do so only after long periods of privation. Underclothing and shoes are probably our greatest need.

Indeed, we welcome all sorts of clothing, both used garments and new ones discarded for some reason. At our Goodwill Shops, 254 West One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Street, old garments in need of repair are turned over to handicapped workers who are able to earn their way mending and repairing these garments. In so doing these workers are given new self-respect and strength after periods of misfortune; and they are helping us to put clothing in shape for distribution among the needy.

Another need, greatly felt at this time, is for books of all kinds for our chaplains to distribute to children and adults in hospitals.

Many of the rectors in the churches are planning to receive clothing and book offerings from their Church Schools and Guilds for the City Mission Society in the next few days. All contributions should be sent to the churches and mailed or delivered from there to Mission headquarters at 38 Bleecker Street. Or a telephone call to Canal 6691 will bring the City Mission Society's Goodwill truck to churches in Manhattan and the Bronx, and by special arrangement in Westchester County. Because of limited truck facilities, collections cannot be made in other districts, but contributions will be welcomed at headquarters at any time.

Faithfully yours,

L. Ernest Sunderland,
Superintendent, New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society.

EDWARD FRANCIS ODLIN-SINCLAIR.

Mr. Editor:

There is a man who goes by the name of Edward Francis Odlin-Sinclair, who in the guise of a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, has been using the confidence placed in him by borrowing money and running up bills. This has happened recently in Rochester, London (Ontario), and Toronto.

Mr. Sinclair has been known to our Society the past year, and his story to us was that he had been ordained deacon in the Episcopal Church some twenty years ago in Boston. He admitted to us that he had never exercised his ministry. We have communicated with the Diocese of Massachusetts regarding Mr. Sinclair's ordination, and they report they have no such name in their ordination records.

Mr. Sinclair was in Rochester a few weeks this past fall and tried to borrow from us. We had known him here also a year ago. We have important information about him and will be glad to be consulted if the occasion warrants it. We believe that Mr. Sinclair's health is not good and, because of his uncertain health, that he should be protected from himself.

Mr. Sinclair is over six feet tall and weighs probably two hundred pounds. He is educated and well informed; and socially makes a good impression. He has a good deal of manner. At times he carries a walking stick. He is forty-eight years old and might possibly be taken for younger.

We, as a City Mission, are desirous of protecting Mr. Sinclair and eventually assisting him to regain his health. The situation is somewhat complex. We respectfully request any one who comes into contact with Mr. Sinclair to befriend him and to communicate with us.

Strongly advise against lending him money. There is no intention on our part to locate Mr. Sinclair because of his borrowings and any move on his part will be treated by us in strict confidence.

COUNCILS, CONVENTIONS, CONVOCATIONS

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Rev. C. E. Snowden, Executive Secretary of the Field Department of the National Church, addressing the Convention of Upper South Carolina at the night session on January 22, spoke of the work of the Field Department of the National Church, stressing especially the Campaign for St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo. He said this is one great expression of what the Church must do in meeting the problems before each population among whom she works. For that reason this effort of the Church is most important.

Announcement was made of a gift of $1,000 by Ex-Governor Manning to the Finlay Parish House at Clemson College.

Report was made of the efforts to raise money for the additional land as equipment for the Church Home Orphanage, an institution under the auspices of the Dioceses of South Carolina and Upper South Carolina. Upper South Carolina's original share was $7,500. This amount is reduced now to $1,482.47. The Committee hopes to raise this balance during the year.

The budget of the Diocese as presented by the Finance Department was adopted, including the full quota to the National Church.

The elections resulted as follows:

Members of Executive Council—Rev. H. D. Phillips, D. D., Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, Mr. W. S. Manning, Mr. W. B. Moore, Sr.

Standing Committee of the Diocese—Rev. A. R. Mitchell, Rev. H. D. Phillips, D. D., Rev. T. T. Walsh, D. D., Rev. M. S. Taylor, Rev. L. N. Taylor, Messrs. J. N. Frierson, R. I. Manning, W. B. Moore, Jr., Jas. S. Middleton and F. P. Henderson.

Trustees Church Home Orphanage—Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, Rev. M. S. Taylor, Rev. H. D. Phillips, D. D., Messrs. W. B. Moore, Sr., R. L. Manning, Carl Hart and M. C. Heath.

Trustees of the Diocese—Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, Rev. Wm. Johnson and Mr. John P. Thomas, Jr.

Trustees of Voorhees Industrial School—One year, Rev. G. Croft Williams, Messrs. W. W. Long and R. I. Manning; two years, Rev. J. B. Elliott, Mr. John Ramey and Mrs. Jas. R. Cain; three years, Rev. H. D. Phillips, D. D., Mr. W. B. Moore, Sr., and Mrs. Joseph E. Hart

Trustees of St. Mary's School—Rev. T. T. Walsh, D. D., Rev. Wm. Johnson, Mr. J. N. Frierson and Mr. E. R. Heyward.

Delegates to Synod—Rev. Capers Satterlee, Rev. M. S. Taylor, Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, Rev. H. D. Phillips, D. D., Rev. T. T. Walsh, D. D, Rev G C. Williams. Lay, Messrs. E. R. Heyward, W. S. Manning, J. W. Arrington, Jr., J. E. Hart, B. H. Lumpkin and O. F. Hart.

Alternates—clergy, Rev. A. G. B. Bennett, Rev. T. P. Noe, Rev. W. P. Peyton, Rev. S. Thorne Sparkman, Rev. R. C. Topping and Rev. C. P. Holbrook; lay, Messrs C. G. Gunter, F. L. Munson, B. F. Alston, Jr., Rhett Martin, L. H. Cary and George Huggins.

At the meeting of the Executive Council, held immediately after the Convention, the chairmen of the different departments were elected as follows:

Missions—The Rev. A. R. Mitchell, Greenville, S. C.

Field—The Rev. Henry D. Phillips, D. D., Columbia, S. C.

Finance—Hon. R. I. Manning, Columbia, S. C.

Religious Education—Mrs. Alexander Long, Rock Hill, S. C.

Christian Social Service—The Rev. L. N. Taylor, Columbia, S. C.

Publicity—The Rev. M. S. Taylor, Greenville, S. C.

ARKANSAS.

The Convention of the Diocese of Arkansas met in Helena, in St. John's Church, January 16.

The clergy were in vestments and Bishop Green, of Mississippi, preached the sermon. At the same service the Bishop's address was read. Bishop Winchester has been ill for about eighteen months and was represented by the Suffragan-Bishop E. W. Saphore.

Bishop Green spoke again in the evening. His general subject was Rural Work of the Church. He stressed the need of such work for the good of the people who live in the country, and also for the constant building of the Church. First, because of the constant inflow of country folk into the city; and next, because the majority of our bishops and clergy are country-bred and country-raised. It has been our weakness that the country has been neglected.

A joint meeting of the Convention and the Woman's Auxiliary was held on the second day of the Convention. Splendid work had been done by the women. The Helen-Dunlap School for Girls at Winslow had been assisted to the extent of $2,000.

The women were interested in getting the diocese to adopt this School for Mountain Girls as their special work; and to urge the Seventh Province to adopt it as the Provincial School which they have in mind to establish.

The Convention will meet next year in St. John's Church, Fort Smith.

The Auxiliary elected as President, Mrs. Hanson A. Stowell, of Pine Bluff.

The Standing Committee elected is as follows—Clergy, Rev. Hanson A. Stowell, Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, Rev. C. C. Burke, Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin and Rev. Simpson-Atmore; lay, Messrs. Robert E. Lee, D. Cantrell, C. L. Polk, C. Hart, Cad Polk, Jr., and A. C. Turner.

Mr. T. E. Wood, of Little Rock, Ark., was elected Secretary.

Mr. S. A. Pernot was elected Treasurer.

NORTH TEXAS.

The Nineteenth Annual Convocation of the Missionary District of North Texas was held in St. Paul's on The Plains, Lubbock, the Rev. L. G. H. Williams, minister-in-charge, January 20-22, beginning with a Corporate Communion at 10:30 Sunday morning. The Rev. A. E. Whittle, of San Angelo, preached Sunday night. Reports showed an increase of fifty per cent in baptisms over the previous year, and twenty-five per cent increase in confirmations, with a total net increase in communicants of eight per cent. There were seventy-seven baptisms, one hundred and three confirmations, and a net increase of one hundred and twenty-three communicants, the total now being 1,571, whose names are known. For the first time in its history the District reported at one time a postulant, a candidate and an ordination. The Church Program quota, District and National, for maintenance and advance work, was paid, and every parochial and mission report was submitted to the Bishop in time to be included in a tabulation that was presented to the Committee on the State of the Church at the opening session.

The Rev. C. Leslie Glenn addressed Convocation on the Church's opportunity in the State Colleges. Dr. P. W. Horn, President of Texas Technological College at Lubbock, spoke on what the Church can do for the State College Mrs. Henry S. Gooch, President of the District Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, spoke to a crowded evening session in the Church on "The Call of Christ", or personal evangelism. Miss Ruth Rix, District Educational Secretary, led the joint session in a discussion of The New Africa, and notes on Bishop Campbell's lectures at General Convention. Clerical and lay deputies made full reports on General Convention. Bishop Seaman said: "Our Church's financial problems must be solved at the altar. The priest who habitually disregards the Church's instruction to receive the alms of the people and reverently place them on the Holy Table (especially at the time of the Communion) is teaching his people to disregard God's whole plan for sacrificial giving, and is undermining the support of his Church's program. . . . All systems of Church finance are but futile 'get-rich-quick' schemes or temporary emergency methods, unless they are built upon the principle of Christian stewardship and God's universal and unrepealed law of tithing."

"I am glad that General Convention did what nearly 34,000 petitioners asked namely, retained in Prayer Book the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, those landmarks of our Protestant heritage, together with the ancient characteristics of our liturgy that express so beautifully the apostolic and truly universal conception of the Holy Catholic Church as the Communion of Saints, the fellowship of all baptized believers in Jesus Christ, the Virgin-Born Son of God, the Divine Son of Man, the Incarnate Word of God, the Christ of the Scriptures and the Saviour of the World."

The Twentieth Convocation and Annual Meeting of the District Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary will be held in Amarillo next January, and a definite program of twenty items was set as a goal for the year.

There was a splendid Blue Box pageant, motion picture of Church activities, offering for the endowment fund: St. Luke's, Tokyo; a summer conference scholarship, and for the fund to train a young woman of the District for mission work.

SOUTH FLORIDA.

Callng attention to the completion of the work of Prayer Book revision, Bishop Mann, in his annual address to the Convention of the Diocese of South Florida, in St. Luke's Church, Fort Myers, January 22-24, reviewed the history of the development of the Anglican liturgy, pointed out the unique position the Prayer Book occupies among the great liturgies of the Church Catholic, and urged renewed loyalty to it on the part of clergy and laity.

Sessions of this Convention were largely occupied with routine business and reports. Confirmations during 1928 were eight hundred and thirty-five, the largest number in the history of this diocese. Sixty-six clergy, including the Bishops, were reported as canonically resident, with six others officiating by permission. St. James' Church, Leesburg, was admitted as a parish, and the organization of two new missions—St. Monica, Stewart and The Holy Comforter, Okeechobee, were reported.

Bishop Wing told of the vast damage to Church property by the hurricane of September 16, and of funds secured for rebuilding. The following expression of thanks was adopted by rising vote:

Resolved, That the Annual Convention of the Diocese of South Florida expresses its profound appreciation and grateful thanks to all those who have made such generous contribution to the fund for the work of restoring the property of the Church in this diocese, damaged and destroyed by the hurricane of September, 1928. We would mention especially the General Convention which authorized the special offering for our relief; the National Council for giving this appeal publicity, and for handling the funds thereby received; to the Woman's Auxiliary for their splendid special gift of $5,000 (for rebuilding St. Paul's Church, Delray Beach), and to The Living Church for its timely aid and assistance in voicing our distress immediately following the storm, and for receiving and forwarding from its readers the contributions for the work of rebuilding.

Bishop Wing mentioned the fine summer camp held by the Young People's Service League last June as being the "Greatest combination of work, worship and fun that could be imagined", adding that "Next to our Church Schools and regular pastoral work of instructing our children in the doctrine, discipline and worship of our Church, I know of no other organization which is doing more to build the future of Church and State in South Florida than is the Y. P. S. L.".

Addresses by the Rt. Rev. N. S. Thomas, D. D. (formerly Bishop of Wyoming and now in charge of Bethesda Church, Palm Beach), and by the Rev. Walter E. Bentley, of Long Island, now serving as Diocesan Missioner, were given at a mass meeting.

Elections resulted as follows:

Secretary, Ven. Jas. G. Glass, D. D.; Treasurer, John W. Claussen; Actuary, Ven. Jas. G. Glass, D. D..

Standing Committee—Rev. G. I. Hiller, Rev. W. G. Clark, Rev. Mortimer Glover, T. W. Bethea and B. F. Whitner.

Executive Board (to serve three years)—Rev. W. G. Clark, Rev. F. B. Leach, J. H. Carter and Horace Van Metre.

Deputies to Provincial Synod—Rev. Messrs. Walker, Hiller, Weller, Young, J. M. Taylor and Thos. Dyke; Messrs. H. F. Slater, W. E. Tylander, D. P. Street, S. B. Jennings, W. S. Merritt and Baxter Goodlett.

Alternates: Rev. Messrs. Glass, Phillips, Clark, Marsden, Cadman and Scriven; with Messrs. Hankin, Caldwell, Berg, Jennings, McCrory and Jewett.

Clerical Trustee, University of the South—Ven. Jas. G. Glass, D. D.

Commission on Evangelism—Rev. Messrs. W. P. S. Lander, J. M. Taylor, C. R. Palmer, R. D. Tracy and G. D. Scriven, with M. O. Nace.

Invitation from Holy Cross Parish, Sanford, for the Convention of 1930 was accepted and the opening date set for January 21. This complies with the ten-year schedule of Convention cities as adopted by the Convention of 1928.

Interesting meetings of the Church Service League and of the Young People's Service League were held in connction with this diocesan convention.

MICHIGAN.

The Ninety-sixth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Michigan, the Ninth Annual Convention of the Michigan House of Churchwomen, and the Annual Meeting of the Michigan Woman's Auxiliary were held concurrently at All Saints' Church, Pontiac, Michigan, January 29, 30 and 31. Over four hundred delegates enjoyed the unusual facilities of Stevens Hall, the splendid new parish house of All Saints' Church. In his episcopal address the Rt. Rev. Herman Page urged on the diocese a careful study and loyal use of the Revised Book of Common Prayer, and gave a useful and instructive dissertation on the whole subject of present-day public worship. In the Diocesan Convention a budget of $170,000 was adopted for 1929. Elections and appointments were as follows:

Standing Committee—Revs. W. D. Maxon, W. Woodroofe, A. S. Gill, S. S. Marquis; Messrs. F. J. Weber, Dudley W. Smith, Sidney T. Miller, George W. Patterson.

Executive Council (new members, elected for three-year period): Revs. Charles L. Ramsay, W. R. Kinder, R. E. Charles; Messrs. A. D. Jamieson, W. W. Smith, John Fry.

Delegates to Synod of Province of Mid-West—Revs. H. J. Pearson, Francis B. Creamer, Leonard P. Hagger, Henry Lewis; Messrs. Geo. T. Hendrie, F. J. Weber, Henry Scripps Booth, E. E. Piper.

Trustees of the Diocese—The Bishop; Messrs. L. H. Paddock, W. T. Barbour, F. J. Weber, Geo. T. Bahl, Dudley W. Smith, J. H. McDonald, A. B. C. Hardy, D. P. Sullivan.

In the Convention of the House of Churchwomen a thorough conspectus of the Church's program was presented by many able speakers. The high lights were the addresses by Bishop Gray, of Northern Indiana, and Mrs. Allan McGregor, of the Diocese of Southern Ohio. Officers were elected as follows: President, Mrs. C. E. Heal; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. E. M. Sweitzer, Miss E. S. Mershon and Mrs. Clarke E. Baldwin; Treasurer, Mrs. W. B. Taylor; Recording Secretary, Mrs. F. W. Haines; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Molby G. Stewart.

Committees—Department of Missions, Mrs. Charles B. Warren; Religious Education, Mrs. C. R. Mabley; Social Service, Mrs. J. R. Sutton; Parochial Organization, Mrs. J. S. Grantham; Nominating, Mrs. F. W. Baeslock.

Officers of the Woman's Auxiliary—President, Mrs. Charles Beecher Warren; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. James Benedict, Mrs. Charles W. Thomas, Mrs. Joseph R. Appelbe, Mrs. Walter C. Chaffee and Mrs. S. Arthur Fuller; Supply Work, Mrs. W. F. Duncan; Recording Secretary, Mrs. Susie Bishop; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. John T. Shaw; Treasurer, Mrs. Edward L. Warner; United Thank Offering Treasurer, Miss Sarah Sly; Director Church Periodical Club, Miss Delia Warriner; Supervisor Church School Service Program, Miss Edith H. Maurice.

A great feature of the Convention was a banquet attended by nearly four hundred, addressed by the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs. After the address a six-reel film, descriptive of the varied activities of the diocese, was shown.

FLORIDA.

The closing words of Bishop Juhan's address, delivered to the opening service of the Eighty-sixth Annual Council of the Diocese of Florida, held in Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, on Wednesday, January 23, are prophetic of the spirit evinced and of the business reported and transacted throughout the two days of this Council:

"Five Councils I have addressed you and you, no doubt, have caught a very definite similarity in the thoughts I have most pressed upon you—Personal Service and Missions. I will be unworthy, and unfit to lead you, when I ever cease to be loyal first to those two commands, 'Andrew first found his own brother'. 'Go ye into all the world'. Every preachment and every parish activity should be subordinate to, or the means to, those two ends, or fail in our paramount duty as a Priest in the Church of God, or as a soldier and servant of Jesus Christ."

The fear of some that the attendance would fall off, owing to the Council's being held in January, instead of the spring as formerly, was proved unwarranted, for the attendance was larger than usual, all but two of the clergy being present—and they were prevented from coming because of sickness—and about the usual number of parishes and missions sending deputies.

This diocese's national quotas have been paid in full, before the years closed, for the past three years. In spite of a probable deficit in the Diocesan Budget for 1929, the Council passed the following resolution:

"It is the sense of this Council that the scale of salaries of missionaries and student workers, and the item for the quota to the National Church remain intact in the Diocesan Budget."

Looking forward to the elimination of this possible diocesan deficit, the Rev. Newton Middleton offered a resolution providing for a supplementary canvass throughout the parishes and missions of the diocese and urging that the utmost effort be made on the part of the clergy and laity to secure one hundred per cent pledges for the diocesan budget of $42,118.03 before February 15. This resolution was also unanimously adopted.

The chief speaker at the annual diocesan banquet, held at the Thomas Hotel, on Wednesday evening, was the Rev. Louis G. Wood, one of the Secretaries of the Field Department of the National Council. Mr. Wood made a strong and impassioned appeal for the continued support of the National Program and a general response to the appeal for St. Luke's International Hospital on the part of the Diocese of Florida. A resolution was passed that offerings be taken for St. Luke's International Hospital throughout the Diocese on Quinquagesima Sunday, or the nearest possible Sunday thereafter.

The University of the South was represented by Dr. Henry M. Gass, professor of Greek in that institution, who brought a strong and impelling message on the subject of University Extension.

Student work at the two State institutions of Florida received their usual appreciation.

The diocese is now engaged in a campaign to raise $60,000 to build and equip a chapel at the University of Florida in memory of the late Bishop Weed, and a student center at the College for Women, in order that Miss Baskette, the student worker, can make even more adequate contacts with her girls. Judge Benjamin A. Meginnis, of Tallahassee, is the chairman of this campaign, which is to be pushed vigorously this current year.

The Department of Religious Education, under the leadership of its chairman, the Rev. Ambler M. Blackford, of Jacksonville, is very active. National Accredited Teachers' Associated classes have been conducted in Christ Church, Pensacola, Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, Camp Weed and St. John's Church, Tallahassee. There are now one hundred and five persons in this diocese who hold one or more of the N. A. T. A. Credits, and the number is growing constantly.

The long familiar face and form, and influence of Colonel William Wade Hampton, honored and beloved Vice-Chancellor of the Diocese, who was called to the higher service of his God in the late fall of 1928, was greatly missed. A tablet was unveiled to his memory, in Holy Trinity Church, at the early service on the second day of the Council and several suitable resolutions were adopted in gratitude of his life and service.

The Eighty-seventh Annual Council will meet in January, 1930, exact date to be named by the Bishop, in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, the Rev. Charles A. Ashby, rector.

Elections were as follows:

Vice Chancellor (to succeed the Hon. Wm. Wade Hampton)—Mr. Raymond Demere Knight, Jacksonville.

Standing Committee—President, the Rev. Louis Fitz-James Hindry, B. D., St. Augustine; the Rev. Harris Mallinckrodt, Fernandina; the Rev. George E. Benedict, Apalachicola; Mr. George C. Bedell, Jacksonville; Mr. George W. Thomas, Jr., Jacksonville; Judge S. D. Clarke, Monticello.

Executive Council—The Rev. Messrs. Fitz-James Hindry, Ambler B. Blackford, Wm. S. Stoney, G. Hendree Harrison, D. D., Francis B. Wakefield, Jr., Charles A. Ashby, Newton Middleton, Wm. Jeffery Alfriend; Colonel C. F. Layton; Judge Ben. A. Meginniss; Messrs. Frank P. Dearing, B. Kemp Hall, Frederick S. Vaill, Ben F. Trenary; Miss Margaret G. Weed.

Delegates to the Synod of the Province of Sewanee—The Rev. Messrs. Francis B. Wakefield, Jr., Wm. S. Stoney, Ambler M. Blackford, Newton Middleton, Douglas B. Leatherbury, Wm. Jeffery Alfriend; Messrs. A. M. Glass, Fred S. Vaill, George W. Mills, Fred J. Hampton, Frank P. Dearing; Judge W. K. Hyer.

Alternates—The Rev. Messrs. Melville E. Johnson, T. T. Pollard, Basil M. Walton, Edward McC. Claytor, John B. Matthews, Carroll L. Bates; Messrs. B. W. Helvenston, Sr., J. D. Russell, Herbert Lamson, L. A. Smith, L. L. McKinnon, J. G. Home.

Mrs. Wm. P. Cornell.

ATLANTA.

The new Dean of St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta, Ga., the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, preached the sermon at the preliminary service of the Twenty-second Annual Council of the Diocese of Atlanta, held in Christ Church, Macon, Georgia, Tuesday night, January 22, 1929.

The Council opened its session on Wednesday with a Corporate Communion for the Council and the Woman's Auxiliary of the diocese. At this service the Bishop read his annual address, making special reference to the recent assuming of the See of Canterbury by the new Archbishop.

The Rev. F. H. Harding was reelected Secretary of the diocese, and the Rev. J. D. C. Wilson was made assistant secretary.

Some of the special committees appointed were: The Committee for St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. W. W. Memminger, D. D., S. Alston Wragg, Cyril E. Bentley, H. F. Saumenig, the Messrs. David Woodward, William Parker, Jr., Col. Z. D. Harrison, D. C. L., and Dr. Thos. H. Hancock.

The Special Commission on Evangelism consists of the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, the Rev. G. W. Gasque, the Rev. T. N. Lawrence, Messrs. W. W. Davison, W. G. Hastings and the President of the Woman's Auxiliary, Miss Theo Tinsley; Mrs. Edward Warner, Diocesan President of the Daughters of the King, and Mr. Pearce Baker, President of the Diocesan Y. P. S. L.

The following were made Examining Chaplains: The Rev. Messrs. A. G. Richards, D. D., N. R. High Moor, the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies and H. F. Saumenig.

At the special service, Wednesday evening, the Rev. H. W. Foreman, Director of Rural Work, National Council, made a stirring plea for increased interest of the Church in her Rural Work, particularly stressing the work that can be done by the laymen of the Church.

Mr. Robert S. Barrett, of the National Council, a layman, giving much of his time in the interest of the National Council Program, gave an account of the history and the campaign now on for St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo. Bishop H. J. Mikell expressed the hope that the Diocese of Atlanta would have her part and share in this great work.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

Chancellor, Registrar, Treasurer and Treasurer of the Nation-Wide Campaign reelected.

Trustees of the Weston Bequest—The Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, the Rev. Messrs. W. W. Memminger, D. D., N. R. High Moor, S. Alston Wragg and Messrs. W. G. Hastings, John Hancock, Dr. Robt. C. Alston and Dr. G. H. Noble, Sr.

Cathedral Board of Trustees: The Rev. Russell K. Smith, the Rev. Charles Holding, the Rev. L. W. Blackwelder and Judge E. E. Pomeroy; Messrs. T. V. Kell and E. B. Willingham.

Standing Committee — The Rev. Messrs. S. Alston Wragg, W. W. Memminger, D. D., Cyril E. Bentley and Dr. G. H. Noble, Sr., Judge E. E. Pomeroy, and Col. Z. D. Harrison, D. C. L.

The Rev. Messrs. S. Alston Wragg, Cyril E. Bentley and Mr. H. A. Coles were elected members of the Executive Board, together with the President of the Woman's Auxiliary, Miss Theo. Tinsley, to fill the places made vacant by rotation.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod—The Rev. Messrs. W. W. Memminger, D. D., Cyril E. Bentley, G. W. Gasque, D. D., Raimundo de Ovies and Russell K. Smith. Alternates—The Rev. Messrs. F. H. Harding, W. W. Sillman and S. Alston Wragg. Lay Delegates—Messrs. O. A. Coleman, Mac D. Dexter, R. A. Palmer, Dr. E. B. Pusey, Wm. Parker, Jr., and Dr. Geo. H. Noble, Sr. Alternates—Messrs. Paul Johnson, Jr., Robert Walker and Sam W. Good.

Trustees of the Appleton Church Home— Rev. Cyril E. Bentley, T. N. Lawrence, Mr. S. T. Coleman, Sr., and Mrs. Russell K. Smith.

The matter of insurance for the clergy of the diocese was presented by Mr. R. A. Palmer, and a resolution was passed favoring the plan of parishes carrying insurance in addition to the Pension Fund for their clergy. Mr. David Woodward presented the method of group insurance as a possible way and very generously offered to pay the entire premiums on a $1,000 policy of the clergy for one year if the plan could be worked out. This was referred to a special committee.

Prof. Emory Gass, representing the University of the South at Sewanee, was a visitor and addressed the Council.

On motion it was decided that hereafter the expenses of delegates attending the Council should be met by the parishes which they represented. This seems to have become necessary on account of the size of the Council and the difficulty in entertaining it.

An important matter presented for the consideration of the Council was the necessity of a student pastor at the University of Georgia, at Athens. Dr. A. G. Richards, rector of Emmanuel Church, Athens, spoke of this need and a special committee, consisting of the Bishop of the Diocese of Atlanta and Dr. Richards was appointed to confer with the Bishop of Georgia to see whether such a plan could be worked out.

The next Council will meet in All Saints' Church, Atlanta, January 22, 23, 1930.

Church Intelligence

Campaign Launched For St. Luke's, Tokyo.

Holding first place in the interest of our Church in the United States at present is the campaign which is being conducted to raise $2,656,500 for a modern, fully equipped building for St. Luke's International Hospital and College of Nursing, Tokyo, Japan. The General Convention gave full endorsement to the plans when presented before it in October. Although some pledges were received before, the real campaign began with Epiphany. The subject has been brought up before the diocesan councils and conventions meeting during January, and the diocesan publications add their petitions for generous contributions to this work, by many considered the greatest missionary effort of the Church today. Eight hundred thousand dollars has already been secured. The business men of New York have pledged $1,000,000. The Honorable George W. Wickersham is chairman of the General Committee.

Mrs. Henry P. Davison is head of the women's committee. The campaign to raise a "women's million" was launched February 2 at a luncheon at the Waldorf Hotel, New York City. Over one thousand women, most of them of the the Protestant Episcopal Church, were present. Mrs. Woodrow Wilson was guest of honor. Mr. Wickersham and Dr. Rudolf Bolling Teusler, director of the hospital, were speakers. Dr. Teusler has devoted twenty-seven years to St. Luke's. Of the nearly quarter of a million dollars he has made from private practice all of it has been turned in to the hospital.

Evangelism.

The National Commission on Evangelism, of which the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina, is chairman, is inaugurating a nation-wide crusade. Bishop Murray, acting by authority of the General Convention, has appointed the following seventy clergymen as missioners:

First Province—Rt. Rev. Samuel B. Booth, Rev. Spence Burton, S.S.J.E., Rt. Rev. John T. Dallas, Rt. Rev. Frederic S. Fleming, Rev. Henry Hobson, Rev. Arthur L. Kinsolving, Rev. John M. McGann, Rev. Norman B. Nash, Rev. Anthony R. Parshley, Rev. Lyman H. Rollins.

Second Province—Rev. Donald B. Aldrich, Rev. Walter E. Bentley, Rev. Frederick T. Henstridge, Rev. Shirley C. Hughson, O.H.C., Rt. Rev. George A. Oldham, Rev. George L. Richardson, Rev. George A. Trowbridge.

Third Province—Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, Rev. Chas. E. Eder, Rev. John Gass, Rev. Churchill J. Gibson, Rev. Edgar Jones, Ph.D., Rev. Charles E. McAllister, Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, Jr., Rt. Rev. John C. Ward, Rev. Dennis Whittle.

Fourth Province—Rt. Rev. Theodore D. Bratton, Rev. Charles Clingman, Rev. Frank D. Dean, Rev. Raimundo deOvies, Rev. G. M. Gasque, Rt. Rev. William M. Green, Rev. Robert J. Murphy, Rev. James Owens, Rt. Rev. Edwin a Penick, Rev. Henry D. Phillips, Rev. Julius A. Schaad, Rev. Richard Wilkinson, Rt. Rev. John D. Wing.

Fifth Province—Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, Rt. Rev. Campbell Gray, Rt. Rev. Benjamin F. Ivins, Rev. Stephen E. Keeler, Rev. Alfred Newberry, Rev. Kirk B. O'Farrell, Rev. Geo. Craig Stewart, Rev. F. E. Wilson.

Sixth Province—Rev. Robert B. H. Bell, Rt. Rev. Granville G. Bennett, Rev. Fred W. Clayton, Rev. Don Frank Fenn, Rt. Rev. Herbert H. H. Fox, Rev. Thos. J. Haldeman, Rev. Paul Roberts, Rev. Frederick D. Tyner, Rev. Z. T. Vincent.

Seventh Province—Rev. Karl M. Block, Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, Rt. Rev. Thomas Cassady, Very Rev. Robert S. Chalmers, Rev. William Garner, Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, Rt. Rev. James Wise.

Eighth Province—Rt. Rev. Middleton S. Barnwell, Rev. Harry Beal, Rt. Rev. Edward M. Cross, Rt. Rev. Thomas Jenkins, Ven. A. W. N. Porter, Rt. Rev. William P. Remington.

Some of these men have already begun conducting missions.

Bethlehem Conference.

The "Bethlehem Conference on the Mystical Element in the Christian Faith", will be held Monday, February 11, in the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, Pa. This conference is under the auspices of the Confraternity of the Mystical Life. All interested are cordially invited to attend.

Dean Gateson will entertain all who desire to spend the night in Bethlehem. Those planning to come should notify him (Very Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, Third and Wyandotte Streets, Bethlehem, Pa.), at the earliest possible moment, and before February 8, of their desire for entertainment (1) at luncheon; (2) at supper; (3) over night.

The Pro-Cathedral is only a step from Union Station, Bethlehem, so trains will not be met by automobile unless specially requested.

Bishop of Lexington Elected.

The Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., has been elected Bishop of the Diocese of Lexington, Kentucky, and has accepted the call. Dr. Abbott will succeed the Rt. Rev. Lewis W. Burton, who resigned October 16, 1928.

Bishop Burton faithfully served this diocese as its first bishop from the time of his consecration in 1896. He is now seventy-six years old.

Dr. Abbott was born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, July 11, 1881. He came to this country in 1914 to serve as Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio. He was rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, Maryland, from 1919 until a recent call to St. Chrysostom's Church, Chicago.

The bishop-elect is the author of several books, "Help From the Hills," "The Man Outside the Church, and Other Sermons," "Sparks From a Parson's Anvil" and "The Religion of the Tommy."

COLLECT FOR QUINQUAGESIMA SUNDAY.

O Lord, Who hast taught us that all our doings without charity are nothing worth; send Thy Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of all virtues, without which whatsoever liveth is counted dead before Thee. Grant this for Thine only Son Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

COLLECT FOR ASH-WEDNESDAY.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who hatest nothing that Thou hast made, and dost forgive the sins of all those who are penitent; create and make in us new and contrite hearts, that we, worthily lamenting our sins and acknowledging our wretchedness, may obtain of Thee the God of all mercy, perfect remission and forgiveness; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

OUR DESERT.

F. B. Stone.

Alone in the desert with Jesus!
Each night may be that, if we will,
When curtained from others by darkness,
And earth with its voices is still.

Alone in the desert with Jesus,
All objects shut out by the night,
And stripped of our pride and complaisance,
Our souls are laid bare in His sight.

And down on our face in His presence,
We see with the Saviour's clear eyes,
That each is a poor, wretched sinner,
Who for pardon and soul-cleansing cries.

And there with His great arms around us,
He comforts and strengthens each soul;
We catch a faint glimpse of the standard
He sets for us each as our goal.

Then armed with new strength for the battle,
Souls cleansed with new vision we rise,
And go from our desert with Jesus,
To work in the strength He supplies.

Apart With Christ.

In beautiful phrase Bengel speaks of being "upbuilt in the recollected consciousness of God". Consciousness of God! Is that possible? May we, immersed in the things of time and sense, know God as near, nearer than man can be to man? Is it not rather that we feel that God is a very long way off? May prayer be real intercourse, face to face, or is it as one has expressed it, "Often like conversation over a telephone wire of infinite length which gets out of order"?

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." That is the word of Jesus. How may we know that is true? "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," He said. The amazing revelation of Jesus is that in Him we know God, and knowing Him we share His consciousness of God.

This is wisdom learned only of Him. The conviction that God or some sort of a God is, is common to men. It is part of our human nature; but to find God, to know God, to realize God, that has been beyond any power of the mind of man. Plato speaks for the human mind at its highest when he says that "mind must seek Mind", and then adds, "but it is difficult". Only Jesus Christ made it possible for a St. John to say, "We know Him that is true, and are in Him that is true. This is the true God and eternal life".

St. John had long been with the Christ. Not only had he walked with Him in Galilee, been with Him in the upper room and at the Cross, but through long years of brooding thought in a communion nearer than he had known even in the upper room. He knew as St. Paul learned to know, "God in Christ". So we may know God, but only in a deep sense "apart with Christ".

How may that be? How is God in Christ now present to us? First of all, in the Gospels. The teaching of Jesus is projected into all time. And there is a deeper mystical sense of His presence and the power of His words. You may know it in the hour of quiet when the deeper need of the soul makes itself felt. Then He speaks as spirit to spirit. The mystic speaks for many when he says, "Jesus speaks, and speaks to me".

Jesus knew the disciples' need of the nearer fellowship when He said to them, "Come ye apart into a desert place, and rest awhile", and the evangelist adds, "for there were many coming and going".

Many coming and going. How true a picture of our modern daily life! There is little of the alone. We live in crowds, and in perpetual noise. The life of public daily life has for most people made the quiet hour rare, if not impossible. Even in our religion we emphasize work rather than prayer, forgetting that fervor must find sweetness and rigor of sincerity and emotion poise apart with God. It is the want of this that makes ineffective so much of our religious work. In consequence, what we create has much quality of the noise in which it is conceived and brought. The shallow in modern literature, the trifling in the social world, the passion of greed and the lust of war, the ineffective in religion—these are all of the noise.

It is, perhaps, true that in the past the emphasis has been too much upon personal religion. We needed to be made to realize the organic unity of mankind, but there is a very real danger in our putting the emphasis so wholly upon the social consciousness. The cult of the day in the religious world is that of the philanthropist, the charity organizer, or, perhaps, that of the social democrat. The reaction is not altogether wholesome. Personal religion may, indeed, be rooted in selfish desire which will make it utterly untrue to the religion of Jesus. Jesus offers no sterile quietism or spiritual epicureanism. Concentration upon self in religion may easily become mere dreamy mystical rhapsody, and degenerate into unethical and heartless selfishness. The Lord's call is a call to service and denial of self. But as in extreme reaction always, so in this balance may be lost. The personal soul lost to sight, religion ceases to have reality, for religion must be personal if religion at all, certainly if Christian. The fundamental facts of life make it so. Self is real. Self in its relation to other selves cannot be obliterated. The link is unbreakable. We know that at the last responsibility is our own. Personal religion is demanded by the sacredness of our personality and the reality of our moral freedom. The relation of self to God must be personal, certainly relation to the Christian's God. To ignore that in the name of religion is to play with life itself.

This brief paper is suggestive of Lent. In our many activities we may easily forget God, and Lent is a call to a "recollected consciousness" of Him. To realize that we must be much with Christ who alone makes God known to us, and in whom we share that consciousness of God. The whole of the life which Christ reveals as the true and eternal life springs out of a vital relationship with Him, and is so maintained. To draw from Him the inspiration and power to live that life among men we need much to be apart with Him.

Lent may mean that to us. It may be with Christ. If we are to be Christians life must be much with Christ. Even He often went apart. When on earth He often seemed to wonder that man can forget God. We do forget God. Apart with Christ we may be "upbuilt in the recollected consciousness of God". —Rev. A. L. Urban, in Church News (Penn.).

The Habit of Courtesy.

"Hail ye small, sweet courtesies of life, for smooth do ye make the road of it."—Sterne.

Recently I overheard the story of a young lad applying for a position and getting it, because of the "How do you do, Sir"? with which he addressed an elderly official of a big corporation.

"You see," the man who engaged the courteous young chap explained, "so many young men are not properly attentive to those who are older. That young man's courtesy was genuine. It's true," he quoted, "that 'acorns of courtesy in business, usually, develop into oaks of financial return'."

Teachers and parents, alike, need to take time to think and teach courtesy. If such habits are inculcated in boys and girls while they are still in the plastic, just-around-the-corner-from-babyhood age they will, in all probability, carry these habits through life.

It is generally agreed that courtesy is indeed a most desirable quality to develop in children, but parents and teachers who expect their children to be thoughtful of others must remember that courtesy begets courtesy. They must set an example of courtesy. Is it not true that we often save our most covetous, gracious selves for our friends and acquaintances outside the home? Husbands and wives often speak to each other and to their children in a way they would not think of speaking to a stranger. Hoow foolish? Must we not continually "sell ourselves" to each other as a salesman sells his wares to win orders? How does he do it? Partly by being friendly and courteous. Can we expect to hold the love and respect of our own little family circle in the fullest measure unless we use similar methods?

Courtesy wins the love of our families and our friends. Let us teach our children that not many become great or famous, but all can be courteous and thoughtful of others—a practical application of the Golden Rule.

In our town, there is a big, jovial policeman who stands guard at a street corner where many children pass on their way to school. Expectantly, he waits for them in the morning, at noon and in the evening. He is their idol, always ready to look at their report cards and eager to hear their little tales of happiness or woe.

One day, I happened to be passing, when I saw three little girls wave a cheery, "Good morning, Mr. Reynolds", to the smiling man.

I nodded to him and said, "Really, Mr. Reynolds, I believe you're one of the happiest men in the world."

And quickly he replied, "I am! I wouldn't trade places with any one for a much larger salary. You see my children are all so polite and thoughtful."

"You have helped to make them so," I told him.

"Perhaps," he admitted, "I've found that courtesy and good-will often win where gruffness fails."—Helen Gregg Green, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

Christ's Joy and Ours.

"These things I have spoken unto you, that my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be made full." Our Lord was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief", for He knew in His loving soul the awful sin and misery of the world. But He also knew the love of God, the eternal bliss of heaven, and the everlasting salvation ready for all who would receive it. Therefore He was the happiest of men, in spite of His sorrowing sympathy, and we are to think of Him as overflowing with joy, and eager that His joy might fill the lives of all His followers.

Since that is His will for us, it is our happy duty to accomplish it. Joy is a part of God's commandments. A gloomy life is a disobedient life.

"But how can we help our joylessness?" many ask. "If we are sad, we cannot force ourselves into joyfulness."

The answer is that we can serve Christ, we can do His will in helping others, and in the process of helping others, we shall infallibly enter into His joy, for that is the source of it. Obedience to Christ's law of service means, before long, obedience to His law of happiness. Henry Van Dyke put this truth into two vital stanzas:

" 'Joy is a duty'—so with golden lore
The Hebrew rabbis taught in the days of yore.
And happy human hearts heard in their speech
Almost the highest wisdom man can reach.

"But one bright peak still rises far above
And there the Master stands whose name is Love,
Saying to those whom weary tasks employ:
'Life is divine when Duty is a Joy'."
—Amos R. Wells.

Christ calls us not from gladness to gloom, but from low pleasures to higher ones, and from short pleasures to long ones. This is the sum and substance of our self-denial. We are able to turn aside to such a noble thought of life as shall make God's glory quicken it—to joys as pure as the smile of heaven—to peace that floweth like a river in the soul.——D. J. Burrell.

MY DEFENDER.

He'll defend me when I'm helpless,
When my earthly friends are few,
When my heart's in deepest trouble,
He'll defend me, He'll be true.

What are other friends beside Him—
Him, the King of Truth and Love?
They may change as they grow older—
Not so with the Friend above.

All the harsh words that are grating
To our souls dissolve in air
When the great Defender enters
And unloads us of our care!

A True Story From India.

In far-off India, not so many years ago, there lived a young lad by the name of Sundar Singh.

Sundar Singh (the name "Singh" means lion) was a Sikh. The Sikhs are a religious sect of which make up principal part of the native population of the province of the Punjab, India. The founder of the sect was a Hindu and of the military caste, the second of the four great Hindu castes.

Sundar Singh went to the mission school, for he wanted an education, but he had no interest in the Christian religion, and did not respond in any way to the efforts of the missionaries to direct his quick, active mind to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. His father had no love for Christianity either, save for the material benefits it might bring his boy in the way of an education; and he had the greatest of ambitions for his fifteen-year-old son.

But one day Sundar Singh's mother became ill and in a short time she died, and the young lad began to feel the uncertainty and the seriousness of life; and in this time of sorrow his heart craved for something that would give him hope and comfort. In some strange way, it came into his mind that religion, after all, might give him help. Sundar Singh had loved his mother dearly, and she had always told him that soul-peace was a thing to be desired above all else. She had always cautioned him to study carefully the sacred book of their religion, and she had always hoped that some day he would choose to be a sadh. A sadh is one who willingly lives a life of self-denial and is one of the holy men of India.

And when his mother died, Sundar began to feel the need of peace of soul, and so he began to read the sacred books of the religions of India. But no peace came to his troubled heart. So he turned to the sacred Book of the Christians, the Bible. And though he had so stubbornly resisted Christianity before, as he read the Bible, the light of truth began to dawn upon his darkened soul. And the missionaries explained to him the way of Jesus Christ. And as he prayed, the blessed Son of God appeared to him, and Sundar heard the words, as if spoken in an audible voice: "I am your Saviour. I will give you peace".

And so the young boy told his proud father that he had decided to follow the Christ of the Christians. In anger his father straightened up and exclaimed, "My son be a Christian dog! Such can never be." He raged and wept by turns, pleading and offering Sundar all he could give if only he would not so disgrace the family. Sundar's brother and uncle joined him, and though it seemed to Sundar sometimes that his own heart would break with this long continued opposition, to his mind came the promise he had made to Jesus Christ, and he said only, "I must follow Him who gave me peace". And then he cut off his long hair which showed that he forsook the religion of his fathers.

The pleading stopped. Sundar Singh was now an outcast. He was no longer one of the family. His father summoned him before the assembled household, gave him his curse, and disowned him. They gave him one last meal on the veranda and Sundar Singh set out alone for a neighboring village, where lived a few Indian Christians. They received him, but Sundar was yet to realize the depth of his father's hatred toward Christianity. He became deathly sick, for the last food he had eaten at his father's house had been poisoned. They had determined to end the fearful disgrace he had brought upon his family, by death.

But God had a work for Sundar Singh, and he was miraculously brought back from the very edge of the "valley of the shadows". And he went to the American missionaries and asked to be baptized. His father came to see him once more. His appearance betokened a broken-hearted man, and his appeals went to Sundar's heart.

"Wilt thou forsake the religion of thy mother? Hast thou forgotten her teachings, my son?"

"No," replied Sundar. "I do not forget, but I must follow the Christ."

The old man turned away and went back to his village. And Sundar Singh was baptized by the Christian missionaries and a month later he left the little mission station to tell people of the good news of salvation. With him he carried a little New Testament, and as he journeyed, gladly he told all who would listen, about Jesus Christ who alone can give the peace for which men seek.

The great country of Tibet is situated directly north of India. This land is surrounded by the Himalaya Mountains, and partly because of these barriers of nature, and partly because of the hostility of its people toward foreign religions, Tibet has never been opened to missionary work. The lamas, Buddhist priests, rule the land, and the punishment of those who forsake the Buddhist faith is death.

To this hostile country went Sundar Singh, clad in his priestly robes. An interpreter accompanied him and up one of the narrow mountain passes they climbed until they reached a little Tibetan village. The curious inhabitants gathered around them. Sundar's garments exposed the fact that he was a priest and he was taken to the village lama. The Buddhist was inclined to be friendly and Sundar Singh ate of the simple meal that was set before him. But when the lama learned that Sundar was a Christian priest, his friendliness vanished, and he warned him that to preach in the country of Tibet would surely mean death.

Sundar went from village to village, preaching the Gospel. He knew his danger was great, but in his heart was an intense longing to tell of the peace of soul he had found.

In the town of Rasar he was arrested, tried and found guilty. The punishment was death. He was taken to an old dry well, and thrown in. Around him were the bones of former victims, and for three days and nights he lay there, in the midst of that corrupt mass. On the third night, a voice called to him from the top of the well. A rope was thrown, and in the darkness of the night he was drawn up. His rescuer vanished, and Sundar Singh never knew who had dared to save his life. He went back to the village the next day, and was again seen preaching in the market place.

In terror and amazement the people listened. The lama ordered him out of town, fearful that some terrible curse would come upon him and his people from the God of the Christians who had marvelously delivered His priest. And we read that during the winter months Sundar Singh traveled in India, preaching the Gospel, but when the warm summer sun melted the snow in the mountain passes, this fearless follower of Jesus Christ again went up into the little Tibetan towns, carrying the message of the Saviour who commanded us to "preach the gospel to every creature".—Elizabeth Hay, in Burning Bush.

MUD PIES.

One day I made a little cake
And put it in the sun to bake,
And when it seemed quite done to me
I called my nurse to come and see.
I told her it was gingerbread,
But Nursie only shook her head,
And didn't seem to understand,
And thought it was just mud and sand.
And Nursie said she wished I'd play
At something sensible, the way
When she was young, she used to do.
I wonder what it was, don't you?
So I must never, never make
Another little gingercake.
But afterwhile perhaps I'll try
And see if I can't make a pie.
—Mary Dixon Thayer in Commonweal.

The Rescue of Saint Valentine.

David looked at the counter of valentine postcards, valentines made of colored lace, and red and white peppermint candy hearts in the store. How he longed for one. But he put in his basket the sugar and tea he had come to the village to buy, tied his woolen muffler tighter, and went out of the store.

"I won't have a single valentine," David said to himself, as he started along the railroad tracks toward the farm on the edge of the village where he lived. "I don't know anybody who would send me one. There will be a valentine box in the village school tomorrow, but we won't have one, with only me and little Billy and the Brown twins in the district school."

David trudged on. He was not going to be down-hearted, but how he did wish that the rural delivery man would stop at their farm in the morning with a valentine for David Jordan.

"I ought to see the afternoon mail train coming in," thought the boy, as he passed the little tower beside the tracks where the signal man sat and worked the switches. "It will be loaded with mail bags today, full of valentines. I wish—"

Then David grinned and stopped being sorry for himself. Besides, he had seen something that made him happy.

Although it was early in February, the ice was gone from the brook and the willows that grew along the edge showed faint green. David crossed the tracks and felt of the new shoots of the willow. Yes, the sap was running, and soon he could come down here with his jackknife and make himself a whistle.

As David re-crossed the tracks, he stubbed his toe on a tie and nearly fell down on the tracks. When he looked down at the roadbed, he gasped with fright. The railroad tie on which he had stubbed his toe was loose. The melting of the ice and the water overflowing from the brook had loosened the tie from the roadbed. Now, it stuck up above the level of the tracks. David remembered that the mail train with letters and valentines was due any time.

David was a farm boy, and he knew that a safe roadbed was one of the most important things in the world. He must do something about this danger he had discovered, but could he do it in time?

"I must try, anyway!" he said to himself. "First I will take off my red muffler and fasten it to this tree beside the tracks so that the train engineer can see it! Then I will run back to the tower."

The road was not meant for a boy's race with a mail train. There was slush and mud, and holes and stones and stumps to keep him back. But he ran as fast as his boots would let him. Finally he came to the tower.

"Flash a signal!" he cried to the man. "There is a loose tie in the roadbed back there that sticks up above the rails. The valentine mail train will be coming along soon!"

The switchman looked at his watch, and then he did things to his signals in a great hurry. "That will be all right!" he told David. "The mail is so heavy that the train is late. Thank you! What's your name?"

"David Jordan, from Hilltop Farm," David told him.

Then, as he started back towards home, he saw men come hurrying out on a hand car to fix the tie.

When Saint Valentine's Day dawned, David was out feeding the hens early, but he had no valentine. But just as he had scattered the last kernel of corn, he saw something odd in the road. There was the rural delivery cart in the Hilltop farm road, and Uncle Sam sat beside the postman. The cart stopped at David's gate, and Uncle Sam, no larger than he, stepped down and came in.

It was one of the village boys dressed like Uncle Sam, and he had a package of valentines for David from the boys and girls in the village whose own valentines David had brought safely to them when he saved the mail train.—Carolyn S. Bailey.

The St. Valentine Wind.

Ruth had quarreled with Rosalie for the first time since they had been playmates. And now St. Valentine's Day was coming, and she could not send her the valentine that she had bought so joyfully only a few days before.

"I don't care," Ruth said as she put her other valentines into envelopes. But she knew that she did care a great deal. She sat and gazed at the valentine that had been intended for Rosalie. What should she do with it?

"I know what I'll do," she decided. "I'll just take it with me when I go out to carry the other valentines, and perhaps I shall think of some one to give it to."

She and Rosalie had always carried valentines round together, and she felt queer and lonesome now as she started off alone. It would not be nearly so much fun, she knew, to ring bells all by herself and then run and hide. She gave a deep sigh.

As she passed Rosalie's house she looked toward it out of the corner of her eye. Was Rosalie there, or was she, too, going forlornly round alone, carrying valentines?

By the time Ruth had finished running up and down the village streets, slipping her valentines under doors and ringing bells, she was quite out of breath. There was only one valentine left—the one that had been intended for Rosalie.

"I suppose I might just as well take it home," Ruth said sorrowfully.

The second time she passed Rosalie's house she tried to go by, but somehow her feet lagged. What would happen if she ran up the walk and rang the bell? Would the door fly open, she wondered, and some one shout, "Valentine! I caught you!"

Ruth hesitated a moment; then, as she started to walk on again, something unexpected happened. The wind, which as night fell had been blowing harder and harder, came swirling suddenly round the corner of the house and snatched the envelope from her hand. Away it went high into the air, whirling and circling. It flew straight over the fence and into the yard of Rsalie's house. Up, up into the air it wen, then down again it fluttered and landed right at Rosalie's door!

Ruth was so astonished that she stood stock-still in surprise. Then she pushed the gate open quickly. She must get back that envelope, and in a hurry, too!

There it lay right on the doorstep. Somehow it seemed to be in just the right place, but it must not stay there.

As she stooped to snatch it up the door flew open. "Valentine!" a voice cried joyfully. "I caught you!" Some one seized her and drew her into the hall. It was Rosalie.

"I saw you pass," Rosalie said, "and I hid behind the curtain and watched. How I hoped you had brought a valentine for me! Then when you came into the yard I knew you had."

"But I hadn't," Ruth said, though she did not want to say it. "That is, I had a valentine for you, but I wasn't going to give it to you. The wind snatched it out of my hand."

"There!" said Rosalie, laughing. "I had a valentine for you, too, and I couldn't make up my mind what to do with it. I'm glad the wind was blowing tonight!"

The next minute Ruth was running home to ask if she might stay to supper at Rosalie's house. When she came back the wind was roaring down the chimneys and rattling the windows.

"Blow, wind," said Ruth. "We don't mind."

"Yes, blow," echoed Rosalie. "You are just a St. Valentine wind—full of fun."—Irene S. Woodcock, in The Youth's Companion.

See Christ For Yourself.

In the New Testament story it is noticeable that every one of the Christian group tried to see Christ for Himself when it became known that He had risen from the dead. It is not enough to hear about Christ; we must know Him. It is the mystery and the power of Christianity that it is not the acceptance of a proposition but the acceptance of a Person that makes one a Christian.—Selected.

TEST OF CHRISTIANITY

No surer test, according to the Holy Scriptures, can be applied to anything claiming to be Christian teaching, than this: Where does it put Jesus Christ? What does it make of Jesus Christ? Is He something in it, or is He all? Is He the Sun of the true solar system, so that every planet gets its place and its light from Him? Or is He at best a sort of Ptolemaic sun, rolling together with other luminaries around an earthly center—whether that center take the form of an observance, a constitution, or a philosophy?"—Bishop Moule.

GENE TUNNEY may have put off the gloves for good. But he's too wise a man to give up the priceless habits of physical training that stood him in such good stead in his profession.

Just before his last fight, Tunney said:

"I started taking Nujol internally seven years ago. The first month Nujol brought remarkable changes in my physical condition. My elimination became active and normal. My appetite increased and a desire for intensive training was created. Since that time I have taken Nujol about five nights a week. I have regulated myself to the amount necessary to keep my elimination normal. I have found during my seven years' experience with Nujol that it is not habit-forming, or in any way unpleasant or harmful."

Nujol is not a medicine. It contains absolutely no medicine or drugs. It is simply a pure substance—perfected by the Nujol Laboratories, 26 Broadway, New York. It not only prevents an excess of body poisons from forming (we all have them) but aids in their removal. In sealed packages only. Buy a bottle of Nujol today.

REV. W. B. EVERETT, III, Rector

Help us to make this Cabin a Christian Home.

A STATEMENT

About two years ago we began making a special appeal for funds with which to purchase a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country. From north, south, east and west—from far-away Japan came the welcome checks to help buy the property and to furnish necessary equipment. Old friends, new friends, and entire strangers, numerous branches of the Woman's Auxiliary and Section B kindly opened their hearts and loosened their purse strings. To these many generous friends we wish to extend our grateful thanks and hearty appreciation. God has blessed us, and may He bless these many donors, as doubtless He will, through their gifts to these needy and deserving children of our one Father.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

If you, who have helped us to help these long-neglected mountain people, could visit St. Andrew's Mission, as we hope you will, you would see for yourselves what a great help it is to our work to have this splendid and convenient home, that you have so generously helped to provide.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00. We must pay six per cent interest on deferred payments, and wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of debt. We are striving to raise the next $1,000 payment promptly. Who will help? If twenty persons will subscribe in cash or instalments $50 each, we will have the $1,000. If forty will subscribe $25, or one hundred will subscribe $10 we will have the thousand. Any amount will be most acceptable. What will YOU do?

The Right Rev. William Cabell Brown, late Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia, heartily endorsed this appeal. The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, also endorses it.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $.....to be paid in cash or instalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

THE DIVINE PLAN

BY

REV. HOWARD G. ENGLAND, B. A., D. D.,
Church of the Holy Comforter, Rock Creek Parish,
Washington, D. C.

THE CHURCH REORGANIZED.

From these discpiles He selected twelve, whom He called Apostles, to be with Him to receive His instruction and be eye-witnesses of His wonderful works; that He might make them the Bishops and Apostles in His Church when He should ascend to the Father in Heaven. After His crucifixion on the Cross and Resurrection from the grave, He appeared numerous times to His Apostles and disciples, instructing them concerning the teaching and government of His Church (Acts 1:3). Jesus Christ gave command to the Apostles and the Church, saying: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (St. Matt. 28:29). He also gave His Church power to remit sins and to bind sins (St. Matt. 18:17, 18; St. John 20:22, 23). Immediately after the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, the Apostles elected Matthias as an Apostle to fill the place of Judas Iscariot, who had betrayed Him (Acts 1:26). Over twenty are called Apostles of His Church in the writings of the New Testament. In the 16th chapter St. Matt. our Lord gave St. Peter the honor of first proclaiming the Gospel (keys of the Kingdom) to the Jews and to the Gentiles, because he was the first to make the great confession of His Divinity. Our Lord also announced that His Divinity was the Rock on which His Church would be built (St. Matt. 16:18). There is no indication anywhere in the New Testament that any one Apostle was given authority by our Lord Jesus Christ over the other Apostles. In the 15th chapter of Acts the record is given of the first Council of the Apostles, when the subject of circumcision was considered. St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, presided over the Council. St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Barnabas, and others made addresses. St. James pronounced the decision of the Council, but neither he nor any other Apostle seems to have exercised any authority as Head or Pope of the Apostles. St. Paul asserts he is not a whit behind the chiefest of the Apostles (2 Cor. 11:5). All through the New Testament writings the Kingdom founded by our Lord Jesus Christ is called "The Church", "The Church of God" (Rev. 2:1, 8, 12, 18; Ephes. 5:23-25; 2 Cor. 1:1; Acts 20:28; 1 Cor. 1:2).

DIVISIONS CONDEMNED.

There is only one God, and God founded only one Church. The Church our Lord founded is older than the New Testament; it gave the New Testament and preserved it (1 Tim. 3:15). The Lord prayed for the unity of His Church (St. John 17:21). The Apostles of the Lord all through the New Testament condemn those disciples who would leave "The Church" and organize disciples into Christian sects (1 Cor. 1:10, 13; Romans 16:17; 1 Cor. 12:12-20; St. Matt. 18:17; Titus 3:10; Gal. 5:19-21). The Lord Jesus Christ taught that the authority of the igh, Priest and priests should be honored and recognized in His Church, before He reorganized it, even though their acts were not always good (St. Matt. 23:2, 3, 4). The Lord also condemned the Samaritans who had High Priests, Priests, and Levites and offered the Sacrifices in their temple on Mt. Gerizim, because they were schismatic and rebellious in spirit, declaring salvation was of the Jewish Church (St. John 4:21, 22).

THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Although the organization our Lord Jesus Christ founded in the New Testament is called "The Church", because the command was to go carry the Gospel to all the world, it was soon called "The Holy Catholic Church", because the Greek word "Katholikos" means universal. The pure faith of the Apostles and the New Testament was soon called "The Christian" or "The Catholic" faith; both meant the same thing.

Our January meeting was marked by something quite unusual. Dr. Lee Huizenga, a Medical Missionary to China for eight (8) years, having charge of a Hospital and special care of Lepers in a town near Shanghai, was with us and made a most impressive appeal. On January 8 he addressed the Academy of Medicine and had a delightful time with The Drs.!—to 2 groups of Students at Union Theological Seminary—the next morning; again that night at Seventh Street Christian Church, making a fine impression on all. On March 1 he will be sent by the American Mission to Lepers on a World Tour for a year, to interest the Governments in different countries, to aid in ridding all the two millions afflicted with this disease of Leprosy—1928 saw an increase in gifts to the cause—$5,072.37 being given.

Grand Total in 11 years from Va. many other States—Richmond—Pete Banks and the Junior Branch $28,615.00.

All gifts gratefully acknowledged by Miss E. P. Meriwether, 2346 W. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

P—Treas., Richmond Br. Leper Mission.

Deaths

IN MEMORIAM.

Entered peacefully into the eternal rest prepared for those who love Him, BETTIE COTTEN VINCENT, wife of the late Captain Z. T. Vincent, at her home in Suffolk, Va., January 4, 1929.

Mrs. Vincent was born in Scotland Neck, N. C., August 4, 1855, and was borne to her final resting place from the same church, in Scotland Neck, in which she was baptized, confirmed and married.

The services were conducted by the Rev. H. N. Tucker, of St. Paul's, Suffolk, and the Rev. Theodore Partrick, Jr., of Scotland Neck.

Through a long illness she was faithfully and lovingly cared for by a devoted sister, Mrs. Sue Walker, and her daughter, Mrs. C. L. Lewis, who, with her son, Rev. Z. T. Vincent, of Pierre, S. D., survive her.

Her deep spirituality, her earnest devotion to our Lord in the worship of the church, and her practical Christianity made her an esteemed member of St. Paul's Church.

We, the mmebers of the Woman's Auxiliary, desire to record the great loss sustained in her going, by the church, the Auxiliary, the Guild, and a close circle of friends.

"Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."
WOMAN'S AUXILIARY, ST. PAUL'S, SUFFOLK.

MRS. NORA DOYLE LEVY.

Entered into rest on September 15, 1928, MRS. NORA DOYLE LEVY, wife of Mr. Leon Levy, at Louisa Court House. As she was passing across the road from her home she was knocked down by a passing automobile, and though rushed to the hospital at Charlottesville, she never regained consciousness and died in a few hours. Thus rudely "was the silver cord loosed and the golden bowl broken", and a lovely person and queenly soul went to her rest. Why this way we do not know, but we do know that, having lived a life "hid with Christ in God", she went to Him—"was not, for God took her". Why this sudden wrench to take her from a lower to a higher life we shall in the afterwhile understand, though not now.

Mrs. Levy was born in Richmond, Va., on the 24th day of June, 1852, the daughter of Dr. Richard N. Hudson and Mrs. Anne Carey Hudson. She was confirmed by Bishop Whittle at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va.

When the family moved to Louisa there was no Episcopal Church there. Mrs. Levy gave her best thought and work in getting one, and after St. James was built she was its life, and frequently its living, for to her every one looked in keeping up the church and its salaries and expenses.

That she was ever ready with glad mind and willing heart to further the church's cause the writer gives grateful witness.

As her influence shone brightly in her church life, so it was always in the community. She was repected, esteemed, loved by all about her, and her going cast a gloom over the entire community—indeed, the county, for her long life at the place had given her a wide circle of friends and acquaintances to mourn her untimely end.

The many flowers sent and the abundance of tears shed by the large crowd that attended the funeral give silent testimony of the many hearts made sad by the departure of their good friend and the direful bereavement thus thrust on the stricken husband.

She leaves her husband, two sisters, Mrs. John Sawyer and Mrs. Lewis Finch, a son, Richard, and a grandson, Richard, Jr., to mourn her loss.

J. R. E.

WILLIAM B. LIGHTFOOT.

Entered into life eternal in the early morning of January 16, 1929, after a short illness, WILLIAM B. LIGHTFOOT, son of John B. and Harriet A. Lightfoot, of Port Royal, Va. He is survived by his wife, Emmie A. Crump, and three children, Mrs. E. B. Claybrook, of Cumberland, Md.; Mrs. Thomas Brown, Jr., and J. B. Lightfoot, Jr., of Richmond.

Mr. Lightfoot was a Confederate veteran, having entered the army as member of Company B, Ninth Virginia Cavalry, under General J. E. B. Stuart, and surrendered at Appomattox in 1865. He was sergeant major of R. E. Lee Camp, No. 1, Confederate Veterans, and interested in everything pertaining to the days of 1861-1865.

He was laid to rest in old Shockoe Cemetery, in the joyful hope of the resurrection at the last day.

"Blessed is the man that putteth his trust in the Lord."

COLONEL WIRT ROBINSON.

Colonel Wirt Robinson, U. S. A., retired, for many years professor of chemistry, mineralogy and geology at the West Point Military Academy, died suddenly of heart disease in Washington January 19, 1929, at his residence, Tilden Hall, on Connecticut Avenue.

He had been ill since his retirement from the army last October, and until December 17 was under treatment at Walter Reed General Army Hospital in Washington. He then went to his former home in Virginia, returning to Washington yesterday.

Colonel Robinson is survived by a widow, Mrs. Nancy Robinson; a son, Russel Wirt Robinson, of West Orange, N. J., and a small daughter, Evelyn Byrd Robinson.

Colonel Robinson was born in Buckingham county, Va., on October 16, 1864. He retired from active service for age on his sixty-fourth birthday, after having served forty-five years in the army. He graduated from West Point in 1887, and was with the Fourth Artillery until 1891, when he went to the Military Academy as a modern language instructor.

From 1894 to 1898 he was professor of military science at Harvard University. After a period of duty in the army quartermaster's depot at New York he went again to West Point in 1899 and remained there until 1903, whereupon he went to Havana to command a company on duty in Morro Castle during the Cuban pacification period. After serving at Fort Tottem, L. I., he was re-assigned to West Point in 1906 as assistant professor of chemistry, was promoted to the professorship in 1911, and served in that capacity until his retirement.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Bible Conference in Richmond.

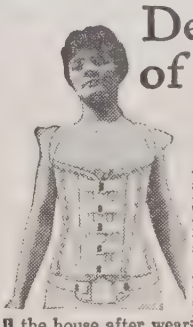
The Bible Conference Association of Richmond have arranged to hold a Bible Conference in Westminster Presbyterian Church, Richmond, Va., February 10-15. The association is fortunate in having as the speakers two men of exceptional gifts and ability: the Rev. R. C. McQuilkin, Dean of the Columbia Bible School, of Columbia, S. C., a speaker and writer of note on Biblical subjects, and the Rev. George E. Guille, D. D., formerly of the Moody Bible Institute, and now engaged in a nation-wide ministry as Bible teacher and lecturer.

The Conference will open February 10, at 3 P. M., and will continue with addresses daily at 3 and 8 P. M. These sessions will afford opportunity for Bible teaching that feeds the soul and deepens the spiritual life.

The Christians of other cities have been much helped by these Bible Conferences and we feel sure that the religious life of Richmond will be greatly enriched by this, the first of what is intended to be a series of similar conferences. The association is interdenominational and is composed of ministers and laymen. They appeal to all true lovers of the Word to support these meetings with prayers, personal presence and offerings.

Conference of Rural Clergy.

A conference of rural clergymen was held at the Mayo Memorial Church House, Richmond, January 30-31, when problems of the rural church were discussed. Representatives of every convocation in the diocese were present. Among those attending were: Archdeacon Neve, Ivy Depot; Rev. F. D. Goodwin, Warsaw; Dr. Cary Montague, Richmond City Missionary; Dr. George P. Mayo, Dyke; Rev. Josiah Ellis, Richmond; Rev. Douglas Neff, Orange; Dr. Churchill Gibson, Richmond; Rev. Stamo S. Spathey, Richmond, and Rev. Frank L. Robinson, Cismont.



Personal Notes

The Rev. H. G. England, D. D., has accepted a call as rector of Trinity Church, Edgefield, and associate missions in Trenton and Ridge Spring in the Diocese of Upper South Carolina. Dr. England was rector of the church in Farmville and Snow Hill in the Diocese of East Carolina. He is in residence in Trenton, S. C.

The Rev. George Victor Bell is rector of St. Luke's Church, Pedlar Mills, Emmanuel Church, Madison Heights, Trinity Church, Boonesboro, Ivy Chapel, Forest, R. F. D. No. 2, and Christ Church, Schuyler, all in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

In the Living Church Annual for 1929 the residence of Mr. Bell is shown as Pedlar Mills, Virginia. His address at present and until further notice is 631 Riverside Drive, Lynchburg, Virginia; Lynchburg being more centrally located for his work at the several points.

The Rev. T. D. Harris, of All Saints' Littleton, N. H., has found it necessary for him to resign and go over to his newly widowed mother in Beirut, Syria. He expects to sail from Boston February 8, and hopes to return in the fall, and, if possible, bring his mother over with him.

Deformities of the Back

Thousands of Remarkable Cases

An old lady, 72 years of age, who suffered for many years and was absolutely helpless, found relief. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding horseback and playing tennis within a year. A little child, paralyzed, was playing about the house after wearing a Philo Burt Appliance three weeks. We have successfully treated over fifty-seven thousand cases in the past 25 years.

30 DAYS' TRIAL FREE

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photographs show how light, cool, elastic and easily adjusted the Philo Burt Appliance is—how different from the old torturous plaster, leather or steel jackets.

Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine owes it to himself to investigate thoroughly. Price within reach of all.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH LEAGUE

The Protestant Episcopal Church League is an association of adult communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church who insist that its doctrines and worship shall be in accordance with its Constitution and Book of Common Prayer, and who are opposed to the effort of what is known as the "Anglo-Catholic" party in the Church (composed of certain Bishops, clergy and laity) to destroy its Protestant heritage and introduce into it the doctrine that the Communion Elements become the actual Body and Blood of Christ by consecration, reservation, and adoration of the sacrament, the doctrine of seven sacraments, purgatory, "veneration" or worship of images and relics, invocation of saints (including prayers to the Virgin Mary), confession to a priest, "celebration of the mass," etc., and who seek ultimate union with the Church of Rome.

All funds derived from memberships are devoted to the purpose of informing the people in the pews of this effort to undermine the doctrine and worship of the Church, in order that they may think and act for themselves and vindicate their constitutional right to have their Church as its laws provide.

THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH LEAGUE

Purposes:

1. To maintain the faith of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.
2. To maintain the Constitution and Canons of the same.
3. To preserve the rights of the laity and clergy by maintaining the doctrine, discipline and worship of our Church as contained in the Book of Common Prayer

Membership

Men and women communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church who believe in the purposes of this League are eligible for membership upon signing application blank and the payment of dues.

THINGS WORTH KNOWING

I KNOW that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Job. 19:25, 26.

I KNOW whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep (guard) that which I have committed unto Him." 2 Timothy 1:12.

YE KNOW that He (Jesus) was manifested to take away our sins." 1 John 3:5.

WE KNOW that all things work together for good to them who love God." Romans 8:28.

WE KNOW that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God . . . eternal in the heavens." 2 Corinthians 5:1.

WE KNOW that when He (Jesus) shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." 1 John 3:2.

"Thus far did I come laden with my sin.
Nor could ought ease the grief that I was in,
Till I came hither; what a place is this?
Must here be the beginning of my bliss?
Must here the burden fall from off my back?
Must here the strings that bind it to me crack?
Blest cross! blest sepulchre! blest rather be
The Man that there was put to shame for me."

The Church They Couldn't Find.

The trustees had been won over. Expenses for the new church had been heavy, the "extras" many, and they had thought a bulletin board among the luxuries that could very well wait a while.

But the district convention had been held in the new building and some of the out-of-town delegates had missed the building, wandered first into another new church near by, and had finally arrived late and somewhat put out by the lack of directions.

So the trustees felt that something had to be done and that while they were at it they might as well do it right. A committee was appointed to investigate the cost and types of up-to-date bulletin boards and report at the next meeting. And that commtitee report surely opened their eyes.

Boards were found in copper and bronze and in sturdy oak, others of steel and aluminum. They were adapted for placement on the church building or artistic supports were provided for fixture on the lawn. Glass enclosed and electrically illuminated, they were ready to give forth their messages by day or night, and in storm weather or clear. It did not take the trustees long to decide on the immediate purchase of one of the most attractive types.

Perhaps your church has a problem that a new bulletin board might help solve. The Church Equipment Service of this periodical has been especially provided to give information that will help make the work of your church and Sunday school more effective. Just write the Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, 628 East Main Street, Richmond, Virginia, and we shall be glad to put you in touch promptly with reputable concerns who can give full information on bulletin boards and other items of church equipment.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

He that has once yielded thoroughly to God will yield to nothing but God.—John Ruskin.

Swift kindnesses are best; a long delay in kindness takes the kindness all away.—From the Greek.

How are we to be the men we ought to be? There is only one way, and that is by vital union with the Man, the Lord Jesus.—The Bishop of Bristol.

I never prayed sincerely and earnestly for anything but it came some time, no matter at how distant a day, somehow, some shape, probably the last I would of circumstances makes it seldom possison.

The reason that most people do not rise higher religiously is that they are too much weighed down by self.

We might as well make an experiment with the teachings of Jesus Christ, as almost everything else has been tried and failed. I am no more a Christian than Pilate was; and yet I am ready to admit that after contemplating the world of human nature for nearly sixty years I see no way out of the world's misery but the way of Christ's Will.—George Bernard Shaw.

I am only one
But still I am one
I cannot do everything,
But still I can do something
And Because I cannot do everything
I will not refuse to do the something that I can do.
—Edward Everett Hale.

Do not think it a waste of time to submit to any influence that will bring upon you any noble feeling.—Ruskin.

There is at the core of all men something which the whole world of nature, of science and of art, is inadequate to fill; and this part of man is no mere adjunct of his nature, but his very most permanent and highest self. What this inmost part craves is sympathy, something like itself. Yes, high above it, none can answer it but God.—I. G. Shank.

I believe that character is essentially a by-product. If you try to make it directly you make a prig; but if you do your duty to mankind and your God, you make a character. And perhaps we are relieved of some elements of discouragement by the fact that the rush of circumstances maes it seldom possible to think about ourselves, and always necessary to think about the duty, immediately in hand, because if that is well done the character will take care of itself.—Woodrow Wilson.

Power.

Marvellous is the fact that all the riches of power are put at the command of our prayer. All its wealth stoops to supply and be subservient to our honest need.

"Thus saith the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, and his maker: Ask of me of things to come concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my etaoinu command ye Me."

What need of ours today is too heavy for that power? Can great or small have any meaning here? What does it signify to the sea whether you launch a pleasure boat or a fleet of battleships on its power? It carries them all as a little thing. What does it signify to God today whether our need is small or great, whether it is a child saying, "I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to keep"—that little soul, or whether it is John Knox laying a kingdom, or David Livingstone a continent on His power? Can we not safely cast all our care on such riches?

INVENTORY

We are well into the new year now, past the holiday rush of selling and buying, hopes and disappointments, happy surprises, pleasures, worries, good resolutions. This is about the right time—the beginning of the Lenten Season—to take inventory of ourselves. If a business man is careless or self-deceptive in counting up and making inventory of assets and liabilities, stock on hand and values, or if he neglects entirely consideration of what he has done in the year gone and owns and owes and plans for the coming months, we call him foolish and know he is headed for failure, if not disgrace. A large proportion of us who would join promptly in such judgment on somebody else are too slothful or cowardly to make fair and honest account of our own spiritual, moral, mental and general progress, possessions and positions.

What did we gain or lose in 1928 in the most serious and important business in which human beings can engage, the real purpose of our lives? Each of us used a year of time and life. What have we to show for it? Each of us is a year older and has a year less to live than at this time last February. Are we a year better or worse? The question surely is vitally important and for honest and intelligent answer demands not only courageous self-examination, but careful inspection and introspection and thought in the light of our religion and of sound philosophy. We can not judge correctly by material results or the outward and visible occurrences and conditions. We are moving toward an unseen, permanent existence of which we have perfect assurance, but vague comprehension, in which we know the course of the spiritual, inward part of us will determine our place. Some of us who are richer in dollars and higher in human estimation than we were a year ago are far lower in the sight of God, from whom no secrets may be hid, and in our own sight if we can be brave enough to face frank self-examination. Some of us who are poorer in dollars and have less of public regard and consideration are vastly higher and richer in accumulation of endless and untroubled wealth which the busy moths of greed and selfishness, or the eating rust of self-indulgence and self-satisfaction may not corrupt. It is a fact, clear to all who have will power to force themselves to look and think beyond the day and beneath the surface, that often what seem to be our most grievous losses in this life are our most glorious gains for the life to come and for the remainder of our sojourn here; and that what seem our most brilliant achievements prove apples of Sodom, turning to bitter ashes on our lips and bringing woe.

"Experience," says Dr. Franklin, "keeps a dear school, but fools will learn at no other." How much new wisdom have we gathered from our experiences and observations in 1928? How carefully have we studied our own failures and losses and disasters and acquirements and successes and those of others, to learn from them? And what stock of knowledge and caution, courage and purpose, have we gathered? How much can we congratulate ourselves, sincerely, on what we have won, when we realized how it was won? How earnestly have we humbled ourselves in gratitude and how faithfully and usefully have we shared bounties vouchsafed to us? One of the noblest utterances ascribed to any man is that put by Shakespeare in the mouth of King Henry V, among the greatest and manliest of English kings, after his marvellous victory at Agincourt:

> "And be it death proclaimed through our host
> To boast of this, or take the praise from God
> Which is His only."

But temptation to boast of ourselves to ourselves and to proclaim to ourselves our own greatness when a great good comes to us, even from sources and causes entirely beyond our control, is too powerful for many of us to resist. Heart-searching and inventory is one of the hardest of all tasks. When we begin it we find ourselves nimbly and cunningly filching bits of self-laudation, thrusting aside mistakes, hiding from ourselves qualms of conscience, thoughts and acts which shame us when seen naked.

As from our losses and failures we may learn much, so from our deepest griefs we may grow the sweetest flowers of resignation, consecration and hope, their fragrance to live in our souls, to be exhaled in kindliness and gentleness and mercy, rich or poor, high or humble, as we may be. Sacrifice of our vanities and lusts and ignoble desires and base passions on altars of Jehovah will be acceptable always in His sight. Our New Year resolutions, when we made them, included such sacrifices. How often and how far have we made them in the first month of the year? Take honest inventory. Then look to the year most of which is ahead of us and yet ours, to use or misuse, to be filled with good work or wasted. We can not recall the past. Some of the evil we have done can be cured, much of it never can be. Much of the good we have tried to do has failed, so far as we can see. The question for us now is whether we shall make this year better and cleaner and higher for ourselves and more useful than any that have gone before. Burns, born poet and, therefore, born philosopher, advises:

> "On care and troubles set your thought
> E'en when your end's attained;
> And all your plans may come to naught
> Where ev'ry nerve is strained."

The care and trouble may yield the finest fruits of life, will do so if used rightly. The baffling of plans and efforts may bring the highest blessings here, may give us very great reason for thankfulness—it has happened so sometimes in most lives—and, in any event, if rightly accepted and used will surely bring beautiful reward hereafter. We cannot know the purposes of the Omnipotent in directing the destinies of nations or individuals or of any of our undertakings. We can, with Divine help, fervently invoked, make our troubles blessings and share our joys with all about us. From our sins we can learn watchfulness, less trust in ourselves, closer and more constant dependence on the Power that helps and guards and guides and saves.

It is the fashion now to sneer at Longfellow as commonplace. Magazines and newspapers bore us continually and cruelly with productions lamentably limping in grotesque measures, obviously squeezed painfully from very thin and coarse and shallow and arid minds, redolent of the sewer, smeared with ill-smelling smut, purporting to be poetry and tremendously artistic and modern; the more incomprehensible the more artistic. These producers give us long, dreary, meaningless essays to prove that Longfellow and the others of his school and kind were not poets and not artistic. Maybe they were not, but there is both rhyme and reason in the simple verse which everybody may understand and remember:

> "Not enjoyment and not sorrow
> Is our destined end or way;
> But that each succeeding morrow
> Find us further than today."

Not poetry, perhaps, and not art; but a valuable addition to any stock of thought. Find us further—further upward; further in zeal to serve God by expressing in our daily lives, in all we do and say and think, the spirit of the Saviour of mankind by trying to help and uplift and purify mankind, to alleviate affliction, soothe sorrows, guide the wandering, rescue the falling and endangered, pour healing in the wounds of the stricken and wronged. The weakest and poorest may do something always—something which may look to be very little and futile, but which will loom large in the Eternal sight and the far future. All the aid the strongest and richest can give is needed in the long battle for righteousness, for the coming of God's kingdom, the doing of His will on earth as it is done in Heaven, so that this world may become like Heaven. If you do not know how or when you can work and do, or do more than you ever have done, consult your pastor. He has need always of more cordial, generous cooperation than he ever has received, more readiness of the laity to uphold his arms. Consult your conscience on what you have done, what you have deserved, what you have received. Make the inventory honest as the sensible and honest merchant or banker makes his; and learn from the showing made new resolution that each of the coming morrows shall find you further onward toward the prize of your high calling.

Fragility of the New Year resolution, born of remorse that is born of the retrospection and the varied memories and associations of the season, is a favorite joke; and justly so. Those of us who are sincere in trying to be faithful Christians—followers of Christ, the Lord—will make our penitence for past misdeeds and neglects the parents of future good deeds and earnest, constant service and beseech the Father in Heaven to help us add abundantly to our spiritual wealth and the stock of memories of good done and evil conquered with which we may go into another year; or, if it be so ordered, to the ending of years and the beginning of the life not to be measured by years or troubled by fears or changes, tribulations or temptations.

Alfred B. Williams.

WHAT IS HAPPENING AT CALVARY CHURCH IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK

By Amelia S. Reynolds

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH THE SAINTS?

AS Chairman of the Committee on Information of Calvary Church and a member of the Staff, it is a part of my job to show Calvary House, and to answer questions. This place where most of us live and all of us work, is interesting to outsiders not only because its rooms are beautiful, but because of the purpose for which it was built. It was built that the staff might live in close fellowship and through such living, create an atmosphere in which people coming to us for help might see some reflection of the things about which we talk.

All kinds of people come! The only kind not represented yet which the old rhyme mentions are Indian chiefs. If one of them has been around, it hasn't leaked out! Lately there has been a run of church saints, not listed as such for they fall into every group. We all know them, lovable, unselfish, hard working, but unable to translate what they live by, into terms comprehensible to other people. I have stated a real problem to a church saint and been answered by a text. The text was a wonderful one but I didn't know what to do about it. A boy speaking of such an one said in despair the other day, "She's a beautiful character, but what good does that do me!" It didn't do him any good, it only made goodness seem more inaccessible than usual.

Early one morning this month the Rector called me on the telephone.

"There's a fellow here that I wish you could talk to. He wants to know how to win people, and I'm swamped today."

He proved to be an attractive young man, a student chaplain in one of the great universities. At the General Convention he had heard that at Calvary we believe that the chief job for all of us is bringing individuals to definite decisions for Christ. He wanted to know how we went about it. He was intelligent, humble, and full of eagerness to serve his Master. He began by telling me that he was deeply concerned with the problems of half a dozen young men, but that facing these problems he could find no solution. "What would you advise a man who—" and he outlined the story of Tom as he knew it. I had no rule of thumb by which I could measure off a specific solution for a specific problem and hand it to him, but in order to get at the man's own problem it was necessary first to let him empty his mind of the immediate thing that troubled him. His attention was on somebody else's life; mine was on his.

In order to give, we must first ourselves possess. What had he to give Tom? That had to be determined. Had he had himself an experience of Christ? Had he surrendered his will and his life to the will of God? Did he know how to find out that will, if he had determined to follow it? We had just met. Even so gentle a person would have resented such questions. Yet time was short—he was going home in a few days.

"Have you shared your own experience with Tom?" I asked.

"Oh, yes," and with a radiant look in his eyes he said, "I have told him about Christ," then the look dulling, "but he didn't seem to get anything out of it." This generation is quickly bored with what is theoretical: but they are keen about what happens. It would have been theoretical to tell him this! So without explanation or apology, or preface, I shared a problem of my own youth. He forgot the boy that he had been talking about and said eagerly:

"That is a struggle with me, but I never thought of it as a sin. You did call it a sin?" I had. We talked the morning through. Things that had been locked up for years in the back of his mind came out into the light, nothing very black or dreadful, but excess luggage all of it: things which he had always refused to think about frankly, but which when faced got out of his way. Confession is an old word for this kind of talk, and I like better the word sharing. Whatever the name, the form of experience is the same.

It developed that when he was eleven years old he had had a religious awakening, the comfort of which had never left him. He talked about being guided, and in the same breath said that he wanted only to do the unselfish thing, "but when you do, sometimes the situation is balled up worse than ever." I remembered that "There is a way which seemeth right unto a man . . ."

When he had finished college he started in business only to give it up because the pull of a life devoted to religious work was too strong. He had no regrets for the decision, but the work that he was doing, while it was religious in name, was in fact little more than friendly service. Guidance came to me clearly that because he had never thought through his experience of God, he could not use it in the lives of other people. It was my job to help him to do this. For the sake of other people we had to discover what had happened to him. He enthusiastically agreed to this. We went over his life year by year. We came finally to the time when the issue of marriage had begun to loom large and he exclaimed joyfully:

"Now I know. I never realized it, but I surrendered to God one morning when I was tying my necktie in front of a mirror! I was getting sick and tired of thinking about girls. I couldn't get them out of my thoughts. I couldn't have a friendship with a girl because I looked each one over to see if she was a possible wife." He grinned engagingly. "You don't know how distracting it is to have so many possible wives!"

This form of day-dreaming had hindered his work, it had spoiled his relationship with girls and it had dulled the edge of his interest in action. He went on.

"As I looked at myself that morning I knew I wanted to be done with that kind of thing and I gave to God the direction of my thoughts and with them I gave Him my whole self to use." The backbone of the habit was broken that day, he told me.

"I am surrendered," he said triumphantly, but then came again the clouded look. Why wasn't he winning people, he asked, or even definitely helping them? I told him that what he had shared with me was a common problem of all young people, and that his experience of the surrender of his whole life including that problem was the solution for that and every other problem; that instead of worrying because Tom occasionally got drunk, he needed, after Tom had faced such specific sins as they together could dig up, to reproduce in Tom his own experience of surrender. This man loved Christ and had surrendered to Him, but he had never faced what had happened to him. Even now when he had faced it, he still hadn't the slightest idea what to do with it. It had never occurred to him to share it.

Somewhere along the line I had said that he must get guidance on exactly what to say to Tom; this he now picked up with enthusiasm for it was going to be fun to disagree with me after so much agreement.

"I don't see how a man can be guided all the time, even in his words," he said.

"What's the good of being surrendered to God's will, if you haven't any way of finding out what His will is?" I asked.

He saw it like a shot, and that was the end of the interview with me. Later he talked to other members of the staff, including Mr. Shoemaker, and the night he started home he told me that he was keeping Quiet Time; that guidance was beginning to come. Before he left, in a Thursday night group he gave his testimony, pointed now into a wedge that will reach the inner places of men's lives. His students will listen to him now when he talks religion, for a God who can clean up your problems for you, is an interesting God to hear about.

My next saint came along in a few days. She was a woman of sixty, I should judge, who had loved God and sought and followed His guidance in all the major affairs of life. It had been a life of sorrow and sacrifice. Death had come ten years before to her beloved husband. There had been another long illness in the family, and finally the nursing for years of her mother who lived to a great age. Now suddenly for the first time since she was grown up, her time was her own.

"I have come," she said, "because I was told that at Calvary I might find out what to do with the rest of my life." I suggested that she come to the Women's Group, and she said:

"I am going away next week, and for this week my hostess has filled my time." It seemed like my last chance at her. Guidance came clearly to tell her my story. She listened with absorbed interest to how another woman with fifty years of life behind her had found a whole new life through guidance. She sat very still—a pregnant silence. "I have never thought of seeking guidance in small things. Perhaps He means me to give up my visits, and come to live near Calvary, so that I can learn to do for other people what you are doing for me."

The next day came this letter: "My hope and faith have always been in my Lord and Saviour, yet I fear I have not been a profitable servant, and all that you have said will help me to find out why. If there be some further surrender to make, I believe He can show me. I do want to find some way to help His Kingdom, and it seems to me your group has found a way. I shall come to you again if I may, and try to learn."

The saint who stands out most clearly in my mind, is a very great gentleman indeed. He has done distinguished field work in his communion and is beloved wherever he goes. I shall never forget his standing up in a Calvary group meeting at the General Convention in Washington and paying his debt to the crowd that had helped him. He told of how he had been touched by the directness and the contagious honesty of a lot of young people with whom he had spent a week during a religious houseparty. He had never seen anything like the kind of fellowship which they had with each other and which they shared with him. Neither his age nor his eminence could shut him out. He was at home with them, a familiar. One night after a Quiet Time when guidance had been shared, he went to his room and thought the thing out. All his life he had depended on guidance. All he was and had, he had given long ago to God. He had tried always faithfully and lovingly to serve Him. What did that crowd of young people have, that he lacked? He knew there was something. He turned to prayer. "It came to me quite clearly," he said, "that there was a habit not wrong in itself but wrong for me because no matter how I tried I couldn't get rid of it, where I was defeated: here was a place where God did not have control. On my knees I confessed to God my lack of faith and asked Him to take that habit out of my life. The habit went. That was the end of it," he said. Here was a man outstanding in the church, of saintly life who happily, gratefully, thanked God for the group which had shown him that He is as interested to help us in our smallest weaknesses as in our greatest needs. He had a clearer vision than ever he had before, of a God-directed life.

I used to think of people like these as finished products, but as I look about me at the people that I have known only in the two years since my own conversion, it's amazing how they have changed and grown in that short time. The finest of them realize that they are only a very short way on the up grade toward God, and like the three people I have described they face the sin of whatever hinders them on the climb, get rid of it, and that much less handicapped, go on His way. And this happens at sixty as well as at twenty-seven—or any other age.

TO WHOM SHALL WE GO?

Reverend Canon G. Osborne Troop, D. D.

MY object in this article is to give some reason for my own unreserved conviction that, in the perfection of both natures, Jesus Christ is God and Man in one unchanging and unchangeable Divine Personality. I am writing first as a Christian to my fellow Christians; and in spite of the supposed "assured results" of modern criticism, I venture to assume the absolute integrity of all the sacred Scriptures of both Testaments, as a unique Revelation from the One Living and true God. For more than sixty years I have given myself increasingly to the study of the internal evidence of the Scriptures, and I find the witness of the Bible to itself peculiar and overwhelming. Above all, my own heart and life and conscience are searched out and convicted by the unsparing light thrown upon them by the sacred writings. Self is revealed as not only ruined and impotent, but as an incorrigible traitor and enemy to God. Fallen and devolving, I find myself in the white light of the Divine countenance a lost sinner, in utter and inexpressible need of a Saviour. Such a Saviour I find revealed in the very Garden of Eden, where Jehovah appears in the character of the Good Shepherd, coming forth in search of His two lost sheep. That vision in the Garden grows in glory, until in unparalleled sublimity it shines from the Manger, the Cross, the Empty Tomb, and the Throne of the Infinite and victorious Redeemer. In all simplicity and godly sincerity we behold "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ".

An Appeal to Hebrew Readers.

Beyond the circle of Christian believers, I would further appeal from my heart to Hebrew readers of the Old Testament, in which we rejoice together; and I would gratefully remind them that it is through the line of faithful Hebrew witnesses that we have received not only the Old Testament, but also the New. The first Christians were all of the Hebrew race, and they did not cease to be Hebrews by becoming Christians. The New Testament is the logical completion of the Old, and the Hebrew Christian is, as Disraeli said, "the completed Jew". Every enlightened Christian is the grateful friend, moreover, of his Hebrew brother in the holy ground of our relation to the one Messiah. Fresh light is thrown upon this sacred relationship by the recent birth of the International Hebrew Christian Alliance, with Sir Leon Levison as its President-in-Chief. Such an organization is a new and extraordinary event in Christian history, without a parallel since the days of the Apostles. Its membership embraces Hebrew Christians from many different countries in the modern world. It exists, to use its own remarkable expression, "to present Christ to the Jew, and to interpret the Jew to the Church". It is thus a glorious link between Jew and Gentile, in remarkable fulfilment of the prophetic Scriptures. It would seem a glorious forerunner of the fulfilment of the promise through Isaiah 27, verse 6: "In days to come Jacob shall take root, Israel shall blossom and bud, and they shall fill the face of the world with fruit."

To go one step further, I would boldly appeal to all men, without distinction of race or creed, to give me a fair hearing, as I endeavor to unfold the interest of humanity in the Scriptures, wherein is revealed a stainless Hero, Who "tasted death for every man". He loves every sinner better than His own life, because He laid down that life upon the bitter Cross that every believer in Him might not perish, but live eternally.

To proceed, then, to the heart of my subject, let me say quite frankly that I find it impossible to eliminate the supernatural from the Bible, for, as it is clearly the revelation of God, it must of necessity be inseparably interwoven with the supernatural. What can be more astounding, for example, than the fact, witnessed by both Testaments, that men and women with like passions with ourselves actually heard the Voice of the living God, uttering from the midst of fire-crowned Sinai the actual words of the Ten Commandments? Let us ponder, seriously, and without prejudice, the searching question of Moses recorded in Deuteronomy 4, verse 32:

"For ask now," he says, "of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and from the one end of Heaven to the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is or hath been heard like it? Did ever people hear the Voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live?"

The Tenth Commandment.

Assurance of this amazing fact is strengthened by the reflection that such a man as Moses could never have been so foolish as to give to the people of Israel the Tenth Commandment. No human law-giver would dare to forbid people to covet; for by so doing he would make himself a laughing-stock. It is obvious that God alone can call men to account for breaking the Tenth Commandment, for coveting lies hidden in the human heart beyond the reach of mortal eye. The Tenth Commandment deals with the secrets of the heart, and thus becomes in itself the key to the Decalogue; a key applied to the lock long afterward by our Lord Himself in the Sermon on the Mount.

Nor was the Voice heard on Mount Sinai, a mere inward voice like that of conscience; for the same Voice was heard by the boy Samuel, who three times over was persuaded that it was the voice of the aged Eli, calling him to service.

Moreover, the Voice was also heard at the Saviour's baptism in the Jordan in the imperishable words, "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased". And it is of striking import that the same voice is heard in the Transfiguration, as recorded by all three Evangelists, with the weighty addition—"Hear ye Him". The eternal Father Himself thus cries in mortal hearing—"This is My beloved Son . . . . Hear ye Him."

Nor should we forget the carefully considered words of St. Peter in his second Epistle, where he says, as if in anticipation of modern criticism: "We did not follow cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; but we were eye-witnesses of His Majesty, For He received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came to Him such a voice from the excellent glory: 'This is My Beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased'. And this voice we ourselves heard come out of Heaven, when we were with Him on the holy Mount."

No modern theory of the Kenosis can ever do away with this solemn and binding imprimatur of the Living God: "This is My Beloved Son . . . hear ye Him." Humble believers, loyally accepting that Voice, feel under Divine obligation to receive with reverence and awe every utterance of the Incarnate Son as authoritative and final. Moreover, the Lord Jesus Christ Himself says when standing before Pilate: "To this end was I born, and to this end came I into the world, that I might bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth, heareth My Voice."

When we honestly face the sure and certain coming and kingdom of our Saviour and our Judge, it is of the greatest comfort to recall the testimony of St. John in the twelfth chapter of his Gospel. He there records that on a certain occasion the Lord Jesus suddenly cried: "Father, glorify Thy Name!" Instantly the Voice of the Father repeated—"I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again." We see in this memorable incident that our Lord was within speaking distance of His Father all the time; and so are we, if we are only willing to take the comfort of it. Not that we shall necessarily hear the audible Voice, but we shall be heard by that holy Ear, which is open, indeed, to our faintest whisper, and we shall be comforted by the Holy Spirit within.

Saul of Tarsus heard the Voice of the risen and glorified Saviour, in the hour of his amazing conversion. "I heard a voice," he says, "saying unto me in the Hebrew language, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?' . . . And I said, 'Who art Thou, Lord?' And the Lord said, 'I am Jesus, Whom thou persecutest'." It is easy to deny, but impossible really to evade this testimony, in the face of the after life of this noble man, Christ's specially chosen ambassador to the world. To us, who believe, the Resurrection of Christ is thus made a certainty.

In addition to this, we find in the Revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ to St. John, Chapters 2 and 3, that the glorified Saviour says seven times over with peculiar solemnity—"He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." So the Voice of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit is revealed as one and the same voice in regard to its binding authority over mankind. The Voice of the Holy Spirit is God's third and last appeal to man, and to reject that appeal is to involve ourselves in utter darkness.

Nothing can exceed the solemnity of the charge given in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Chapter 12:

"See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh, for if they escaped not when they refused Him that warned them on earth, much more shall not we escape who turn away from Him that warneth from Heaven; Whose voice then shook the earth; but now He hath promised, saying, 'Yet once more will I make to tremble not the earth only, but also the Heaven'. And this word, 'Yet once more' signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that have been made, that those things which are not shaken, may remain. Wherefore receiving a Kingdom that cannot be shaken, let us have grace, whereby we may offer service well pleasing unto God with reverence and awe for our God is consuming fire."

In this great passage we see that everything that can be shaken, and ought to be shaken, is to be shaken, that the Kingdom that cannot be shaken may come to light, and stand forever.

How wonderful that Christ, to whom God has entrusted the eternal destiny of mankind, is not only the Judge, but the Infinite Redeemer, who "tasted death for every man". Such love is enough to break a heart of stone. Who ever heard on earth of a judge who died for the criminal standing before his bar? "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!"

An Infidel's Testimony.

I cannot do better than close with the touching words of Monsieur Lorridar, an educated French infidel, writing from the trenches in the Great War, where he was face to face with the naked horrors of sin and death.

"How awful," he says, "are the wounds of a nation, in which not one healing drop of the wonderful balsam of the Saviour's precious blood seems to flow! I can no longer remain an infidel! I have deceived myself, and deceived those of you who have read my books and sung my songs. It was a great deception; it was a frenzy; it was a wild dream. France, France, turn back again to the faith, to thy most beautiful days! To be forsaken of God means to be lost. I do not know whether I shall live till tomorrow; but I feel I must tell it to my friends, and say to them that I dare not die a denier of God. It is not the fear of death, but, rather, that God lives, and that I separated myself from Him. My soul rejoices over the hour when I was able to kneel down, and say—'I believe in God! I believe! I believe! I believe.' This word (believe) is the morning star of the human race. For him who knows nothing about this, it is still night."

We have surely reached an answer to our question. Like Peter of old, we are constrained to cry: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

It is impossible for honorable man to deny all this accumulated evidence, except by rejecting the Scriptures altogether. We cannot have it both ways. I trust, therefore, that we shall all conclude, that wherever we turn, from Genesis to Revelation, we are face to face with God, and that His Son Jesus Christ is our all in all. To Father, Son, and Holy Spirit be the glory forever and ever.

A Message From The Bishops To The Clergy

Note.—This letter from the Bishops to the Clergy was adopted by the House of Bishops, to be printed and sent to the several Bishops, to be issued to their clergy at their discretion.

After fifteen years of careful study the Church is authorizing for use in public worship a revised and enriched Book of Common Prayer.

This book is now the only authorized manual set forth by this Church for acts of corporate worship. It would seem that the completion of this work is an occasion for a special message and affectionate appeal from us as your appointed spiritual leaders.

One of the most conspicuous perils in modern American life is a tendency to put an undue emphasis upon personal liberty, and to pay little respect to what has been set forth by duly constituted authority. There is need in the Church as in the State to sound a call to loyalty. Your Bishops, assembled in triennial session, make an appeal for a loyal recognition of our common obligation to render generous obedience in observing in their integrity the provisions of our enriched Book of Common Prayer.

Such loyalty does not, of course, preclude, as occasions may require, special services as provided for in the rubrics of the Prayer Book or authorized by the Bishops; but it does demand of the authorized Ministers of the Church obedience to the rubrical directions of its authorized book of worship, as at all times binding upon priest and people. These rubrics and the various offices of the book are the solemn expression of the mind of this Church. To ignore or disregard them, or to set them aside and substitute other forms for them, is an obvious violation of the Church's law and order. We protest against the tendency towards an exaggerated individualism and eccentricities in devotional practice.

Doubtless Bishops have been partly responsible in permitting irregularities and in adopting a policy of undue toleration. The liberty of experimental usage allowed during the period of Revision should now cease.

This exaggerated individualism is found not merely in matters of devotional practice. We hear on every side from the laity of their distress and disturbance over what they call a distorted conception of the liberty of prophesying. We are all of us Christian ambassadors, with a definite message, and we of the House of Bishops call upon the clergy to seek, with prayerful care and pastoral affection, so to present their message as to make clearly apparent its loyalty to the teaching of the Church and to our Christian tradition and heritage.

We feel justified in making this special appeal, because this General Convention has shown a singular harmony of spirit, with a considerateness of the conscientious scruples of others, and an affectionate desire to accommodate divergent views. In nothing was this more apparent than in the work of revision of the Prayer Book.

All undue license of individual practice disturbs the life of the Church, and prevents the Church from giving a consistent witness to Christian Unity. Such a witness, we believe, this Church is in a peculiarly happy position to bear, and it is one of our greatest privileges and opportunities in this day when the call to Unity is sounding with renewed insistence.

WE BELIEVE THAT THOU SHALT COME

By Kenneth Mackenzie

MORE fascinating than any drama conceived in the mind of man is the mystery of God's purpose for this sin-wracked world. The true Gospel brings millennial blessedness into the hearts of all believers in the Son of God, incarnate, crucified, resurrected and ascended. But marvellous to say, the great heart of Deity compassionately regards the myriads who do not believe, multitudes because they have not heard. And His mind of consideration for all the factors which make this world instinct with hope is the longing for the day when He may visit it with His salvation.

As we have noted, there is much confusion as to the impending events which will mark the beginning of this marvellous era. A disbelieving Christianity, complacently reasons, as was predicted, that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (2 Peter 3:4). Therefore, "Where is the promise of his coming?" Others indolently compose themselves with the assurance that He cannot come for centuries. And if He ever does come, the subject can have no intrinsic interest to the present generation. Others, with terror in their hearts, apprehend but the great wind-up in fire and destruction. But to the early Christians whom we are urged to emulate, it was "That Blessed Hope".

Unless our souls are fired with this ideality, based upon firm and unquestionable postulates, we miss the inspiration and unction which the doctrine is qualified to impart. As has been stated already, the New Testament concept is that every generation of believers should devoutly hold eyes heavenward and expectant. For from this attitude proceed a sense of obedience to our Lord's command to watch, incentives to service, absorption of affection for the Lord. Jesus and a commensurate purity of motive and life. If it were but an idle dream, it were profitable thereby for such a state of being and doing as should combine to effect in us the highest spiritual attainments. Therefore, as we are able to discern the rising of the curtain of the eternal mystery, we may well put ourselves into a receptive mind, not analyzing, criticizing, questioning; but in simple faith accepting the Word of God on its face value.

Preliminary, however, is the need to distinguish the variation between the revelation of the second advent as presented by St. Paul and that which seemed to be the concept of the first apostles. Unless this is noted perplexity will ensue. And St. Peter agrees that this problem existed in his day; that some things by St. Paul were hard to be understood, which the unstable could interpret wrongfully. So accepting this warning (2 Peter 3:15, 16), let us get the true balance.

The great apostle to the Gentiles insisted that the Gospel he delivered was not man-taught nor man-delivered, but by distinct revelation from the Lord Jesus to himself. He goes so far as to call it "my gospel", not comparative with or essentially modified by what others preached (Rom. 2: 16; 16:25; 1 Tim. 1:11; 2 Tim. 2:8). We take "a leap in the dark", as it were, by acceding to this; but if it be not so, the entire Pauline system of doctrine falls into chaos. And it is in the initial act of the divine drama that he asserts his prerogative of unfolding the order. In 1 Thess. 4:13-18, we accord attention to him as he insists that the program he is to unfold is

"By the Word of the Lord".

This is a complete departure from all other authorities and the decisive character of the claim leaves us no room for doubt of its authority. We do well to digest the entire passage, for the full elucidation of its deep and far-reaching import. Comforting the Thessalonian Christians, who were naturally confused as to the teaching, he proceeds to assure them that the things they are to look for are scheduled with accuracy and cannot fail of accomplishment. For he throws himself into the truth he affirms with the enthusiasm of unquestioning faith. A consensus of varied opinions, side-lights on the doctrine, he has no need of. And the historic Christian Church has stood with him in this singularity of commission; in the divinely conferred right to speak thus with accuracy and unbounded joy. Therefore, according to this passage, we are not to look for a cataclysm; but for the Lord, Himself, to take us heavenward to Himself. And we observe the order prescribed:

"The Dead in Christ Shall Rise First."

They are they, who having been with Him in the spirit world (Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 5:8), shall now take upon themselves the resurrection bodies of His own promising (John 5:28, 29). And it is becoming now to assert that the words, "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth" do not indicate a "general resurrection". For unquestionably this resurrection is unique, since only the saints in Christ are included. Our Lord speaks of "the resurrection" (Luke 20:35) implying a rank distinguishingly conferred. St. Paul expresses a longing to share in this honor, for the reading in Phil. 3:11, really signifies "the resurrection from amongst the dead". And there is an announced "first resurrection" in the partaking of which special blessedness is indicated (Rev. 20:6). Therefore, in the scene unfolded to the Thessalonian Christians, no consideration is paid to any company but "the dead in Christ". We must urge the acceptance of this primary truth for the sake of the subsequent teachings which are to follow and by which we shall be able to establish the reasonableness of the postulate.

We are now prepared to understand the words of our Lord to Martha. He qualifies Himself with a double office (John 11:25, 26), "the resurrection" and "the life". It is to those who have believed and have died that He will be the resurrection. It is to those who are ready for and present at His predicted descent from heaven that He will be "the life". And this is in full accord with the teaching of St. Paul in 1 Cor. 15:51-54. Here, he differentiates between the "corruptible body" the body which has died; and "mortal body" which has not passed through the portals of death. And everywhere in his use of the word "mortal" he holds to that idea. So then, the dead in Christ will be raised in their incorruptible bodies; the living saints will be translated, their mortal bodies becoming immortal. Hence

"We Which Are Alive and Remain Shall Be Caught Up".

And the incentive to this hope is the "meeting of the Lord". He wins us to His own passion (Phil. 1:21) in this exclamation of gladness and demonstrates the secret of that passion for His coming again, which was the last message given to the disciple Timothy, "there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me in that day; and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing" (2 Tim. 4:8). It were but a sordid incentive which longs for the coming of the Lord for the benefits which that august event will confer. Anything less than a consuming desire to be with the Lord is unworthy of those in whom the pulsations of the new life in Christ are operative. Those who long for and love His appearing engage in no mere selfish apprehensions of conferred honor or awarded prize. It is that they respond to His own cherishings uttered to His disciples the night of His betrayal, "I will come and receive you unto myself; that where I am ye may be also" (John 14:3). If He has such longings for us, we may well look to it that we meet Him on the ground of His heart-hunger for our companionship.

"So Shall we Ever be With the Lord" is, therefore, the exultant cry of the Apostle in this Thessalonian passage. Are we ready for this marvellous privilege? It is not a question of our worthiness; we have none. Nor yet our fruitage of effort in the work of the Church, though that is acceptable with Him. But of downright hunger for Himself. And no doubt in the case of many of us there will have to be a deal of spiritual housecleaning, ere we get to the condition of enthroning Him as supreme. But that is indeed the ulterior object of the persuasive teachings concerning His approach in the heavenlies. That "evil servant" ere he begins to beat his fellow-servants, finds eating and drinking and all for which an absorption in the present world stands, to possess him. And it is that he has lost the hope of his Lord's coming, so prevalent in our day by his initial pronouncement, "My lord delayeth his coming" (Matt. 24:47-51).

May we apply the illustration of the drawing power of the magnet? Let us for the purpose think of a box of mixed metals. All metals have an affinity for electrical conductivity; of lead or brass, which may be utilized in the transmission of the current. But of steel alone do we discover a quick response to the power of the magnet. We may liken ourselves to the several clasess of metals. There are believers who have the profession of the Christian faith, but lack a vital union with the Head of the Body. We do not legislate concerning them; they are here and we lovingly regard them. But the truth of which we are speaking has no charm for them, perhaps they are antagonized by it. There are other Christians, whose large possibilities of spiritual culture are undiscovered within them, because they do not "follow on to know the Lord" (Hosea 6:3). There are the steel Christians ever alive to the winsomeness of the mighty Magnet which is to draw them heavenward in this sovereign expression of His potency. They look for Him, are absorbed in Him and He is their very life and joy. And living thus in union with Him, looking eagerly for Him, they are the more fitted, if it must needs be, to enter the future life by the gate of death, to be with Him in the spirit-world.

FIRST SUNDAY IN LENT

Berkeley Minor

COLLECT.

O Lord, who for our sake didst fast forty days and forty nights; give us grace to use such abstinence, that our flesh being subdued to the Spirit, we may ever obey Thy godly motions in righteousness and true holiness to Thy honor and glory; who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

THIS Collect is one of only three addressed to the second Person of the Trinity, all the rest being to God the Father, except that familiar one in the office of Institution, addressed to the third person of the Trinity. What this "collects" from the Gospel for this day, is manifest, that Gospel giving us an account of Jesus' temptation in the wilderness, and there is also some connection with the Epistle, where it speaks of the ministry approving themselves as the ministers of God, in trials and tribulations, and in fastings. The petition is so worded as to bring out very forcibly the true end and object of fasting. The duty of fasting is nowhere commanded in so many words in the New Testament; but actions speak louder than words, and our Saviour's example, which is appealed to in the ascription to the collect and that of numberless saints both in the Old and New Testaments, and in all the centuries down to this day, show how important is this duty of such abstinence as the Church teaches us in this week of Lent to use.

In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus puts fasting along with such duties as alms-giving and prayer, telling His hearers how they should give alms and pray, and fast, in each case urging the importance of doing all three as in the sight of God, and not of men. They must avoid a sad countenance, and any appearance of self-satisfaction in fasting. They must not appear unto men to fast. The great end and object of fasting must be that subjection of the flesh to the Spirit by which alone the godly motions of the Holy Spirit may be obeyed in righteousness and true holiness, to the honor and glory of God. A good example of the faithful performance of these three duties of fasting and prayer and alms-giving, is found in the tenth chapter of the Acts, where we are told of the rich reward that came to the devout Centurion, Cornelius, for his faithful use of these means of grace. Luke says that Cornelius prayed to God always and told Peter he had been fasting until the ninth hour (i. e., till three in the afternoon), when the angel of God came to him. Let us, then, note carefully now at the beginning of Lent the "Table of Fasts and other days of Fasting, on which the Church requires such a measure of abstinence as is more especially suited to extraordinary acts and exercises of devotion.

THE Epistle is 2 Cor. 6:1-10. It teaches us "our position of grace, and the example of the saints. The meaning of the word "saint", as commonly used now, is different from its usual meaning in the New Testament. The word comes to us (through the French "saint" from the Latin "sanctus", holy, just, pure); and certainly all true Christians must deserve in more or less degree, to be so-called; but in the New Testament the name "saint" is applied not only to such eminently holy, just and pure Christians as the Apostles and Evangelists, but to all faithful followers of Christ, whether more or less endowed with these graces. We may say, then, that the word "saint" in the New Testament means simply a position of grace, one who has turned from the world to God, being accepted by Him in sonship, through Jesus Christ. In the strict meaning of the word the term "saint" refers to a believer's position, not to his condition.

Having this meaning of "saint" in view, we can better understand and appreciate our close relationship to the saints of St. Paul's time (and of all time), who tells us in the Epistle to the Ephesians (2:19-32): "Now therefore ye (we) are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God, and are built upon the foundation of the Apostles, and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief cornerstone in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth into a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye (we) also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit. . . ."

We then being "fellow-citizens" with these saints whose trials are set forth in our Epistle, are, like them, workers together with Him, our Redeemer, who knew no sin, yet was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him (2 Cor. 5:21). Surely if we do not our best to be really "workers-together with them", however humbly and feebly, we shall have received "the grace of God in vain". These are not times of persecution in which we live, so that we are not called upon "to minister to God's service" in some things which befell the saints of old, "in stripes, and imprisonments, in tumults"; yet in all the others enumerated by Paul (seventeen of them) we may (if we seek them) find opportunities to minister to God's service by them, such as, "in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in labors, in watchings, in purity, in knowledge, in long-suffering, in kindness, in (the lights of) the Holy Spirit, in love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, fighting with the weapons of righteousness, both for attack and defense, through good report and evil, through honor and through infamy".

THE Gospel for the First Sunday in Lent is St. Matt. 4:1-11, one of the three accounts given by the Evangelists of Jesus' temptation in the wilderness

Of the three-fold temptation it has been well said (by the Rev. Melville Scott) that in the first "Jesus was tempted to distrust His sonship; in the second to presume on His sonship; in the third to disloyal sonship". Jesus had a perfect trust in His Father, and would wait till in due time, after His long fast, God's angels should minister to Him, as they did, after Satan was completely foiled. In each temptation Jesus defends Himself with the offensive weapon of that Christian armor described by St. Paul in the sixth of Ephesians (v. 17): "The sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God"; the Word of God which was then only the Old Testament. Far more powerful now is this spiritual weapon, the New Testament being added; but Jesus' dexterous handling of this sword of the Old Testament only, by which His arch-enemy was completely routed and "departed from Him for a season" (Luke 4:13), shows that we must not, as some do now, undervalue that portion of God's Word, so efficacious here in resisting temptation.

In the second temptation Satan a second time asks Him to prove His sonship in a wrong way, by a presumptuous trust in His Father's care, by casting Himself down from a pinnacle of the temple, and even dares to imitate Jesus' use of Holy Writ to back up his impious suggestion, quotting from the Psalms: "God shall give His angels charge concerning Thee, and in their hands they shall bear Thee up, lest at any time Thou dash Thy foot against a stone" (Ps. 91:11-12). (Why did he leave out, "To keep Thee in all Thy ways?" I wonder.) But Jesus shows him how useless and foolish it is to attempt the use of a weapon which he had not proved by long practice, and tells him what Moses told Israel in Deut. 6:16: "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."

And in the third and last temptation, Satan seeks to make Jesus a disloyal Son to His Heavenly Father. He throws away his broken weapon, misquoted Scripture, which had failed him so badly, and seeking to make the Son of man and of God a disobedient and disloyal Son, appeals to His ambition and His patriotism, offering Him "all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them", for one single act of worship and allegiance to Him. To Jesus, who must have been taught by His mother and Joseph to expect in the coming Messiah a great earthly king and conquerer, and deliverer to His people, this must have been a great and strong temptation, as it has been to many a great and noble soul. How many great conquerors have yielded to it! But the Son of God, as if greatly moved, even to indignation by this insult to His Father, orders Satan instantly out of His presence with a final appeal to God's Word, which closed forever that question: "Get thee hence, Satan, for it is written; Thou shalt worship the Lord Thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve" (Deut. 6: 13).

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

I CHRONICLES.

This book, with II Chronicles, is placed last in the Hebrew Canon, being written after the captivity (1 Chron. 3: 16-24; 6:15).

Subject.

Here are chronicled the names of the "fathers" for whose sake Israel was beloved, and through whom Christ came.

In this book also, the Holy Spirit records God's love for Israel in raising up a man after His own heart to make preparation for building His Sanctuary in the midst of His people (Rom. 9:5; 11:28; Deut. 4:37, 38; 1 Samuel 13:14; Ex. 25:8; 1 Chron. 28:11, 12, 19, 20).

1. Chs. 1-9. Genealogy of the "fathers" in Israel from the time of Adam until the first inhabitants, the Priests, Levites, and Nethinim, dwelt in their possessions (Chs. 1:1; 9:2).

2. Chs. 10-16. Putting down of Saul, man's king, and setting up of David, God's king, who brought the Ark, God's throne, into Jerusalem (1 Sam. 13:14; Ps. 99:1).

3. Chs. 17-21. God's promise that David's son should build His House, and David's victories and pride (Chs. 17:11-13; 20:2; 21:1).

4. Chs. 22-27. David's preparation for building the Temple and appointment of the courses of Priests and Levites for ministry in the Temple of the Lord.

5. Chs. 28-29. David's message, by the Spirit, concerning the pattern of God's House, and his prayer of thanksgiving, leaving Solomon sitting on "the throne of the Lord" (Chs. 28:19; 29:23).

Our Church in Jerusalem and the East

By the Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., Bishop of Pennsylvania, and Canon of St. George's Cathedral in Jerusalem.

More English-speaking people visit the Holy Land today than at any period since the Crusades, and the number of American pilgrims to Jerusalem shows a steady increase from year to year. As at Christmas time we kneel in spirit at Bethlehem, so as we approach Good Friday we think of that "green hill far away—without a city wall".

It is interesting to note that the Church in Jerusalem is the only Mission where the entire Anglican Communion is united in supporting the work. In all parts of the world on Good Friday—wherever the Anglican Communion is represented—we will "pray for the peace of Jerusalem" and many congregations will follow the apostolic injunction and take up an offering for the "poor saints in Jerusalem". From the Church in England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, the United States, Canada, South America, Asia, Africa, Australia, New Zealand, these Good Friday offerings will be forwarded for work in the Holy Land.

The present non-resident Episcopal Canons of our Anglican Cathedral in Jerusalem are—after each we insert the name given to the stall assigned to him: The Bishop of London (Sion). The Archbishop of Capetown (Carmel). The Bishop of Calcutta (Tabor), The Archbishop of Huron (Gerizim), The Archbishop of Melbourne (Pisgah), and The Bishop of Pennsylvania (Hermon).

The institutions conducted by the Jerusalem and the East Mission are varied and interesting. St. George's Cathedral in Jerusalem, or Collegiate Church as it is officially called, is one of the best known places in Christendom. Four clergymen assist the Bishop at the Cathedral. Each of them is specially qualified to carry out one of the four stated objects of the Mission, i e., "Work among the Jews, the Moslems, our own people and the Eastern Churches." The Jerusalem and the East Mission maintains a staff of thirty Anglicans and many more native workers.

Besides the Cathedral is the Pilgrim Hostel, where we will all stop some day when we visit the Holy Land. Nearby also is the College for Men, and the College for Women, and St. George's School for Boys. Then there are the school at Bethany where Lazarus, Martha and Mary lived; the notable St. Luke's Hospital on the slope of Mt. Carmel at Haifa: the Girls' High School also at Haifa; and the mixed school for Druse boys and girls at Ain Anoub. In addition to these there is the missionary work carried on at many points under the supervision of Bishop MacInnes, and the old establishedments of the famous London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, better known as the C. M. J. (Church Missions to Jews). Most cordial relations exist with the ancient native Churches of the East and the established policy toward them of our Pan-American Mission is one of helpful cooperation. The jurisdiction of Bishop MacInness embraces Palestine, Trans-Jordania, Syria, Cyprus and part of Asia Minor.

Among the five hundred students in our schools and colleges in Jerusalem are Christians of every name, Mohammedans and Jews—all working, studying and living together in friendliness and brotherhood, and thus making a valuable contribution to distracted Palestine.

For all this work of the Jerusalem and the East Mission an annual appropriation of $15,000 is made by the National Council from the non-quota Good Friday Offering of our Church in the United States and its missions.

In addition to this the Good Friday Offering provides the entire support of our own American Educational Chaplains, one in Jerusalem and one in Mosul. More are needed elsewhere and asked for and will be sent as soon as the Good Friday Offerings provide adequate funds.

Our representative in Jerusalem is the Rev. C. Thorley Bridgeman, who is on the Bishop's staff of clergy. His primary duty as Educational Chaplain is to assist the Eastern Churches in training their theological students in their own seminaries. His presence and work has a far-reaching influence.

Jerusalem is the mother Church, the cradle of Christianity. Therefore, we in far-off America surely consider it a great privilege to have the opportunity to forward our work in the land of the Cross, by sharing in the Good Friday Offerings.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart," Ps. 119-11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by R. R. Hall, of Geneva, Ala.:

> "Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity."—1 Timothy 5:12.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

Book Reviews

THE NEW QUEST: By Rufus M. Jones, Litt. D., D. D., D. Theo., LL. D. The Macmillan Company, New York. N. Y.

This book is full of happily chosen phrases and of illuminating illustrations. The writer is one who can appeal to the mind of this generation. A mystic with a very real experience behind him, he nevertheless sees clearly that the most important part of the quest is not our search for God, but His for us.

He has the mystic's tendency to look upon his own experience as universal and to forget the realities of the case. An example occurs in his talk about the beyond, where he says "we care little to pry into the mysteries of the beyond", evidently leaving out of account Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir Artnur Conan Doyle and their numerous followers. He shares the common feeling against dogma. He might be a bit surprised to be asked to justify some of his own suppressed dogmatic assumptions.

What he means by outworn dogma is revealed by his dismissal of the Manger and the Empty Tomb. We regret that one who has been touched by so much of Christian teaching should deny the central facts of Christ's life—the ones that give meaning to it all. Wherever there is a true experience of God there will be mysticism, but even though mysticism has its head in the clouds, its feet should be upon the earth, and the only definite assurance we have that Christ can be "in us", the hope of glory, is the attested fact that He rose the third day. F. THE GRAPHIC BIBLE: By Lewis Browne. The Macmillan Company.

The Bible is ten times the length of the average work of fiction; the stretch of time covered by it is ten or fifteen centuries and its contents are not printed chronologically. Moreover its geography and that of its near neighbors is a No Man's Land to the average American boy and girl, youth and adult.

Lewis Browne has made a real contribution for the help of the layman (and average parson too for that matter) in compiling in his strikingly clear and simple manner this Graphic Bible with its eighty-odd charts. It is a path-finder that will enable those who feel most ignorant of things Biblical to travel with ease here through the pages from Genesis to Revelation. In a series of "animated maps", conceived and drawn with artistry and imagination, accompanied by a running narrative in swift and lucid prose, Lewis Browne recounts of the entire drama from Abraham to St. Paul in terms of space as well as of time. Although its purpose is not to take the place of Holy Scripture, it will be a great help in keeping the geography and history straight as we study the Bible. It makes the Scriptural narrative as real and vivid as Treasure Island. R.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS CHAPEL.

Mr. Editor:

The fact that I have not seen or read in the papers or periodicals any mention of any attempt having been made to start a movement toward the erection of a League of Nations Chapel (a House of Prayer for all Faiths), prompts me to write to ask if such a movement has not been considered and, if not, your idea as to the practicability of it.

It occurs to me that the establishment of a League of Nations Chapel erected in Geneva, Switzerland, would be fitting and proper. Earl Hopper.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

Mr. Editor:

On behalf of the Tuberculosis Prayer League, I wish to thank you most earnestly for our full length articles which you published some time ago; also for the thoughtfulness exhibited in sending us a copy of that number. We are very grateful.

On my own behalf I want to say that your paper is one of the best Christian papers I have ever read. Your stand for God's Word is bravely taken and warms one's heart. May richest blessing from the Father of our Lord Jesus rest upon your splendid witness bearing.

Out of many choice articles, two in the December 8 number were especially enjoyed, "Disappointment" on first page, and "Reading the Bible". I hope both of these will be reprinted in "Sunbeams".

As I do not know the address, will you add to your kindness by forwarding the enclosed letter to the American Mission for Lepers? I saw the article "Among the Lepers" in The Churchman.

BIBLE AS SERIAL STORY.

Mr. Editor:

I herewith enclose you a clipping from Onward of January 13, showing how a newspaper of Parker, S. D., published the Bible as a serial, and I hope you will take this up and make an effort to have other papers to do likewise.

There are millions of young Americans who are not permitted to read the Bible, but who would be glad to read it if afforded the opportunity where they could do it, without its being known, as they would be able to read it in the daily paper.

I am thoroughly convinced that if the young Americans will read the Bible that many of our greatest problems and difficulties will be solved because I am thoroughly convinced that no one can read the Bible without being helped because God has promised that His Word will not return unto him void.

Please urge your readers to have one chapter of the Bible printed in the daily papers every day.

Raymond M. Hudson.

EVOLUTION. INSPIRATION.

Mr. Editor:

Is not one simple question enough to knock the bottom cut of the infidel dogma of Evolution: if one alga or simian developed into a man, how can we account for all algae and simians not thus developing?

How sad to hear one profesisng to be a Christian attributing man's origin to "the slime of the sea", when God made man of the dust of the ground.

How easy to prove Evolution, unchristian, unbelieving. If man had come from a morally innocent ape he would not have a sinful nature, but God's word declares man to be "filthy", "drinking iniquity like water", "shapen in iniquity, conceived in sin".

Is it not unbelieving, as your correspondent further affirms, that the Bible containse the word of God, instead of being the word of God? Since its writers spoke as moved by the Holy Spirit, how can it be less than the word of God?

COUNCILS, CONVENTIONS, CONVOCATIONS

LOUISIANA.

The Ninety-first Annual Council of the Diocese of Louisiana was held in Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, on Wednesday and Thursday, January 23-24. In point of attendance it was one of the smallest for many years. The inspirational meeting held on Tuesday night was addressed by Col. A. T. Prescott of the L. S. U., who spoke of the work of the "Students' Center", what had been and what could be done there and elsewhere by such means; the Rev. D. H. Wattley spoke on "Social Service", and the Rev. E. S. Cooper on the Church's Mission.

The Council opened on Wednesday with a celebration of the Holy Communion, the Bishop being celebrant, and a sermon by the Rev. C. L. Monroe. The presence of the members of the Auxiliary at this service was most gratifying. The Rev. S. L. Vail was re-elected secretary.

Two white and two Negro clergy were welcomed to the diocese, the Rev. David E. Holt to be missionary-in-charge of the congregations at Lake Providence and Tallulah, to reside in the former place; the Rev. Ira Lang to be rector of St. George's Church (N. O.), and the Rev. John B. Boyce, rector of St. Luke's Church (N. O.), the Rev. St. J. A. Simpkins, superintendent of the Gaudet Normal and Industrial School.

One of the most important actions of the Council was that taken following the report of the committee appointed at Lake Charles to investigate the status of the Children's Home (N. O.). It was found that this property was held by a corporation outside of the jurisdiction of the Council, as at the time of the founding of the Home. The diocese was not incorporated, and so unable to hold property. By mutual agreement steps are being taken to bring the title to this Home over to the diocese, as it is a diocesan institution, and the necessary steps are being taken so as to safeguard the endowment which the trustees have been so many years accumulating, so that it cannot be alienated or dissipated.

An effort was made to establish a "Register" in the office of the Secretary of the Diocese in which may be placed the names of all communicants who after reasonable search cannot be located, so that the habit of "Dropping" them from the parochial lists may be done away with and the leakage which at times is very great, be obviated. This list will be of "unattached". A Committee was appointed to study this matter and report to the next Council, which will be held in St. James' Church, Baton Rouge. The meeting closed with a short address by the Bishop on Thursday night.

MARYLAND.

"Our Debt of Love," was the keynote of Bishop Murray's Convention address made to the One Hundred and Forty-fifth Maryland Diocesan Convention, on Thursday and Friday, January 31 and February 1, in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore.

The Bishop outlined three opportunities which lay before us—the South Florida and Porto Rico catastrophe, the new St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Japan, and the "promulgation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ in all the world", which is carried out through the Advance work of the National Church. "Our present initial duty," the Bishop said, "in the payment of this debt of our love is to maintain as fully as within us lies, all our present operations to that end."

Bishop Helfenstein's address was confined to diocesan affairs in which he stressed the necessity of adequate insurance on Church property and the problem of present salary standards.

Mr. Philip Huber Frohman, of the firm of Frohman, Robb and Little, Architects, gave a talk on the plans of the Maryland Cathedral.

The following elections were made:

Executive Council—The Rev. Messrs. A. B. Kinsolving, D. D., Douglass Hooff, Benjamin B. Lovett, D. D., Wm. A. McClenthen, D. D., John I. Yellott, D. D., S. Tagart Steele, D. D.; Messrs. Edward Guest Gibson, Takser G. Lowndes, Henry Barton Jacobs, Blanchard Randall, George C. Thomas, Albert G. Towers.

Standing Committee — The Rev. Messrs. Benjamin B. Lovett, D. D., Arthur C. Powell, D. D., Wm. A. McClenthen, D. D., S. Tagart Steele, D. D.; Messrs. Henry D. Harlan, Herbert M. Brune, Edward N. Rich, Dr. Joseph S. Ames.

Delegates to the Third Provincial Synod—The Rev. Messrs. C. A. Hensel, Douglass-Hoof, W. O. Smith, Jr., D. D., Roger A. Walke; Messrs. G. Herbert Boehm, A. H. Onderdonk, John G. Schilpp, Dr. Thomas Fell.

LEXINGTON.

The Thirty-fourth Council of the Diocese of Lexington opened with Holy Communion administered by Bishop Burton at nine o'clock Wednesday morning, January 30. This service, which was largely attended by local communicants, as well as the delegates to the Council, was followed by Bishop Burton's final address to his diocese. His valedictory was not a review of his work of thirty-three years, but was a brief though tender appeal to his diocese to elect his successor prayerfully and with due consideration to the importance of the office. He went on to say: "I quote from St. Paul's idea of a diocese because our diocesan motto, inscribed upon its armorial shield was adopted from it in the belief that the Apostle presented for any diocese a standard of excellence and an object for ultimate attainment. 'Only let your manner of life be worthy of the Gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you or be absent, I may hear of your state: that ye stand fast in one spirit with one soul striving for the faith of the Gospel. (1 Phil. 27). I express my profound gratitude to all in this diocese for their patience with me through the long period of my episcopate; but most of all, for the affectionate friendship that has been so generously accorded me and that from so many has found expression in kind words and generous deeds that are forever deeply engraved upon my heart of hearts."

Bishop Burton presided over the Council until the Rev. W. Dern, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Fort Thomas, was elected President of the Council, after which, not having chosen to exercise his vote, the Bishop retired. The Rev. Franklin W. Davis, rector of Trinity Church, Danville, was made Diocesan Secretary. He chose the General Missionary of the Diocese, the Rev. C. M. Lever, as his assistant.

The most important business before the Council was the election of a Bishop to succeed Bishop Burton, retired. Nominations before the Council were Dr. H. P. Almon Abbott, rector of St. Chrysostom's Church, Chicago; Dr. Edmund P. Dandridge, Nashville, Tenn.; the Rev. Henry D. Phillips, D. D., Columbia, S. C.; the Rev. H. O. Boon, Paris, Ky.; and the Rev. S. Rogers Tyler, Huntington, W. Va. Very shortly the election rested between Dr. Abbott and Dr. Dandridge. Though eight ballots were taken before the final election of Dr. Abbott, the entire election was characterized by friendly rivalry between the supporters of each nominee. At Dr. Abbott's election it was moved and seconded by delegates who had favored Dr. Dandridge, that the election be recorded as unanimous. The Rev. James D. Gibson and the Rev. Theodore S. Will (the latter being the nominator of Dr. Abbott), were made a committee of two to inform Dr. Abbott of his election over long distance. This committee shortly reported that Dr. Abbott gratefully accepted the great challenge and that he asked for the prayers of the Council and Diocese.

Routine matters were attended to on Thursday, January 31, the Council adjourned about four o'clock.

Standing Committee Elected: Rev. J. D. Gibson (chairman), Rev. Charles Stuart Hale (secretary), Rev. Theodore S. Will, Dr. W. B. McClure, Mr. W. W. Pettis and Mr. Herbert Jackson. This committee is thoroughly representative of the entire diocese.

Dr. Abbott, bishop-elect, is forty-seven years old and a native of Canada. His theological preparation at King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, has been followed by a ministry of brilliant achievement both spiritually and materially. His election to the House of Bishops is a logical, crowning of his career.

A prelude to the Council was a mass meeting held in the Cathedral Tuesday night, January 29, which was addressed by the Rt. Rev. Charles E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop of Kentucky. Mr. John Marston, Jr., Executive Secretary of the Church's Program for the Diocese, made a preliminary talk concerning the program for this triennium, explaining the increase of assessments and the good reasons therefor. Bishop Woodcock then made a most stirring appeal for personal devotion and loyalty to one's parish and diocese.

HARRISBURG.

Harrisburg, Pa.—A Special Convention of the Diocese of Harrisburg convened in St. Stephen's Church, Harrisburg, on Tuesday and Wednesday, February 5 and 6, to elect a Suffragan Bishop for the Diocese of Harrisburg, resulted in a deadlock. On the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh ballots, the Rev. Archibald M. Judd, for the past nine years Executive Secretary of the Diocese of Harrisburg, received a majority vote in the Clerical Order, but failed to receive the necessary majority in the Lay Order. For several ballotings, the Rev. Nathaniel B. Groton, of Whitemarsh, Pa., led in the Lay Order, but failed to receive a majority vote. On the twelfth ballot the Rev. Mr. Judd and the Rev. Mr. Groton, the leading candidates, received exactly the same number of votes in the Lay Order, while Mr. Judd continued to maintain his strong lead in the Clerical Order. The Rev. Dr. Oscar F. R. Treder, rector of St. Stephen's, Harrisburg, declined nomination, but nevertheless received scattered votes throughout the election. After several ballots the Rev. Charles E. McCoy and the Rev. Lewis Nichols withdrew their names. The Very Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, who had not been nominated at the opening of the Convention, loomed as a strong candidate on the twelfth ballot. Others nominated were the Rev. Hiram R. Bennett, the Rev. Howard W. Diller, the Rev. Charles E. Knickle, and the Rev. Malcolm DePui Maynard. On motion the Convention adjourned, and a new election for Suffragan Bishop will be held in connection with the Diocesan Convention at Williamsport next May.

In his address to the Convention Bishop Darlington alluded to the fact that many of the delegates had expressed a desire to have one of his sons in the ministry elected as his assistant. He stated that while he appreciated the loyalty and affection of his people during the twenty-four years of his episcopate, it was his wish that none of his sons be considered for the office. A new canon was adopted fixing the salaries of rectors of parishes at a minimum of $2,100 and residence.

Church Intelligence

Bishop Burleson Appointed.

The Presiding Bishop has appointed his assessor, Bishop Burleson, as bishop-in-charge of the missionary district of Honolulu. Bishop Burleson plans to return to Hawaii directly after Easter, to make a visitation of the parishes and missions, spending probably about two months in the Islands.

Let Us Pray.

The Rev. Charles M. Lever, B. D., General Missionary in the Diocese of Lexington, is conducting a special mission at Beattyville, for ten days beginning Ash Wednesday. He requests prayer on the part of our readers for God's blessing upon the mission.

Mr. Lever also in sending a year's subscription to The Southern Churchman, encloses a list of twenty-one names for sample copies of the paper. He writes that he is putting on a Church subscription campaign in his mountain parish, that the papers would help, and that he proposes following them up with a personal canvass. It is co-operation, such as this that will keep the Church papers alive and capable of fulfilling the great purpose for which they were designed.

National Council Meeting, February 6 and 7, 1929.

Fiscal affairs dominated the February meeting of the National Council. The problem was to close the enormous gap of $688,307 between the total authorized by General Convention to be apportioned among the dioceses and the sum which the dioceses had reported that they expected to pay in 1929.

Diligent search brought to light $494,693.23, leaving a total of $193,-613.77 to be hacked from Administration allowances and from the actual missionary work of the Church. The problem was presented to the National Council by the Treasurer, was wrestled with through many long hours by the Finance Department, headed by the Presiding Bishop, was studiously analyzed by the National Council itself, and a budget, based on inadequate expectancies, was finally adopted.

A detailed account of this meeting will be carried in the next issue of The Southern Churchman.

Citadel of David.

An Associated Press dispatch from Jerusalem to the New York Times tells of a government appropriation of $35,-000 for reconstruction work on the Citadel of David, which, with its large minaret on Zion Hill, is one of the famous tourist sights of the Holy City.

The structure was in danger of collapse, mainly as a result of damage caused by earthquakes.

Contrary to what the name implies, this is not the famous Citadel of David, but a more recent construction, even though, according to Moslem tradition, the burial place of David is said to be near by, at the spot where Christ and His disciples partook of the Last Supper.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

World Day Prayer.

There will be an interdenominational prayer service held at the Second Presbyterian Church, corner of Fifth and Main Streets, Richmond, on February 15, from 11 until 3 o'clock, under the auspices of the Women's Interdenominational Missionary Union of Richmond.

Dr. Gibson Appointed Member of "Seventy".

Dr. Churchill Gibson, rector of St. James' Church, Richmond, has been appointed as one of "The Seventy". These are missionaries who agree to give at least two weeks a year, if called upon, in holding missions somewhere in the Church. He is among those appointed especially for college work.

His first work under this appointment was the mission held at the Virginia Military Institute for the week beginning Sunday, February 3.

Fortieth Birthday.

The Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, of St. James' Church, Richmond, are planning a celebration of their fortieth birthday. This year will mark the fortieth year of unbroken operation of this Chapter.

Rural Clergy Conference.

A conference of the Rural Clergy was held in Richmond, January 30-31. The report of the findings committee—Revs. S. L. Rotter, H. S. Osborn, E. B. Meredith—includes commendation for the following suggestions of our Commission on Evangelism:

1. Personal consecration of the minister through re-emphasis of his own expression of the Church's Mission to his community.

2. Enlisting the efforts of the individuals of his own congregation in personal contacts with others with a view to drawing them to Christ.

3. We see large possibilities in the suggestion of the open confirmation class, and heartily commend its use where practicable.

The report recommends to Council that the present committee of the diocese on survey of the rural work be made a permanent Commission of the Diocese on Rural Work.

It also recommends that this conference be established as an annual institution of the diocese.

It commends the suggestion of the fitting recognition of rural work and workers in the Rogation-Day services, with a view to overcoming the lack of knowledge, want of vision, and indifference among so many of our Church people in regard to rural work.

Lenten Services in Richmond.

The mid-day Lenten services, under the auspices of St. Paul's Chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and the St. Paul's Men's Association, will be held this year as usual every week-day, except Saturday, at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, beginning Thursday, February 14. They will commence promptly at 1:00 and end at 1:30. Bishop H. St. George Tucker will be the preacher February 14-15. The other preachers will be: February 18-22, Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., Grace Church, New York City; February 25-March 1, Bishop W. F. McDowell, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C.; March 4-8, Rt. Rev. W. L. Rogers, D. D., of Ohio; March 11-15, Rev. Luke M. White, D. D., St. Luke's Church, Montclair, N. J.; March 18-22, Rev. W. P. Merrill. D. D., Brick Presbyterian Church, New York City.

Five o'clock union Lenten services will be held by All Saints, Grace and Holy Trinity and St. James' Churches. Tuesdays the three congregations will go to All Saints' Church; Wednesdays, to Grace and Holy Trinity; Thursdays, to St. James.

The preachers will be: February 19-21, Dean Wilmot D. Gateson, of Bethlehem, Pa.; February 26-28, Dr. H. H. Covington, of Norfolk, Va.; March 5-7, Dr. Page Dame, of Christ Church, Va.; March 12-14, Rev. J. J. Gravatt, of Staunton, Va.; March 19-21, Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, Secretary for College Work of the National Council.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

On Washington's Birthday.

A corporate communion and laymen's breakfast conference will be held at Washington Cathedral, February 22, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, according to announcement made by Mr. H. Lawrence Choate, National President of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The attendance will be limited to one hundred and fifty men and boys, representing different parishes in the Diocese of Washington.

Rural Clergy Conference.

A conference for rectors of rural parishes was held recently at Washington Cathedral under the auspices of the College of Preachers, when the discussion pertained mainly to Lent and its observance.

The leaders of the conference were Bishop Freeman and Dr. Henry Lubeck, Canon of Washington Cathedral.

Lenten Services.

The Churchmen's League of the Diocese of Washington will sponsor a series of Lenten lectures, to be given in Epiphany Church every Tuesday evening, February 19-March 26. The general subject for the series will be "The Supreme Appeal of Jesus Christ", and the speakers will be a selected group of bishops.

Lenten Lectures.

Three courses of Lenten lectures under the auspices of Washington Cathedral, have been planned as follows:

On Wednesdays during Lent, which begins on Ash Wednesday, February 13, Dr. Henry Lubeck, honorary canon of Washington Cathedral, will speak on "The Teachings of Our Lord" in Bethlehem Chapel of the Cathedral at 4 P. M., preceded by Evening Prayer at 3:30 o'clock. Dr. Lubeck was for many years rector of Zion and St. Timothy's Church in New York City.

Fridays at 4 P. M., in the Washington Cathedral Library, Dr. William C. Sturgis will have as his subject "Conferences on Prayer as a Science and An Art". Dr. Sturgis was for ten years educational secretary of the department of missions of the National Council and is now associated with Bishop Philip M. Rhinelander in conducting the laymen's conferences of the College of Preachers.

The Rt. Rev. Philip M. Rhinelander, former Bishop of Pennsylvania and warden of the College of Preachers, Washington Cathedral, will give a series of lectures Thursdays in Lent at 8 P. M. at St. Margaret's Church on the subject, "Some Obstacles to Faith and How to Meet Them".

Joint services of St. John's and Christ Church, Georgetown, on Sunday evenings have been a success from every standpoint and will be continued during Lent. Wednesday evening services which were held during Lent last year at St. John's Church will be at Christ Church this year. The series of addresses on some phase of the Bible will be given this year by the Rev. A. C. Zabriskie, of the Virginia Theological Seminary, as Dr. Rollins did last year.

A series of addresses on special topics will be given in St. Thomas' Church on Sunday evenings during Lent.

The Lenten Noonday Services at Epiphany Church began on Thursday, the day after Ash Wednesday and will be held every day through the Lenten season. The preacher on Thursday and Friday was Dr. Donald B. Aldrich, rector of Ascension Church, New York. Services at Epiphany Church every day at 4:45 P. M. during Lent, will be conducted by the parish clergy and undergraduates of the Virginia Theological Seminary. M. M. W.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Lay Evangelism.

Lay Evangelism is the theme upon which much attention and interest are being centered at this time in this diocese. The movement is well defined by the Rev. George E. Talmage, of Christ Church, Oyster Bay, who says it "means that the members of our Church, who are by nature reticent and undemonstrative, should take up their share of the work of preaching the Gospel to the world. . . . There is probably no better method than that of personal invitation, which to be sincere cannot be organized, and to be effective must be on a large scale. This method is within the possibilities of every one." At a service in Grace Church, Jamaica, recently, under the auspices of the diocesan committee on the matter, Bishop Darst preached an effective sermon to a large congregation. Some thirty of the clergy were present. Other diocesan gatherings are planned, and the subject will have especial attention, not only by preaching, but, it is to be hoped, by practice, in all the diocese throughout Lent.

Bishop Suffragan.

The consecration of the Rev. J. I. B. Larned to be bishop-suffragan of Long Island, is to take place Monday morning, February 11, in the Cathedral of the Incarnation, at Garden City. The seating capacity of the Cathedral being only about eight hundred, it has been difficult to arrange for the attendance of all who ought to be invited and would like to come. Bishop Larned will be the first assistant bishop to be consecrated for this diocese; and he will be the first bishop to be consecrated in our Cathedral. He has the ardent wishes of both clergy and laity for God's blessing on his work as bishop-suffragan, for it has been made plain to us all in the last few years that one bishop can not possibly perform all the duties that devolve upon him. Bishop Stires has said publicly that he thinks it not unlikely that a second suffragan will be needed soon.

To Be Dedicated.

The new Church of the Epiphany, East Eighteenth Street and Avenue R, Brooklyn, will be dedicated by Bishop Stires on the evening of Wednesday, February 20.

Lenten Services.

The preachers for the united Lenten services of the parishes of the "Hill Zone" in Brooklyn have been announced. They will be as follows: February 19, at the Church of the Messiah, Bishop Stires; February 26, at the Church of the Incarnation, Bishop Larned; March 5, at St. Mary's, Bishop Woodcock of Kentucky; March 12, at St. James, the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, Warden of St. Stephen's College; March 19, at St. Luke's, Bishop Slattery of Massachusetts. These services, held now for several successive Lents, always attract large congregations.

According to a custom of several years standing, interdenominational Lenten services will be held at noon-day in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, which is strategically located in the heart of Brooklyn's financial district. Churchmen amongst the preachers are Bishop Stires, the Rev. Karl Reiland of St. George's, Manhattan, and the Rev. S. M. Dorrance, of St. Ann's, Brooklyn. Other preachers are men of outstanding reputation of various denominations. The management is in the hands of an interdenominational committee.

On Washington's Birthday.

Two important events are announced for Washington's Birthday. One is the annual corporate communion of men under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, at St. Anne's, Brooklyn, at 8 A. M., followed by breakfast and addresses at the Hotel St. George. The other is a day's retreat at St. James, Brooklyn, conducted by the Rev. Professor Gavin, of the G. T. S. The program of the retreat will be: Holy Communion at 9; first meditation at 10:15; second meditation at 12, followed by luncheon; third meditation at 2:30, with benediction afterward, closing the day. Thus a large number of our Church people are sure to spend Washington's Birthday to their spiritual advantage.

TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. C. S. Quinn, D. D., Bishop.

Chimes.

Trinity Church of Galveston is soon to have one of the sweetest toned chimes of bells in the world, according to the makers, the Meneely Bell Co., of Troy, N. Y., where they have long been in process of manufacture, as the gift of Mrs. R. Waverly Smith. The inscription of the large bell of the set is as follows:

To the Glory of God
And in Loving Memory of John Sealy
This Chime of Bells was Presented by his Sister
Jennie Sealy Smith
Easter 1929

The chime is a duplicate of the famous set of bells that was placed by the Meneelys in the old church at Plymouth, Mass., in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock. The large bell of the set weighs nearly two tons, the other bells being graduated in size so as to produce perfect harmony.

Trinity Church has recently undergone extensive improvements, which includes the raising of the structure several feet above its former position. Both Mr. and Mrs. Smith have contributed generously to the parish, and the new chime given by Mrs. Smith will be an acquisition to the entire city.

COLLECT FOR FIRST SUNDAY IN LENT.

O Lord, Who for our sake didst fast forty days and forty nights; Give us grace to use such abstinence, that our flesh being subdued to the Spirit, we may ever obey Thy godly motions in righteousness, and true holiness, to Thy honor and glory, Who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

FAITH.

Lenore Robinson.

Where is God—
To have left me now,
When my soul cries for relief?
Has my God moved on to a fairer clime
Where there is Peace?

Nay, child,
Your God has not left you now;
'Tis you who have left your God.
He still stands ready and anxious to give
His love and His care—not a rod.

God does not punish—Our God is Love.
We suffer from human ills:
Look up from your sorrows—
Stand on your griefs,
You will find your God—and peace.

De Profundis—A Meditation for Lent.

In Hall Caine's "Manxman" two lads stand on the seashore. One says to the other, "The sea is calling me", and the other answers, "The sea is calling me". It is the challenge of the sea to those lads on the shore. The lads cannot but hear, for they belong to the sea. The salt of the sea is in their veins, the song of the sailor on their lips.

Out of the wide sea of being comes to every soul the challenge of the spiritual. It arrests us. We cannot but hear, for we belong. The boundless deep from which we came calls to the deep within us, "Deep calleth unto deep".

There is a deep within to which deep calls. We are in a world of mystery, mystery without, mystery within. We look upon a wide sea as into thick darkness. Dark clouds of doubt hang low over life. For many there seems no clue to the ever-deepening mystery. For them it is spiritual tragedy, for the doubt of the time touches the whole substance of life. The mind rocks as it realizes the deeps on deeps on which the world has been built. And deep calls unto deep, for there is a deep within that answers to the deep without. There is a sense of eternity, of infinitude felt within ourselves. There is a beyond, not only outside of us, and above us, but a beyond within us. God has set eternity in the heart of man.

God? We cannot divest ourselves of the thought of God. The feeling of Him is below the deepest deep of thought. Deep as is the mystery, there is a sense of something spiritual and eternal.

There is a deep to which deep calls. There are deeps and lower deeps—deeps of thought, deeps of fear, deeps of pain and sorrow and still deeper deeps of thought. The lower deeps are reached when the soul sinks into fathomless brooding thought. Then De Profundis. Eternity calls to eternity across time.

The sea called the lads on the shore, and the lads heard the call because they belonged to the sea. Do we belong to that boundless deep whence we came? Is it the call of God because to Him we belong? Is our true life to be found in a divine adventure of faith? That is the challenge of Christianity to man, and at his best man recognizes the call. He belongs. It is true, man is not always at his best. He may turn his face back toward the jungle. There is "the underworld of the mind", with under world filth and garbage. We know what deeps of lustful sin and shame, what hate and cruelty man is capable of, and the challenge of life is nowhere written in characters so glaring as on the human breast. It is the sharp challenge of the "ought". What is the answer from out the deep of the soul? That sets the face toward heaven or back toward the jungle, for it determines our philosophy of life.

Where do we belong? It is the question for modern man. The materialisms of life weigh heavily, and may still the Voice out of eternity, but the call persists. Deep ever calls to deep. Some time the man gets a look into the deep within, and finds darkness there. Then De Profundis. Out of the soul's sense of sin and the cry for peace, out of the pain of life and the confession of doubt may be as the answer of deep to deep.

We face the question in the solemn appeal of Lent. There will be open churches everywhere. There will be much preaching, and great congregations to hear. The one question for each one of us, do we belong? What will be our acknowledgment of it?

From out the deep of God's judgments comes the challenge to conscience. From out of the deep of the Heart of God comes the challenge of faith. That is the challenge of the Christ. If a man will hear, if the world will hear, then

"That which drew from out the boundless deep Turns home again."

An Experiment in Mercy.

A new policy in aiding the cure of narcotic addicts has been inaugurated by the special committee in charge of the clinic at Bellevue Hospital, New York City. The method of the cure is not new, being the narcosan treatment which has been tried on city prisoners at Welfare Island. Although no longer used in the prison, narcosan has been highly praised by many who took it and were discharged as cured. Some physicians objected to its use because the prisoners had no volition in the matter. The Bellevue project, which purposes to employ narcosan, is free of this objection since its departure from past procedure lies in an offer of free treatment to any one who wishes to take it. At no time in its course will the patient be considered a prisoner, although he will be admitted to the ward only on condition that he remain until the treatment is completed. Since such a method removes the obnoxious elements of conviction and imprisonment, it is certain to prove a decided boon to this group of unfortunates, who are fortunate in the paradoxical sense that their vice can be made so revolting to them that they perforce abandon it. The experiment will be followed with interest.—Commonweal.

A LULLABY.

Rev. Percy T. Fenn.

Sleep, baby, sleep in thy cradle so soft,
The stars are a-twinkling, the moon's up aloft,
The wind makes sweet moaning through cottonwood tree,
Thy mammy is watching, and praying for thee.
Sleep, baby! Sleep, baby! Sleep!

My wee little cherub, the day has been long,
The morning came early and woke thee to song;
Thy pattering feet must be heavy as lead,
Thy hands are so tired, so weary thy head.
Sleep, baby! Sleep, baby! Sleep!

My treasure, I grudge thee these hours of sleep,
I would hold thee, and fondle, and feel thine heart beat
Upon mine through the long hours of day;
But night brings its weariness, rest follows play.
Sleep, baby! Sleep, baby! Sleep!

The birdies have gone to their nests for the night,
Their singing is hushed till the coming of light;
Thy dolly is resting, thy Teddy-bear sleeps,
The noises are hushed, and all silent the streets.
Sleep, baby! Sleep, baby! Sleep!

The bobolink sleeps in the meadow so green,
The owls are a-stirring, the bat's on the wing,
The crickets are singing, the bees are a-bed,
Close fast thy tired eyelids, rest easy thy head.
Sleep, baby! Sleep, baby! Sleep!

Angels are guarding thy cradle secure,
Nothing can harm thee, my baby so pure;
Smile in thine innocence as thine eyes close,
God give thee peaceful and dreamless repose!
Sleep, baby! Sleep, baby! Sleep!

Her Kitchen Bible.

There was always a Bible on the window sill or on the kitchen table where Naomi worked. She was a Norwegian girl who had recently come to the land. Those who knew her felt at once that she was going to make a good citizen.

"That is my kitchen Bible," she explained with her foreign accent, when her mistress remarked on its always being there.

The mistress was not surprised to find that she gave the utmost satisfaction as a worker. A Bible with you at your work, a Bible used in odd, spare moments of life, will make a life of sweetness and power.

A home where every one has a Bible and makes every-day use of it is a home which should make any of us feel both rich and happy.—Queens' Gardens.

Not Present.

It was the resurrection day. The rest of the disciples were together, perhaps for prayer and consultation. They were not expecting the Lord. They had only just heard that He was risen from the dead. Some of them had seen Him. But the majority of them had only heard the testimony of their fellow disciples. The two from Emmaus were making their report of what had occurred as they journeyed, and after they had arrived at their destination. While they were still talking about their wondrous experience, and while the rest of the disciples were wondering, Jesus appeared to them all. It was all very wonderful for those who were present, but they were not all there. One of the brethren was absent. Thomas was elsewhere. I do not know why he was absent. His absence may have been necessary. Duty may have called him to some other place. Be that as it may, Thomas missed a great deal by not being present upon that occasion. He missed seeing the Lord. It would have been one of the outstanding experiences of his life; but he missed it. He was not there.

"Opportunity knocks once (and only once?) at every man's door." "There is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at its flood, leads on to fortune." Had Thomas been present that night how much of dismal doubt and despair he would have avoided! He would, also, have missed an age-long reputation that is not to his credit. It was his opportunity to settle an important question. But he was reported absent.

There are many like Thomas. When the big hour arrives they miss it because they are not there. When big questions are up for settlement they are not there. Because they are not there, very often they are not satisfied with the way things are done. And, perhaps, it would have been done another way had they been there. But they were absent and others had to do it the way they thought best. Their advice was needed. Their influence would have greatly helped. But they were not present.

Great plans are to be made. Word goes out that it is to be a meeting for counsel. Brethren are to take counsel together as to how the Lord's work can best be done. The brethren come together. The plans are made. Everybody is happy. No, not quite everybody. There are some who are not happy because they were not there. Duty or something else, kept them at home. They would have greatly helped had they been there. Those present wished for them and their words of counsel. But they were not present. They did not hear the discussions. They did not see the question from all angles. They did not witness the prayers for guidance of those present. They did not feel the weight of responsibility that comes with such planning. They did not see the expression of earnest concern that was on the faces of all present. They did not help make the plans, and the plans are not just what they wanted and they are unhappy. They were not present. Oh, if they had only been there!—Rev. W. R. Hornburg, in Baptist Standard.

A Story of a Hero.

Once upon a time, not so very long ago, in a country not so very far away, a little boy was born. He had brothers and sisters with whom he played, and whom he loved as dearly as you love your brothers and sisters. He was very big and strong for his age, and when he was twelve years old, he could do almost as much work as a man. He could help his father on the farm, and he did help, so that his father often thought, "I am sure I don't know what I would do without him".

Then one day a dreadful thing happened. Alva, for that was his name, tried to jump a high gate. Some way he caught his foot on the top, and down he went. He was hurt so badly he could not walk for a week, then he got better and was out again, but he still complained that he did not feel very well. One day he went to help his father store away hay in the big haymow, and there the pain came which was never to leave him again so long as his life lasted.

Alva was carried out of the haymow and to his bed. For years and years he lay in bed, and then at last he managed, after months in the hospital, to get about on crutches. What do you think he did during those years? Do you think he felt so sorry for himself that he gave up and fretted and cried, and scolded, saying, "There is no use in my trying to do anything; I am in too much pain"? Well, it would not have been surprising had he done so, for as I as told you he was always in pain. But this is what he did:

One day he said to his mother, "Mother, if you would bring me my books, I am sure I could get the lessons we were studying at school. I could find out just what they are and I could study here in bed". And he did. His sisters and brothers helped him by telling him where the lessons were and perhaps his teacher helped, too. I do not know about that. But, when his class was ready to graduate from High School, Alva was ready to graduate with them.

Although he never went to school again, he kept on reading and studying every day of his life. He always wanted to learn new things, and when he had learned them, he would say to himself, "I wonder what this means. I wonder what it has to do with what I learned yesterday. I must think about this so I can be quite sure I understand all about it." He would say to his friends, "I like to think things through, so I am quite sure it is right". When he was a man he wrote a book called, "Thinking Through" to help other people to do the way he had long ago learned to do for himself.

One day, when he was a young man, and was going about on crutches, he heard a minister of his church talk about the need for young men to become ministers. "God wants you, and God needs you," said the good minister. "He wants you young men to begin right now to prepare to be ministers."

"I can do that," said Alva, to himself. "I can never run, or jump, or walk without crutches, but I can be a minister for God." So now, he began to read and study to prepare himself for this work. And when he was old enough, he came before a group of other ministers who laid their hands on his head and asked God to bless him and help him, and he became a minister.

Then something else happened. A good minister called Doctor Bishop was very much interested in missionary work. "I need some one to help me in the office, some one who loves God and boys and girls and men and women and wants every one to know about Him," said Doctor Bishop. And it was not long before Alva was working in the office helping Doctor Bishop. I think perhaps it was because he suffered so much that he felt sorry for all the sick folks all over the world who did not know about hospitals and doctors, and about the Good Physician. Perhaps it was because he knew how much the Heavenly Father had helped him when he was sick and in pain that he wanted to tell every one about him. Anyway, he did a very great deal to help all our folks everywhere know about missions. He talked about missions in his own churches, and he began to write things for other people to read.

He wrote more than things about missions. Because he "thought through", because he was so loving and kind to every one, and wanted every one else to be loving and kind, because he wanted to help people everywhere, he began to write more and more. People who had never heard of him before began to read what he wrote, and to like it and ask for more.

One day people said, "We need a new editor of The Herald of Gospel Liberty". Whom do you think they asked to come and take that place? Why, of course, it was Alva, the crippled boy, the brave hero who had conquered pain and himself and all unkind feelings, and ignorance as well, and had become one of the wisest and kindness men in the whole Christian Church. They did not call him "Alva" any more; they called him Dr. Kerr, and people all over the country read what he wrote. People who had never met him wrote to tell him how he had helped them. People who met him every day forgot how he was suffering because he forgot it himself in trying to make every one happy.

The other day he went home to be with God. The life of one of the bravest heroes in the Christian Church is ended for this world, but we have not forgotten him, and he has not forgotten you. When you are sick, or in trouble, when it seems hard for you to study; when you feel as if you would like to be a little bit of a coward and run away from it all, remember this story, and be brave and true and strong; love God and all people, and begin to be a hero like Dr. Alva Kerr.—Mrs. F. E. Bullock, in Herald of Gospel Liberty.

MISS HUMPETTY GOES SHOPPING.

"O Mother, Miss Humpetty's come to go shipping,
Please let us go with her—O Mother, please do!
She's out at the gate with her wickery basket,
She's waiting to see if we cannot go too."

O good, O goody, we're going, we're going,
And never and never will there be such fun,
She'll buy us a stick of striped peppermint candy,
A round ringy doughnut, a fluffy fat bun.

"O dear, dear Miss Humpetty—can't you walk faster
We'll carry your basket—Oh please don't sit down.
Your story is funny—but laugh while you're walking,
Unless we keep going—we'll never reach town."

And now we are there and the jolly fat grocer
Is wrapping bologna and crackers and cheese;
Miss Humpetty's telling her funniest story,
The grocer boy's laughing and slapping his knees.

And out of the jar comes the peppermint candy,
The bun and the doughnut are popped in a sack,
The pennies come out of Miss Humpetty's pocket,
And one of them rolls and gets lost in a crack.

We walked down the street and we look in the windows,
At long linky sausages—round loaves of bread,
And into a store here they sell pretty ribbons,
Miss Humpetty goes for a spool of white thread.

"Now, children," says she, "we have spent our last penny,
It's time to turn homeward—the sun is most down,"
Says she, "but we're rich and we scarcely can carry
All the beautiful things that we bought in the town."

There's satins and velvets and ribbons and laces,
And slippers of silver to dance in the breeze,
But all we could see when we looked in the basket
Was thread and bologna and crackers and cheese.

The Apple That Talked.

Tom meant the apple for himself, for it grew into the biggest and rosiest of all the pippins. Early in the season, when the apples were not yet turned, Tom had carefully cut out cardboard letters and pinned them on the pippin's cheek nearest the sun.

TOM, HIS APPLE, was what the letters spelled. His grandfather used to mark apples that way when he was a boy, and he had showed Tom how to do it. The letters stayed on all through the fall, until the apples had turned and were ready to pick. Tom decided that he would save that apple for some nice, cold night, and he would roast it in front of the fire in the living-room. Then he and grandfather would eat it together.

Tom was at school the day the men came to do the picking in the orchard, but his grandfather told them to leave the marked apple on the tree. When Tom came home in the later afternoon, he found out that there had been a mistake. The men had left some of the sweet apples for him, but the one that had his name on it was gone. Tom could have cried, but it was only a mistake. He tried not to let his grandfather know how badly he felt about it. He had enough on his mind, with all the harvest to be gathered and shipped east.

The apple country had been wonderful when it was warm, and the orchards were full of crickets and birds and fruit. But, oh, how lonely it was in November! There were no very near neighbors, and so few boys and girls that Tom had no playmate. His father was starting more orchards farther in the west, and he and his mother were going to send for Tom in another year. Tom wasn't going to let anybody know how lonesome he was, but he did wish that the days were not so long and bleak. Even the roasting of that apple would have been like a party.

He was flattening his nose against the kitchen window one Saturday, looking up the bare road. Sometimes nobody came by all day, except the rural free delivery man, and some days he did not come.

His grandfather came in, letting a gusty wind in with him. "Frost again tonight," he said. "We sent that shipment of apples in to the city just in time. The postman is on his way. He said he had a package for us."

"The yarn for Tom's stockings, I suppose," his grandmother said.

Tom sighed a very small sigh. If only the postman were bringing a couple of tigers, or an elephant, or something exciting! There he was now, jogging slowly down the road as if he had all the time in the world. But the old blue cart reached the gate at last, and the old white horse stopped. The postman looked over all his parcels, and then he took out the very largest one.

"For you, I guess Tommy," he said, putting the bulky bundle into Tom's arms at the kitchen door.

"It is too large for the yarn," his grandmother said, putting on her spectacles. "For Tom, the Piper's Son," she read, wonderingly. "Why, Tommy, it is for you," and she began to laugh, for, although his grandfather and father were named Piper, and Tom's name was certainly Tom, no one had ever thought of him as that little Mother Goose boy.

"You had better read the letter first," his grandfather said, and so Tom unfolded the note that lay on top of the package. This was a jolly little letter:

"Dear Tom:

"If you are a boy my own age this is for you, and if you are not, please give the things to a child who would like them. But mother and I are sure it was a nice boy who marked the apple that was the top one of our barrel. And it said on the barrel, 'Packed by Mr. Piper, Hope Farm, Greenlands', so we knew at once where you and the pig live. I have to stay in the house for a long time until my back gets strong, and people send me so many things. These are some of them for you. Mother and I had a beautiful time roasting your apple, and when summer comes, and I can walk again, she is going to bring me out in the car to see Hope Farm, and you.

"Your friend,
Dorothy."

"That was a talking apple, Tommy," his grandfather said, wiping his eyes just a little. "I'll put up a swing with a seat for the little girl in the pippin tree next summer."

"And I'll show her our pigs, and take her for rides in my cart, all over the orchards," Tom said.

"And I'll make her apple dumplings," his grandmother said. "Why don't you open the box, Tommy?"

So Tom opened it, and he took out picture-books, and a painting book, and a box of paints, and a box of colored pencils, and some nice drawing paper, and games, and a whole dozen of lollipops of all the flavors the candy man knows. It was nearly too wonderful for words. And as Tom began painting, the wind, instead of howling through the bare orchards, seemed to be singing a cheerful tune.—The Mayflower.

The Boy Luther.

Martin Luther was a poor boy. The poverty of his parents made it a hard matter for their child to get school privileges. Martin must needs go out and live with relatives, and endure many privations, in order to receive the schooling he craved. When the lad was fourteen years old he went to live in Magdeburg, forty miles from Mansfield, where his parents then lived. He was practically without friends there, and had trouble to get enough of the plainest food to satisfy his hunger. He and other boys, suffering the pangs of hunger, went out begging food now and then. One day at Christmas-time, these lads were passing through a village, stopping at every house to sing the Christmas carols that were so familiar in that day. They stopped in front of a peasant's house at the outskirts of the hamlet, and when the man of the house heard them singing he came out with some sausages, intending to give them to the hungry boys. He called in a gruff voice: "Where are you, boys?" The singers were frightened on hearing him and ran away. The kind man continued to call to the boys and they finally took courage, returned and partook of the food he offered them.

After a year at Magdeburg, Martin was sent to Eisenach. A number of Luther's mother's relatives lived there, and it was hoped that they would help to feed the lad, but these hopes were not well founded. The relatives had nothing they cared to spare for the miner's son.

Martin once more started out to get food by singing before the doors of the villagers. Usually he received nothing but harsh words.

One day he had better success. He was just on the verge of despair, but decided to try his fortune before the stately house of the Burgomaster, Conrad Cotta. The good wife of the Burgomaster was well pleased with the behavior of Martin, and well pleased with his singing. She invited him in, and with the consent of her husband, kept him in their home while he remained at Eisenach, and was very kind to him.

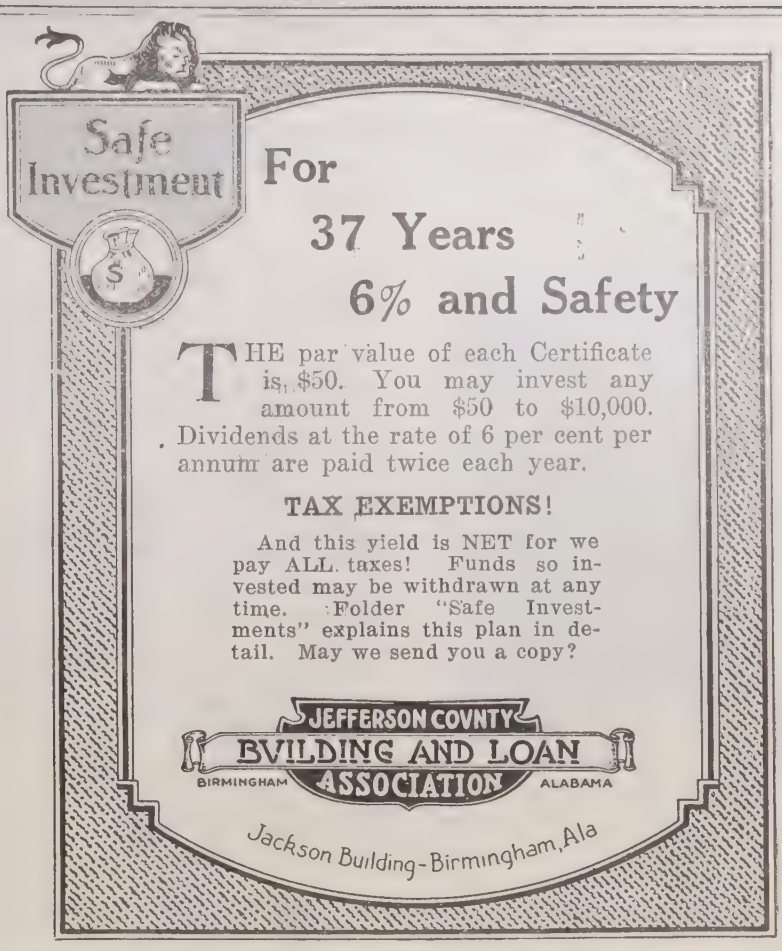
How wonderful it seems that God used this poor boy as His instrument in the remarkable work of the reformation!—Lutheran Youth.

Back to the Simple Life.

There is a man in Japan of which the world of Christians has heard and will probably hear more. This man is a Japanese, and a Christian. His name is Toyohiko Kagawa. He is rapidly becoming the prophet of Christ to the Japanese nation. He has given himself to the service of the humblest and most needy of the people. He has literally emptied himself that he may help to lift those who have never had a chance. His sacrifice, his devotion, and his consecration have caught the imagination of the Japanese. His power and influence are daily increasing. He and his followers live the simplest kind of life, wearing the simplest clothes, and eating the simplest food. A group of young missionaries in Japan, moved by the example of Kagawa and his followers, are now planning to eliminate all that may tend toward extravagance from their method of life. They are determined to see whether the more expensive mode of life of the missionary is a real barrier between the missionary and the humble people to whom they often minister most largely. It may be that all Christendom has missed that which is essential, when it has failed to consider the example of Him "who thought He was rich, became poor for our sakes".

It may be, too, that Christ was doing more than showing us a way whereby we might help those who walk in the lowly paths of life. It may be that He was showing us a way to escape that which is both a hindrance and a burden. It would seem at times as if we were all competing with one another in a race that leads nowhere. Many people are working themselves to death to acquire things they would be better off if they did not have. Life is becoming faster, more difficult, more exacting. It looks as if there might me no limit to the speed of motion that may be acquired; but medical men are beginning to ask whether or not there is a limit to what the nervous system of man can endure. Most of us can see no way out of this man-killing race, this vicious circle in which we are all moving. There is no way unless it be the Jesus' way.

"Te be despised may be no ill-fortune; the real ill-fortune is to be despicable."



"Life is too short to nurse one's misery. Hurry across the lowlands, that you may spend more time on the mountain tops."

Help us to make this Cabin a Christian Home.

A STATEMENT

About two years ago we began making a special appeal for funds with which to purchase a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country. From north, south, east and west—from far-away Japan came the welcome checks to help buy the property and to furnish necessary equipment. Old friends, new friends, and entire strangers, numerous branches of the Woman's Auxiliary and Section B kindly opened their hearts and loosened their purse strings. To these many generous friends we wish to extend our grateful thanks and hearty appreciation. God has blessed us, and may He bless these many donors, as doubtless He will, through their gifts to these needy and deserving children of our one Father.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

If you, who have helped us to help these long-neglected mountain people, could visit St. Andrew's Mission, as we hope you will, you would see for yourselves what a great help it is to our work to have this splendid and convenient home, that you have so generously helped to provide.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00. We must pay six per cent interest on deferred payments, and wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of debt. We are striving to raise the next $1,000 payment promptly. Who will help? If twenty persons will subscribe in cash or instalments $50 each, we will have the $1,000. If forty will subscribe $25, or one hundred will subscribe $10 we will have the thousand. Any amount will be most acceptable. What will YOU do?

The Right Rev. William Cabell Brown, late Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia, heartily endorsed this appeal. The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, also endorses it.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $.....to be paid in cash or instalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

MOODY MISSIONARY BOOK FUND

Dear Friend:

What shall we do?

Calls are on hand for Gospel books and Scripture portions for 10,000 sick folks and the Hospital Fund is completely exhausted! Numbers of applications have been held for weeks, hoping that funds would be forthcoming. It seems to us that the only course open now is to let our friends know of this desperate need and pray that they may be constrained to share in this wonderful, God-given opportunity to give the message of Life to those facing Eternal death.

In the great army hospitals, especially in the West and Southwest, many ex-service men are gradually losing in their fight against the dread TB. Other thousands in the Southwest and elsewhere are likewise making a last supreme effort to ward off the inevitable.

It is an occasion for rejoicing that God is using the printed page to carry a knowledge of His love and saving grace to these unfortunate ones. A worker in a large government hospital in Colorado writes, "The 'boys' seem eager, feverishly so, to have and own the Moody books, Gospels and 'Pocket Treasury'."

It cost only a few cents each to bring about these and many other remarkable results, under God's blessing. Tens of thousands of other sick ones have not yet had these gospel messengers—they face a Christless future! Sign your name and enclose a bill.

We prayerfully await your response.

TIDEWATER TALES

A book into which is gathered the folklore, traditions and history of Tidewater Virginia. Written in a delightful informal style by Prof. William C. Garnett.

The President of a College in South Carolina writes: "I have never read a work of this kind the style of which I have found more attractive, simple and yet elegant, interesting but never monotonous."

A prominent representative of a Publishing Co. writes: "This book will be read by our children and children's children. I could read 'A Fox Hunt 'Fo de War' every week."

A prominent attorney in Washington writes: " . . the charming description of the old homes, the history and traditions, and the true-to-life stories in local color, combined to delight me."

A professor in one of the Virginia Universities writes: "You have put posterity in your debt by presenting so skilfully to them characters that have passed to the beyond."

THE PRESENT CONTROVERSY,

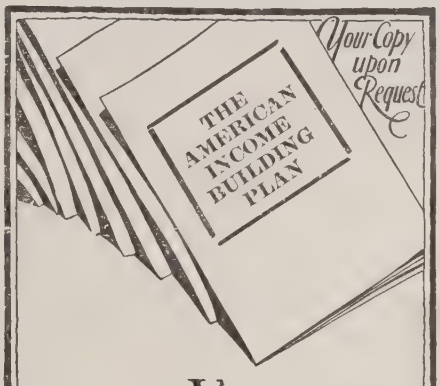
Cause and Cure

The Church, the Schools and Evolution

By J. E. Conant, D. D.

It's a fact that never since Luther's day have Christians faced such a time of controversy, confusion, and division as today.

It's a fact that the theory of evolution, accepted first in the schools as science, and then in the church as theology, is the direct cause of the disturbance.



It's a fact that the people generally do not realize how wide-spread is the apostasy or what terrible woes are sure to follow in consequence.

Dr. Conant has written THE CHURCH, THE SCHOOLS AND EVOLUTION in order that the people may know. He makes plain what evolution is, who are among its advocates, how it flatly denies the fundamentals of the Christian Faith, which makes it imperative that it be resisted.

Seeking to Destroy America and Faith

I do not wish to burden you with letters.

My object in enclosing the attached circualrs, etc., is to give you an insight into the interlocking systems that are seeking to destroy this country and at the same time to destroy Fundamental Christianity.

I think that Frederick Libby is one of the most dangerous men in this country. He works either directly or indirectly with such men as Frankfurter of Harvard University, who is really a Communist; with Kirby Page and Sherwood Eddy, both of whom make a specialty, I believe, of "roping in" young people's conferences—working under the cloak of so-called Christian Conferences and Associations.

They are spending great sums of money—these agitators and propagandists; in fact, they seem to have an unlimited supply of it, as they send out printed matter and letters constantly by the tens of thousands, and have speakers going all the time. But where do they get these large sums of money? Moscow? Of course, they get a good deal of this money from blinded church members, who contribute to what they think are Christian causes, while the money is used in fact for Modernistic Communistic propaganda. It is as subtle as Satan, who is the great organizer back of it all.

The enclosed clipping from the Times Dispatch shows how the Y. M. C. A. has been "roped in". It seems to me that the Y. W. C. A. is, if possible, worse. Helen Gould Shepard, who gave large sums to the Y. W. C. A., withdrew and repudiated the whole thing.

You will note how the Federal Council of Churches interlocks with all of this propaganda.

With best wishes.

TIME TO SPEAK OUT.

Dear Mr. Williams:

You sent one copies of letters received by you from Mrs. Hartwell and Rev. Mr. Combs endorsing your editorial, "Gentlemen", in The Southern Churchman, of January 26. I am delighted to add my endorsement to theirs. And there are thousands of others who would do the same if they had the courage to speak out. You say, "Plain language, however harsh, is appropriate and necessary". No doubt of that. This is no time to "speak smooth things" any more than it was in the time of the Prophet Isaiah. The amazing thing is that the laity are willing to have an unbelieving clergyman for their rector. I find myself wondering by what moral process a professing gentleman can bring himself to answer the questions in the ordination service, "Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments"? by replying "I do believe them", and then get up and say in public that he does not believe them.

How can anybody have supreme confidence in a man who will do such a thing as that!

So I thank God that you have the grace and courage to show such men up in their true light. Just suppose Bishop Whittle was alive!

Sincerely yours,

Above received from one of the clearest thinkers and leaders of our Church.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

Adopted by the Piedmont Alumnae Association upon the death of their well-beloved teacher, MISS MARY NELSON MEADE.

Whereas, we, the members of the Piedmont Alumnae Association, have learned of Miss Mary's entry into the life eternal at the rising of the sun on Sunday morning, February the third;

We, the old scholars, wish to pay her the following tribute;

Endowed by nature with a mind and character of unusual calibre, her impress was left on all with whom she came in contact. She loved her home, her school, her church, and although physically failing, she maintained her interest and influence to the very last. We, her friends and pupils, who loved and revered her, feel an irreparable loss that can never be filled until we, her old scholars, are reunited with her and our other beloved teachers who have gone before.

Our only hope is that we also can meet that last summons with the same fortitude and unfailing faith with which to the end Miss Mary was inspired. Be it further Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to her sorrowing family, to our local paper, the Daily Progress, and to the Southern Churchman.

MRS. SUSAN FICKLEN HARRISON.

MRS. SUSAN FICKLEN HARRISON, widow of Dr. Edward Jaquelin Harrison, in her ninety-fourth year, died, surrounded by her children, on January 24, 1929, at "Woodbourne", her home near Cartersville, Va.

She was the third of the four daughters of James G. Ficklen and Catharine Davenport, his wife, and was born at "Belleville", near Winchester, Va., on September 24, 1835, and was the sole survivor of her father's family of six children. She was married to Dr. Harrison May 28, 1868, and is survived by the following children: Mr. J. Burwell Harrison, New Paltz, N. Y.; Mrs. James O. Winston, "Kingsmead", Saugerties, N. Y., and Mrs. J. T. Rodgers, "Woodbourne", Cartersville, Va. (one son, Henry J. Harrison, having died in 1900); and by seven grandchildren, Messrs. William, James and Randolph Winston, Harrison Rodgers and William Wright Harrison; and Misses Jaquelin Winston and Isabella Harrison. Five stepchildren, two now living, Mrs. Ambrose Ford and Mr. E. J. Harrison, of Cartersville, Va., and their children, with numerous nieces and nephews in Virginia and adjoining States, completed her family circle.

Maternal love dominated her affections and was requited by a quasi-maternal cherishing, which doubtless was a factor in the attainment of her ripe age.

Her later years were spent partly in Virginia and partly in Kingston, N. Y., and its nearby communities, where two of her children reside, and where her contacts and attachments, like those of her home, were among the compensations of her life.

A unique personality, a woman strong in mind and moral fibre, as well as physique, has passed into the great silence, whence, nevertheless, echoes of heavenly sweetness are wafted.

Mrs. Harrison was an exquisite type of Virginian stamina and culture; but just as she was a nonagenarian in name more than in reality because of faculties and interest marvelously preserved, so it would be but half a truth to describe her, as is our wont, as of the "old school", for her magnificent common sense, her poise, adaptability, her unstaled infinite variety, and her deep-veined humanity kept her synchronous with a changing world and its denizens of today. And while, as to her native heath and the sacred soil of home and all the hallowed past, where loomed the figure of an adored husband, she was "like some lovely last refrain reviving all the song's pristine delight", hers was more than the minstrel's lay, and for years she has been a beacon-light of love and inspiration to all her nearest and dearest, her kindred and acquaintance, who fondly resorted to and haled her as "The Old Queen", and her gospel of cheerfulness was as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

Her lineaments, beautiful and ennobled in age, crowned with abundant silvery locks, bespoke her quality of grace and charm, and that ingrained dignity which can hedge about, yet instantly endears, and which is the invariable accompaniment of faultless taste, perhaps shrinking from even these poor words of tribute, such was the ornament of her quiet spirit.

She was a lover and exemplar of the simple life through all vicissitudes. She had known and courageously met the meager times. And when luxury from loving hands was her lot, through her gratitude she still rang true.

In the pouring out of the wine of her life, it seems to some that the best was the last. To these it seems as if her sunset's radiant glow and its level rays were some new and vivifying wonder-light; and now, awed and silent, wan and wistful, they find their contemplation to be like watching the cloud figments of opaline and rose, of purple and gold, fade into the grim canopy of night—till the stars come out.

Her religion was like the health of the soul, void of self-consciousness, conviction without over-wrought emotion, yet what a paean it was when she would join in "How Firm a Foundation", "to the old tune that General Lee loved best"! To her, faith without works was dead, and works without faith the ne'er-begot. She has taken her place in that goodly company who, to halting minds, are contemporary, human evidences of Christianity. Nor was her viewpoint that of the caged bird winging for flight. She enjoyed, and was thankful for, her long life, content to nestle among earthly loves divinely instituted, and her thanatopsis was the soaring of the lark, swift and straight, with morning song for its Maker's ear.

On January 6, after home services by her rector, Rev. Mr. Stewart, her body, first borne across the lawn by faithful old colored servitors, was taken by her grandsons, as to a portal of the land of the leal, to the private graveyard and laid beside her beloved consort and son at "Clifton", originally the old Harrison family seat.

"Come away: for life and thought Here no longer dwell."

But there is new meaning for those final and staying words so often on her lips—words of the poet-laureate of God: "I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever"!

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

spent the week-end beginning Thursday, January 31, at the University of North Carolina, making talks to and advising with University students interested in the ministry. The Church has recently completed the erection of a large and beautiful church and parish house at the University, for the most part, the gift of Mr. William Erwin, of Durham, one of the leading laymen of the diocese of North Carolina.

"Life Work."

Bishop Darst gave the first of a series of vocation lectures at the University of North Carolina, arranged by the University Bureau of Vocational Information, with the object of placing before the students first-hand information regarding the different professions and vocations. The Bishop's subject was "The Ministry as a Life Work". "The ministry offers the man who wants to make his life work count for something a greater opportunity than any other profession," the Bishop declared, as he made his appeal for enlistment in the ministry in behalf of all the denominations.

The Rev. Fred Drane, some time archdeacon of the Yukon, has recovered from sickness which necessitated his withdrawal from Alaska, and is able to take up some of the duties of the ministry. Starting by assisting his father, the Rev. Robert B. Drane, D. D., in the services of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., he took the entire morning services on Septuagesima and Sexagesima Sundays in St. Peter's Church, Washington, N. C., while the rector, the Rev. Stephen Gardner, was incapacitated on account of laryngitis.

Life Membership.

At the annual parish meeting at St. Stephen's Church, Goldsboro, George C. Royall, for forty years a member of the vestry of the church, was elected to life membership of the vestry. The meeting confirmed this honor by a standing vote accompanied by applause. Mr. Royall is a member of the Executive Council of the Diocese, and has been a deputy to the General Convention a number of times. S. G.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Coadjutor

Noon-day Services.

The annual noon-day Lenten services will be held as usual in old St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, the Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., rector, beginning Thursday, February 14. These services will commence promptly at 12:20 P. M., and will close promptly at 12:50 P. M. Among the preachers this year will be: Bishop Helfenstein, Dr. Robert Johnston of Washington, D. C., Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., of West Virginia, Rt. Rev. Granville Gaylord Bennett, D. D., of Duluth, Rev. Arthur L. Kinsolving of Amherst, Mass.

Personal Notes

The Ven. James F. Plummer, Archdeacon of Southern Alabama, has accepted a call to become Archdeacon of Middle Tennessee, with headquarters in Nashville.

The Rev. W. A. Jonnard, rector of St. John's Parish, Savannah, Ga., has accepted a call to St. Paul's Parish, Manhattan, Kansas.

The Rev. Z. T. Vincent, rector of Trinity Church, Pierre, S. D., has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Luke's Church, Fort Collins, Col. Mr. Vincent is a member of the "Seventy" recently appointed by the National Council. His address is 312 Oak Street, Fort Collins, Col.

The Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, after having spent four weeks carrying on visitations in the Hawaiian Islands, has returned to this country. He went directly to New York, where he attended the meetings of the National Council. This visit to the Hawaiian Islands constituted Bishop Burleson's first official act as Assessor to the Presiding Bishop.

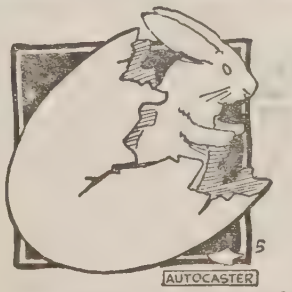
The Rev. Ambrose Henry Beavin has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Luke's Church at Hot Springs, Va., and plans to take up his work there on March 1. His present charge is St. Paul's Church, Winter Haven, Fla. Except for services by supply clergy, the church at Hot Springs has been without a rector since the resignation of the Rev. Edward Henry Ward, D. D., September 1, 1928. Dr. Ward removed to Lexington, Ky., where he was elected an Honorary Canon of Christ Church Cathedral. Dr. Ward died January 9, at the home of his son in Ensley, Ala.

The Rt. Rev. W. Blair Roberts, Suffragan Bishop of South Dakota, is at the present time visiting the Theological Seminaries of the East and will return to the District February 22.

The Rev. J. Manly Cobb, rector of Christ Church, Blacksburg, Va., has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Takoma Park, in the Diocese of Washington, change effective March 15.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Roma Coxey Fortune, missionary to the deaf in the Diocese of North Carolina, was advanced by Bishop Cheshire to the priesthood on Septuagesima Sunday, January 27, 1929. The ordination service was held in St. Philip's Church, Durham, the Rev. Sidney S. Bost, rector. The Sermon was preached by Bishop Cheshire. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Sidney S. Bost, with whom Mr. Fortune has associated and studied since he was made Deacon on May 5, 1918. The Rev. Alfred S. Lawrence, of Chapel Hill, acted as the Bishop's Chaplain. The Rev. Milton A. Barber, rector of Christ Church, Raleigh, read the Epistle; and the Rev. Clarence E. Buxton, of St. Andrew's Church, Greensboro, assisted with others in the celebration of the Holy Communion. The service and sermon were interpreted in the sign language to a large number of deaf people by James Robertson Fortune, son of the candidate. At the time of communicating, Bishop Cheshire invited the deaf people to come forward first and he was assisted by the newly ordained priest in communicating the deaf.



Since Mr. Fortune became deacon nearly eleven years ago he has been most active in building up missions in Burlington, Greensboro, Winston-Salem, High Point, Charlotte and other places. His congregation in Durham numbers about sixty communicants. A church for the deaf will soon be erected in Durham, and it will be in honor of Bishop Cheshire, who regards this work among the deaf as an outstanding realization of his long episcopate.

Jean Andrew Vache was ordained to the diaconate on January 9, in St. Paul's Church, Beaufort, N. C., by the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of East Carolina. Mr. Vache was presented by the Rev. Guy Madara, rector of Christ Church, New Bern. The Rev. George W. Lay, D. C. L., a former rector of the parish, read Morning Prayer and assisted in the Holy Communion. The Rev. Stephen Gardner, rector of St. Peter's Church, Washington, N. C., preached the sermon. The Rev. Walter R. Noe, executive secretary of the diocese, read the Litany. For eight years Mr. Vache was a minister of the Presbyterian Church. Since his confirmation six months ago he has been a member of Christ Church, New Bern, serving a part of his candidacy in the missions near New Bern and Washington, going to St. Paul's, Beaufort, three months ago. He will serve St. Paul's, Beaufort, and St. Andrew's, Morehead City, as minister-in-charge.

Reginald Wells Eastman, Deacon, on St. Paul's Day, January 25, in St. Mary's Church, Gatesville, was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of East Carolina. Mr. Eastman was presented by the Rev. Robert B. Drane, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Edenton. The sermon was preached by the Rev. William A. Brown, rector of Christ Church, Portsmouth, Virginia. The Rev. A. J. Mackie, of Windsor, and the Rev. Fred Drane, of Edonton, assisted in the service. The Rev. Mr. Eastman will continue as minister-in-charge of St. Mary's Gatesville, and the surrounding missions.

The Rev. S. Thorne Sparkman was ordained priest by the Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Bishop of Upper South Carolina, on February 2, 1929, in the Church of the Nativity, Union, S. C. The Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton presented the candidate. The Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor preached the sermon. Mr. Sparkman will be rector of Nativity, Union, and Calvary, Glenn Springs, S. C., with address at Union, S. C.

Oh, when shall we learn the sweet trust in God that our little children teach us each day by their confiding faith in us—we, who are so mutable, so faulty, so irritable, so unjust; and He, who is so watchful, so pitiful, so loving, so forgiving! Why cannot we, slipping our hand into His each day, walk trustingly over the day's appointed path, thorny or flowery, crooked or straight, knowing that evening will bring us sleep, peace, and home?—Phillips Brooks.

WILL THE LAITY ACT OR SURRENDER

Editor "Southern Churchman":—

With startling rapidity come the positive proofs of the plan of the "Anglo-Catholic" party in the Church to turn it over bodily to the Church of Rome.

The "Antidote" is a magazine published under the auspices of the Roman Church. In its issue of August, 1928, there is an article reading as follows:

"CONFRATERNITY OF UNITY"

"The 'Bulletin,' No. 3, of the above named organization, issued on the feast of Corpus Christi, 1928, has reached the editorial sanctum of the 'Antidote,' and we have examined it with more than ordinary interest.

"The 'Bulletin' thus explains the Association:

'The Confraternity of Unity is composed of members of the Anglican Communion who believe that the See of Rome is the Center of Unity for all Churches. This Confraternity therefore seeks, THROUGH CORPORATE ACTION WITHIN THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION, a basis of reunion with the Holy See which wil not be prejudicial to the facts of HER sacramental life.'"

The quotation is interrupted here to direct attention to the fact that this is an exact quotation from a "Bulletin" issued by a society existing in the Protestant Episcopal Church, stating its purposes.

The quotation from the "Antidote" continues:

"Under the heading of 'Notes,' the policy of the Confraternity is thus described:

"'Policy: The Confraternity of Unity exists to foster comity between the separated Churches and the Holy See. Prayer and study are the indispensable means of the Apostolate for the union of the Churches. No reunion is possible until a spirit of mutual confidence and understanding friendship exists among Catholics. The problem is doubly complicated for the Anglicans because of disagreement and dissensions within our Communion. The Confraternity is often exhorted not to attempt the work of Catholic Reunion UNTIL THE WORK OF CATHOLOCIZING THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION IS AN ACCOMPLISHED FACT. Then there would be the next work of reunion. But the Catholic revival is a movement. Never in its history has the advance tarried for the rear-guard. The new thrust in the movement is necessarily reunion with the rest of the Catholic world, NOTABLY THE MOTHER SEE OF ROME, from which we were so violently torn away several hundred years ago. And the Confraternity wished to emphasize and recognize the obviously developing phase of the advance towards reunion. That is its vocation. We set a pace. We offer a lead to all praying for Ultimate Reunion with the Holy See.'

"The movement looking to the corporate return of the Anglican Body to communion with the Apostolic See has made notable progress since the early days of the Society of the Atonement, and we shall watch its further growth and development with lively and prayerful interest"

What is the "Society of the Atonement" to which this Roman Catholic journal refers? It was a brotherhood and sisterhood, formed in this church in 1899 by one "Father" Wattson which issued a publication known as "The Lamp." In 1909 this Society went over to Rome, with all of its funds (contributed by Episcopalians). At that time the fact came out that since 1904 one cent out of every dollar coming into its treasury (or the "Peter's Pence") had been forwarded regularly to Rome in January and August of each year!

A reading of this article in the "Antidote" gives rise to some serious inquiries.

How many of the Bishops and Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church are members of this "Confraternity of Unity," which, apparently with the consent of Bishops and Clergy' is operating in this Church for the sole purpose of "Catholocizing" and uniting it with Rome?

How many lay members has this "Confraternity"?

How many other societies, secret and otherwise, are there within this Church, engaged in the work of "Catholocizing the Anglican Communion"?

And last, but by no means least, how long are the laity of the Church going to stand for this sort of thing?

The law of this Church confers upon the laity the right to put a stop to this process of Romanizing the Church. Will they act or sit idly by and see their Church, with all of its vast properties and funds, carried bodily to Rome, as was done by the "Society of the Atonement"?

Orders of Monks, Sisterhoods, Confraternities, such as "The Living Rosary of Our Lady and St. Dominic," this "Confraternity of Unity," "Catholic Clubs," etc., all engaged in this move to "Catholocize the Anglican Communion," continue to multiply. For reasons best known to themselves, no protest is heard from Bishops or Clergy.

Will the laity act or surrender?

THE FAST

"Turn ye even to me," SAITH THE LORD, "with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning: and rend your heart, and not your garments, and turn unto the Lord your God: for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil."

"Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out of thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?" THE MOUTH OF THE LORD HATH SPOKEN IT.

"When ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret: and Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." JESUS CHRIST.

A STATEMENT.

About two years ago we began making special appeal for funds with which to purchaes a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00, and we wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of edbt. Who will help?

The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, endorses this appeal.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $..... to be paid in cash or istalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The worst consequence of sin is not suffering, but sinfulness.—Selected.

"Before a man can do his best he must be his best."

Love's secret is to be always doing things for God and not to mind because they are such very little things.—F. W. Faber.

God can do little for a soul that shrinks from difficulty.

Our Heavenly Father is no Eli: He will not suffer His children to sin without rebuke; His love is too intense for that.—Spurgeon.

Christianity aims at the most radical of all revolutions. It aims to give man a new heart, it turns the world upside down.

The Christian life that is joyless is a discredit to God and a disgrace to itself.—Maltbie B. Babcock.

Are you hungering and thirsting after righteousness? Then you cannot be disappointed. God will not allow disappointment to follow such aspirations. He has plainly said, Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled. The Lord is not a host who invites more guests than His banqueting table will accommodate. There is no shortness in the Father's house, there is "bread enough and to spare".—Joseph Rucker.

There are people who would do great acts; but, because they wait for great opportunities, life passes and the acts of love are not done at all.—F. W. Robertson.

He who thinks he will gain happiness by paying off a grudge, executing a revenge, giving rein to a pent up passion of hatred, will in that very act fill for himself a goblet of gall and wormwood.

"God directs His servants' steps, and also His servants' stops, when they are not able to take any steps but feel bound to stand still. He directs them in not acting as well as in acting."

We are in the world to live like Jesus Christ, and we cannot live like Him unless we take a great deal of time for friendship, partnership and companionship with Him. If we do not take time for prayer and communion with Him, we shall not be like Him, and we shall have sinned grievously.—R. A. Torrey.

St. John's Gospel tells of certain Greeks who came asking to see Jesus. Suddenly, we are told, there came a voice from heaven glorifying Jesus as the Son of God. Of those who heard it, some said it thundered; others said an angel spake unto Him. It was one and the same voice from the clouds, but to some it was the noise of thunder, to others it was the voice of an angel. And so it is throughout life. God speaks. He speaks in the selfsame voice to all the children of men. To some it is only the noise of thunder; to others it is the voice of God.

ROBBING GOD AND SOPHIE SMITH AT SMITH COLLEGE, MASS.

Loyal alumnae of Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, are unfortunate. They have been striving zealously, with publications and communications, to convince the public that the college, established and sustained with a $35,000,000 endowment, much of it from a wealthy woman who died in 1870, is not "a nest of atheism, anarchy and vice". Hard on the heels of their protestations and disclaimers a professor at the College of Sociology, Harry Elmer Barnes, surges to the front with vociferous proclamation and evidence that the institution is and will continue proudly to be "a nest of atheism, anarchy and vice".

The situation has ludicrous aspects. While the alumnae busily talk, with their typewriters, copiously and volubly trying to prove that the college is the home of high and pure and beautiful and improving culture, the professor insists on making himself heard to the contrary. Like an ill-bred child, incited by childish vanity and demanding to be noticed, at any cost, he raises his voice clamorously and blurts painful and distressing family secrets. It was the professor's class, presumably under guidance of his sociological standards and ethics, that sent out the questionnaire asking each highly cultivated young lady her experiences of personal immoralities and whether in her opinion, after four years under the professor's mental lead, a married woman should or should not be entitled to an indefinite number of lovers. Somebody in the college was so elated with this demonstration of refinement and loveliness of discussion that it was given promptly to the press and every yellow newspaper wallowed raptuously in the suggestiveness. The faculty of the college attained new distinction by activity in behalf of Sacco and Venzetti, Italian anarchists, thieves and murderers, and by denunciations of judge, jury and governor for conviction and execution of those criminals, in orderly course of law. Anarchists, outside the college, in this country and three or four others undertook to stage mobs to express sympathy with Sacco and Venzetti, and the Smith College faculty by denouncing the governments of the United States, the State of Massachusetts and this country generally. These efforts were feeble and futile and Professor Barnes and his college faded from general public observation.

The professor could not endure patiently this condition of innoxious disquietude. At the recent meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science he arrived and appeared and pushed himself in with a portentous paper making definite attack on the Christian religion and all religions—by way of confirming the indignant denial of the alumnae that Smith College was a nest of atheism. He was snubbed, promptly and summarily, his paper described by Dr. Osburn, President of the Association, as an "intrusion". But what boots a large snub to a small sociologist lustful for the front page? The professor achieved some prominent headlines a day or so. A writer in one newspaper, describing herself as an atheist student of Columbia College, rejoiced over the professor's utterances and endorsed them cordially, if somewhat crudely. Yet, the porfessor dropped out of sight again. Then he sought and found, through the Sunday New York Times of January 13, a new outlet to the gladdening light of notoriety and in five columns of type set forth his conclusions on religion, science, theology, the Scriptures, the past and future of mankind.

Another and an irresistible touch of humor is given by the fact that while Professor Barnes Sunday, January 13, accepts the Darwinian theory of evolution as beyond controversy, Sunday newspapers of January 20 publish from Dr. Austin H. Clark, of the United States National Museum, described as having "worldwide reputation as a biologist," an article declaring the Darwinian theory to be absurd and entirely wrong. "There is not the slightest evidence," Dr. Clark says, "that any of the major groups rose from any other." He concludes that "the creationists have the better of the argument." And a few weeks ago profound scientists announced that the nebular hypothesis of creation, accepted many years by all profound scientists as indisputable, is nonsense.

Professor Barnes, professor of sociology at Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, is entirely sure that evolution is true and that religion is not only false, but a blight, a danger, an opiate, as the Soviet government says. He defines his position and, presumably, that of Smith College and the teaching to be instilled into the young woman students, clearly, thus: "An even stronger motive for scientific criticism of all orthodox religion may arise from the apprehension of the scientist that human misery and suffering are being increased and perpetuated by orthodox religion. . . . The writer believes orthodox religion to be the foremost existing obstacle to human happiness and well being." The ideas of supernatural power and of life and hope after leaving this world are rejected by the professor, scornfully. Following his declaration that fear of punishment and hope of reward are degrading to humanity to its directly logical conclusion, we must determine that government and laws intended to restrain and regulate our conduct and actions are insults to our dignity and intelligence and things to be repudiated and overthrown—which is the Sacco-Venzetti idea precisely and pleasant and uplifting teaching for young women supposed to be the mothers of an oncoming generation. Government and laws, we infer from the professor's expressions, are unscientific and inhumane. Each noble human being should be left to decide for himself, or herself, what is right or wrong and act accordingly. Persons like Sacco and Venzetti, deciding that they are entitled to money earned and held by somebody else and assassinating the officer obstructing them, should be regarded as making a regrettable mistake, as we gather, but not otherwise disturbed.

It is clear as day that the system of morals and conduct inculcated by this enlightened scientist and to be inculcated by his students in their children, if any, would lead straight back to barbarism made by the new means of destruction more hideous than any barbarism of the past and to the extinction of the race by greed and lust and hates uncontrolled by regard for any law or power beyond our own desires and impulses. His teaching is for the individual hopelessness of anything beyond this invariably troubled life and its invariable disappointments and distresses and, consequently, the right, or duty, of suicide as the one escape; for classes and nations, general strife, to cease only with general extinction.

None of this doctrine of destruction, chaos and ruin is new. In almost every village the like of Professor Barnes and Professor Hankins is found in the eagerly chattering local atheist or infidel—frequently too highly intellectual to earn a living and supported by the women of the family. That moral, or mental, malady, is distinguished from all others by the horrible craving of its victims for infection of others. Some of the busy, impotent apostles of despair have developed in each generation since the beginning of history. Fairly exact pictures of Professor Barnes, the Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, whom the professor quotes joyously and at length, the Rev. Dr. Cadman and the Rev. Russell Bowie—who has written a book to "humanize" Christ—may be found, humorously and satirically drawn, in some of the older novels, notably the classic, "Ten Thousand a Year". More than a hundred years ago Robert Owen came from England to warn us that religion, and especially Christianity, would blight and stunt and ruin us, just as Professor Barnes and the Soviet warn us now. This great, dominant, ever-growing, republic with its fifty million professing Christians, stands to refute Owen, just as a greater republic and a peaceful and happy world dominated by Christian faith and principles will refute Professor Barnes a hundred years hence.

Every hour of every day a man or woman dies somewhere with spirit rising gloriously triumphant over all the pangs and fears of death. Parents are enduring the supreme agony of seeing children die and finding alleviation only in confidence of happy reunion in Heaven. Sinful people going through the valley of the shadow of death gather in their misery comfort and hope from the promises of Christ. The stricken, pain-racked, unfortunate, careworn, toil-worn, weary and heavy laden are cheered and all their suffering and trials are eased by faith that the mercy of God and intercession of the Saviour presently will give them an eternity of rest and peace and beautiful and tranquil life.

"Come unto me all ye that travail and are heavy laden and I will give you rest."

Professor Barnes, Mr. Cadman, Dr. Fosdick, Dr. Bowie and the rest of them—all smug and in pleasant and snug berths, and not over zealous in surrendering personal vanity or ease—and under a claim of so-called science—deliberately labor to take from these people our old creeds and simple faith inherited from our fathers the conclusions of which pseudo science shifts continually and is as changeable as the kaleidoscope.

And everywhere in the world men and women who do not advertise and of whom nobody knows endure privations, humiliations, suffering, danger, endless labor, trying to uplift the fallen, to strengthen the weak, to draw to God and Christ and Hope those who have no other refuge. These people will continue to labor in God's vineyard, however much the smug and snug Barnes and Fosdick, Bowie and Cadman and Hankins and Karl Reiland elemen, claiming to be uplifters, reformers and progressives, may sneer at them and deride as foes of human happiness and advancement and progress.

It has been so through the centuries. Always the ephemeral busy little human insects have put their small eggs of poison here and there and then vanished to oblivion; leaving the poison to infect some minds naturally prone to disease. Probably in course of time and with growth of common sense and continued demonstration of facts and real truth the kind will disappear finally.

Now, finally, we say to Smith College, with its thirty-five million dollars, and Dr. Barnes, "He gave them their hearts desire but sent leanness into their souls".

Langbourne Meade Williams.

SECOND SUNDAY IN LENT

Berkeley Minor

COLLECT.

Almighty God, who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves; keep us both outwardly in our bodies, and inwardly in our souls; that we may be defended from all adversities which may happen to the body, and from all evil thoughts which may assault and hurt the soul; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THIS Collect is one of the oldest Collects, from the liturgy of St. Ambrose in fourth century, and (says Bishop Coxe), "is no doubt the same to which St. Augustine, with his son and friend Alypius, responded, Amen, when they knelt in the church at Milan on this Day, to be catechised after his conversion was brought about through preaching of St. Ambrose, then Bishop of Milan".

A part of the petition of this Collect is: "That we may be defended from . . . all evil thoughts which may assault and hurt the soul," which is "collected" from the Epistle, where St. Paul reminds the Thessalonian Christians that "God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness". "The wording of this petition (says the Rev. Melville Scott) was originally that, 'We may be cleansed from all evil thought' "; more forcible than "defended". Evil thoughts enter the soul, and, even if not harbored, leave a pollution that needs cleansing. And let us not for a moment harbor such thoughts, using the words of Jesus in the third temptation: "Get thee hence Satan," for (says an old proverb), "we who are gunpowder must avoid sparks".

THE Epistle is 1 Thess. 4:1-8. The teaching of the Epistle is very earnest against all impurity. To possess our "vessel in sanctification and honor", is the chief end and object of the Christian, and purity of body is not possible without purity of soul. It is not possible, at least here on earth, to keep evil thoughts entirely out of the mind; but not to tolerate them, not to harbor them is, by the grace of God, possible, and a sacred duty. My father had an old servant (a Negro woman), whom I remember well in my boyhood. She was quite lame from rheumatism and confined to her house in extreme old age. She was pious and industrious, and though no work was required of her, always asked for some work with her hands. One day my dear blind old grandmother was walking near her door. She told the old woman (whose friendship she valued) that she was troubled at times with evil thoughts. Aunt Lyddy said she, too, was so troubled, but she did not let them stay in her head; for, said she, "you can't keep the swallows out of the chimney; but you can keep 'em from buildin' their nisses there". The value of that holiness and sanctification, without which no man shall see the Lord (Heb. 12:14), is well shown in 1 Cor. 7:19-20, where St. Paul says: "What, know ye not that your body is the sanctuary of the Holy Spirit which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's."

THE Gospel is St. Matt. 15:21-28, and tells us of the healing of the daughter of "a woman of Canaan", or, as St. Mark calls her, "a Greek, a Syrophenician by nation". This woman is usually spoken of as a heathen, and probably was such; for this was a wholly heathen country, "the land of the accursed Canaanite". Dr. Geikie calls it, "the seat of the worship of Baal and Ashtaroth, which had of old so often corrupted Israel; a region so depraved and polluted, that the Hebrew had adopted the name of Beezelbub—one of its chief idols—as that of the prince of devils". Yet what we read here of the wonderful faith of the woman, makes one glad to think that even amid such heathenism were left some precious souls, verifying what Peter said, "God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to Him (R. V.)"; and we see here how acceptable to the Son of God was this faithful woman of Canaan.

As the Collect for this day is a prayer against "evil thoughts, and the Epistle is a warning against "uncleanness", so in the Gospel an "unclean spirit" is cast out, who had "grievously vexed" the daughter of the poor woman. The prayer of this woman of Canaan is a model of prayer, for it showed sincerity and faith, perseverance and determination, reverence, and humility. "She came and cried unto Him, saying: Have mercy on me, O Lord, Thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil." And then, fearing her prayer was not heard, she cried again: "Lord, help me," worshipping Him. And then when Jesus says so discouragingly, "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs", she says most humbly: "Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table." There must have been perfect sincerity here, even in her claiming only a dog's portion; for He who is the Word of God, and is a discerner of the thoughts, and the intentions of the heart (Heb. 4:12), put the stamp of His divine approval on her prayer. May we always be as sincere, when we approach the throne of grace, abasing ourselves only as low as to say: "We have erred and strayed from thy ways like lost sheep." This woman's faith overcame even the great resistance that our Lord thought it meet to offer. And lastly the reverence and humility of the woman's prayer are well shown by her attitude, falling at His feet, and her willingness to accept her Lord's bounty on any terms that seemed good to Him. And she realized the blessing of the publican in the parable, who humbled himself when he went up into the temple to pray; of whom our Lord said: "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Luke 18:14); for Jesus gives her the strongest commendation, saying: "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt; and her daughter was made whole from that hour."

ST. MATTHEW 10-39

By the Right Reverend Arthur Huston, D. D.

(The following is the sermon preached by the Bishop of Olympia at the nineteenth annual convention of his diocese.)

"He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

THIS is the enunciation of a law of the spiritual kingdom—the natural law of the spiritual world. Obedience to that law means spiritual growth and life. Disobedience to it means spiritual decline and death.

How often do we bear it said that "self-preservation is the first law of life". But when a mother sacrifices her life to save her child, or a miner succumbs to deadly fumes in the mine-pit while trying to rescue his entombed pals, or a great physician—as has sometimes occurred—experiments upon himself and dies in advancing the cause of his science, we realize that the law of self-preservation has been nobly ignored by the spirit of man, because it is not the law of the spirit, but of the body.

Self-preservation is the first law of the physical life. Its symbol is the sword—not the Cross.

It is evident, therefore, that the Cross of Christ cannot be a popular symbol in a world that is enamored of self-expression. The Gospel of Christ cannot easily capture the heart of a man surfeited with the world's stuff.

"How hardly shall they that have riches enter the Kingdom of God" was not meant as a fling at the rich. It was a plain statement of fact about the peril of riches. "For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

It is the Gospel of self-expression which seems to have the world's ear today, and it is producing a terrifying harvest of results.

We need not pause long to epitomize this Gospel. It is fairly familiar to us all.

It seems to say—if not in so many words, at least by implication—that what man needs most for the full development of his personality is not more law but greater liberty. And when one recalls—and we are not often allowed to forget it—that the tendency of reformation today is by legislation—it is easy to win the conviction of men by a plea for freedom from further restraints.

Let us follow this Gospel of self-expression, with its demands for freedom from external restraints, along some of its devious paths to see where it leads us.

Let us get down to what is commonly supposed to be the bottom round of the ladder. I say "supposed" to be the bottom round, because I am not sure that it is the bottom round in the sight of God.

Walk into our penal institutions, and on the one hand you find that a very large percentage of the incarcerated population is made up of drug addicts. Now, just what is it that they have done?

The principal thing that they have done can best be expressed in what they have failed to do. They have failed to give supremacy to the spiritual as opposed to the carnal. They have yielded to the imperious demands of bodily appetite until the will power has gone and their natures are enslaved. In that abnormal condition any crime is possible, and many actual crimes are committed. In looking for a short way of escape from the pain, sorrows, trials or hardships of life, not liberty but slavery has been the reward. The attempt to find life by that route has resulted in the loss of it.

Again, another large element in that prison population is youth—boys scarcely out of their teens. And what is it that they have done? They have been looking for new thrills; something—to put it in their own parlance—something out of which they could get a kick. And they stop at nothing. From killing an innocent child, to shooting a policeman, it's all the same great game.

The time was when the criminal was a man who had at least a criminal's code of honor. The burglar, the bandit, the highwayman of old carried a gun, but he rarely used it except in self-defense. Today an irresponsible seventeen-year-old youth sticks a gun into your ribs and if you are not as responsive as he thinks you ought to be, your relatives lovingly lift your remains off of the cold marble slab of the morgue on the morrow.

We call it an era of Jazzmania Americana—and let it go at that.

Come into the Juvenile Court, and what do you find there? You will find a sober-faced Judge who will tell you—nine out of ten of them do—that the reason for the Juvenile Court and its over-crowded calendar is the absence of homes.

Or slip around into the divorce court, and what do you find there? You find a record that ought to give pause to anybody who has brains enough to think.

I wish that I might spend the rest of my time on this particular phase of the subject. Brethren of the clergy, we do not say enough about it. What we do say is too often mealy-mouthed. We can scarcely say too much.

Reports show that marriages result in divorces, not primarily because divorces are easy to get, but because homes are hard to make. The frequent plea of incompatibility in the divorce court bears eloquent witness to the fact that the Gospel of self-sacrifice has succumbed in the home to the Gospel—of self-expression.

Nobody covets a crown of thorns, but a crown with a few thorns in it will stay on the head longer than one full of fancy plumes bending to every breeze that blows.

The man who does not know what it is to sacrifice his whim—in short to lose his life—for the sake of the larger liberty and happiness of his own household cannot be expected as a citizen of the state to labor for anything more than the meat that perisheth.

He may be a distinguished success as a money-getter, but he will never acquire distinction as a life-giver.

And so I ask you to follow along this trail from the home to the mart, from the tottering sanctuary of the household to the parlous arena of citizenship.

In the days of my youth, citizenship had in it an element of romance; today it is full of cynicism. Politicians in those days were politicians, but men voted for them with an honest conviction that upon the election of their particular champion depended the salvation of the nation. We marched along in torchlight processions, with leaking torches dripping coal-oil down our backs, and we did it out of a conviction that we were carrying on a holy warfare against the enemies of civilization. The ballot was corrupt to the point of rottenness, but men voted with the same fervour with which women prayed. There was at least a sense of awe about it which was good for a man's soul.

But today it is different!

Citizenship has become so insensate a thing that the people of an enlightened Republic are able to witness the ratification of an international treaty that aims at outlawing war, without batting an eye, much less bending a knee. We merely say, "That's fine! Now bring on the cruiser bill".

. . . . . .

The psychology of today's citizenship is plainly a psychology of defeat, skepticism, despair. It is not a psychology of hope, of faith in our ability to remove mountains.

We look at the prevalent lawlessness and merely sigh over the waywardness of youth. But Niebuhr says, "The plain truth is not that youth is less ethical than its fathers, but that human happiness and human welfare were never so dependent as now upon the ethical character of our society".

The ceaseless grinding out of laws, statutes and ordinances over which we groan and against which we rail, this is after all merely the State's defense-mechanism built up versus a society whose educational processes have been divested of all moral content.

Opponents of peace treaties tell us that we cannot create peace by legislative fiat. Granted! But a society that has begun to yearn for peace will naturally aim at peace by legislation until such time as it can secure it by education.

Science is giving us sharper tools and more of them, but it is not giving us quickened consciences by which to control their uses. "Society progresses," said a teacher of philosophy, "by virtue of its self-imposed restrictions."

But if there is no education in self-control, then control by a majority, which is a root-principle of democracy, can never be anything but an intolerable imposition to be circumvented at all hazards.

In short, there is no sense in faulting the State for the lawlessness that prevails, while the Gospel of self-sacrifice succumbs to the Gospel of self-expression enthroned in many class-rooms and cavorting over the campus.

Just as we must educate for peace if we are ever to uproot the fallacy that the way to have peace is to prepare for war, so we must put moral content into all education. We must educate the people in the ways of self-control if we are not to see law and order succumb to lawlessness and license.

There is nothing in Democracy of itself which can keep it off the rocks except the moralization of her citizens. And with the Home and State leaving that type of education more and more to the Church, the challenge to the Church was never so great as now.

And so I ask you to follow this same trail of the Gospel of self-expression into the Church and note its effects upon the Gospel of self-sacrifice in the very heart of the family of Christ.

Let me repeat what I have said again and again, that the inefficiency of the Church is the inefficiency of the family as opposed to the efficiency of the factory. There is no doubt but that the Church could be a more efficient instrument if it were to operate as a factory rather than as a family. But it is a serious question as to how long it would continue to be a Christian institution.

The Church must be a family with love in its heart, or it will become a factory with an eye to dividends. It must be an army or it will become a mob. It must sometimes sacrifice efficiency in the interests of charity and it must accept temporary defeat in the interests of ultimate victory.

In short, it must lose its life for His sake, if it would find it.

Now, this is the hardest thing we are called upon to do, especially in an age which glories in self-expression. It taxes all the Christianity that we have because it brings us unto a Gethsemane where we must learn to say, "Not my will but Thine be done".

Worship is unpopular because worship without sacrifice is impossible. "Sacrifice," says Oxenham in his Catholic Doctrine of the Atonement, "is the highest kind of worship." But it is the element in worship which gets the lesser emphasis in this Church. For there are two elements in worship: the sacramental—that which we receive from God; and the sacrificial—that which we give to God. And if, as Jesus says, it is more blessed to give than to receive, then it follows that we should be more concerned over the sacrificial than the sacramental in worship.

But are we?

The sacramental element is God's grace mediated to us by various means. There is no reason why we should be concerned whether God is going to keep His promises. We can trust Him. The dubiousness is all on our side.

The sacrificial element consists of our thanksgivings which are all too infrequent in proportion to our petitions; our praises, which are often too formal and heartless; and our gifts, which, according to some, must never be mentioned at all for fear of desecrating the sacred precincts.

Apparently we find no difficulty whatever in standing up and saying or singing lustily, "All things come of Thee, O Lord, and of Thine own have we given Thee". It is a quotation from the First Book of Chronicles. But is it any more sacred than this, from the Book of Deuteronomy? "Ye shall not appear before the Lord empty; every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which He hath given thee." Or this from the Book of Exodus, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering; of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering". Apparently, there is such a thing as reciprocity in religion.

Are any of these Old Testament sayings more authoritative than this saying of St. Paul? "Charge them who are rich in this world, that they be ready to give, and glad to distribute; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may attain eternal life." All of these are among the offertory sentences in the Communion office, but some of them are very rarely if ever used.

How can we expect people to learn unless they are taught that you cannot apply the law of self-preservation to a spiritual organism, without losing the life you are seeking to save? But that is what is happening, and it is happening precisely because there are those who do not teach it or believe or practice it.

Show me a parish or a mission in this diocese or anywhere else in the country with a true sense of stewardship for its missionary obligations, and I'll show you one that is not gasping for breath over its own current expenses. This I say is not a coincidence. It is the outworking of a law.

It is a long trail which leads from the pew of the parish or mission, through the parish treasury; through the diocesan treasury and through the national treasury out into the mission fields of the Church throughout the world.

We are not an ungenerous people, but we are caught in the grip of circumstances which I have tried to make clear. The Gospel of self-sacrifice is today subservient to the Gospel of self-expression. If we look at these facts with a conviction of sin, with a sense of our responsibility, and with a prayerful and high resolve to do better, surely God will not fail us. But we must keep the Church a family, not make of it a factory; an army, not a mob; a divine society with a social mission, not a mere cult for self-improvement. In short, the Church must be a spring and not a sponge. It must apply spiritual law to spiritual things, or sink to the level of a discredited self-seeking institution aiming at self-perpetuation and reaping the reward of oblivion.

"He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for My sake shall find it."

This, I say, is the creative principle of the Church's life. It is as scientific a law in the realm of the spirit as the law of self-preservation is in the realm of matter. Apply this spiritual law to a business institution, and it goes into the hands of a receiver. Apply the law of self-preservation to the Church and the economic law of diminishing returns will do the rest.

Here, as everywhere else, brethren, we have our choice; but having chosen, it is not ours to alter the law by which the harvest is reaped!

But there is another unscientific attitude in the Church which worries me even more than the leaving of missionary support to chance. And it is likewise a phase of Missions, but it lies much nearer home.

I refer to the zeal for souls in our midst. Responsibility for recruiting the Church at home has been left entirely to the clergy. The Priesthood of the Laity is almost a sealed book.

Lay evangelism, personal evangelism, visitation evangelism are one and the same thing. Moreover, it is the Gospel method. Read the tenth chapter of St. Luke concerning the Mission of the Seventy. "He sent them two and two before his face into every city and place whither He himself would come."

This is the reason why I have taken an active interest in the recent religious survey and in the coming evangelistic campaign in Seattle. In the first place it represents (on the part of some of our denominational brethren) a turning away from mass evangelism by a professional revivalist, to organized personal evangelism by our lay people. For that reason alone we ought to be vitally interested in it.

But regardless of how it affects others, we ought to be interested in it for our own sakes.

There is plenty of room for spiritual adventure in this Church, and yet the spiritual adventurer today fares no better than he did in the days of John Wesley.

Just now a lot of loose bricks are being hurled at "Buchmanism". It is usually given that nickname by those who would condemn it. But I warn you that there are some movements which have survived their once opprobrious nicknames. "Protestantism" is one of them, and "Wesleyism" is another, and that does not exhaust the catalogue.

Every one of us knows, or ought to know, that there are a lot of unconverted people in the membership of our Church—people who merely nod a formal and a purely academic approval to our Church's general air of respectability. That is about all it means to them. But when it comes to the matter of a personal self-surrender to the Saviourhood of Christ on the one hand, or to His spiritual leadership on the other, they are uncomfortable at the very mention of such things.

Loyalty to a leader who willingly lost His life for our sakes! That is my plea this morning. His life without the sacrificial element is unthinkable. And to Him and to the spiritual fruits of His victory we can with confidence commit the issue of His Gospel of self-sacrifice.

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

I CHRONICLES.

Purpose.

THIS wonderful history was written, first, to make known something of the depths of the wisdom and knowledge of God, revealed in so dealing with Israel as to prepare a king who would prepare Jehovah a Sanctuary in the midst of His people, for only as His presence was in their midst did they enjoy God's blessing (Ex. 33:15; Ps. 16:11).

But this book was written to reveal God's sovereign grace and marvelous wisdom in preparing His Son, as His King, who will build His Temple in the midst of redeemed Israel, who is now building the Church, a holy temple for the habitation of God in the Spirit (Rom. 9:5; Zech. 6:12, 13; Eph. 2:19-22).

In and through Christ, God's great purpose to tabernacle with men will be fulfilled (Rev. 21:3; Eph. 3:11; 2 Cor. 1:20).

1. Chs. 1-9. Just as carefully as the Holy Spirit watched over the promised Seed through all the generations, in order to fulfill the promises in bringing Christ into the world, just so carefully does He watch over the incorruptible seed of the Word, received by the heart of faith (1 Peter 1:23; Heb. 4:2 R. V.; Jer. 1:12 R. V.; Isa. 55:11).

This seed of promise will beget kings after God's own heart, who will be channels of blessing to others (Rev. 1:5, 6; 1 Peter 2:5, 9).

2. Chs. 10-16. Man's king, the Antichrist, will be dethroned, as God's King, the Christ, comes to take His throne, the throne of David (2 Kings 2:4-8; Rev. 19:11-20; Isa. 9:6, 7; Luke 1:31-33).

The heart that yields wholly to the Lord will enjoy victory over Satan, sin, and self, as Christ is enthroned (Rom. 12:1, 2; 1 Peter 3:15 R. V.; Rom. 8:34 R. V.; Heb. 7:25).

3. Chs. 17-21. David's greater Son and Lord, as "the Branch", will build the temple of the Lord, and will rule as a Priest upon His throne (Zech. 6:12, 13).

Though He will subdue all of Israel's and God's enemies, as well as ours, He will not, like David, be filled with pride and wish to number His people (Heb. 2:5-18; Phil. 2:5-11).

Victory is for those who walk humbly with the Lord, who delight in His will, and who do not lean on the arm of flesh (Jer. 17:5-8; 1 Peter 5:5, 6; James 4:6).

4. Chs. 22-27. In Christ, we were not only prepared for a place and service in His House, but the service was prepared for us (Eph. 2:19-22; 1 Peter 2:5, 9; Eph. 2:10). By His Spirit, Christ is now preparing us for the place and service in God's Temple as priest-kings (Rev. 5:8-10).

5. Chs. 28-29. The Father's plan will be exactly fulfilled by the Son of David, who will yet sit upon David's throne, "the throne of the Lord", and He will build the Temple in Jerusalem according to God's pattern, also the Temple in the New Jerusalem in the heavenlies according to God's pattern (Ezek. 40-46; Zech. 6:12; Rev. 21:9-23; John 14:3).

"He who began a good work in us will perfect it" (Phil. 1:6 R. V.; Rom. 8:29).

WHAT IS HAPPENING AT CALVARY CHURCH IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK

By Amelia S. Reynolds

THE 24-HOUR DAY AT CALVARY.

CALVARY CHURCH is a cross-section of New York. There are sitting in the pews each Sunday morning families who have lived in the neighborhood for two generations or more, and visitors passing through the city. They're young and old, rich and poor. There are people who earn their living with their hands, and people who earn it with their heads. There are saints and bums; lady bums, as the small boy in Punch called them, and gentlemen bums. There are people who love the Lord and those who have never really tried to know Him.

The staff is called to twenty-four-hour duty. We are here to learn for ourselves a quality of life through willing submission to the Guidance of God, and to help other people to find the same experience. This endless job allows for no ear cocked toward a time clock. There is no open season for self-will.

Not along ago there came a late afternoon when I was tired. In the evening there was to be a meeting for which I had some responsibility. I needed a quiet spirit, and I needed a cup of tea. I went to a woman's club. It has a large membership of its own and members of other like clubs in other cities are free to use it when they are in New York. It is so large that I rarely see any one that I know. I ordered tea and rejoiced that I didn't have to talk to any one. I closed my eyes for a delicious moment, but opened them suddenly when a pleasant western voice asked:

"I want some tea, but I don't know how to order it here. Can you tell me?"

My tea had arrived and my fatigue had departed. I asked the maid to bring a second cup and a second installment of toast, and then invited the inquiring stranger to join me. She accepted shamelessly!

"I hoped this would happen," she said. "I was so bored and lonely that I spoke to you in desperation." Then: "I lied, I knew perfectly how to send for the maid and get tea!"

If you are on the lookout, anything is an opening. I laughed.

"You ought to join my crowd. We believe in honestly facing our sins!"

"Sins." She withdrew physically to the remotest corner of her chair, and spiritually a thousand miles away. . . I had been pretty abrupt, but she was jolted out of her boredom. I went on cheerfully.

"I saw you when you came into the room and was thankful that I did not know you. Sin one. If we hadn't a police commissioner out to check the crime wave, I said, I should have murdered you, for I wanted to be alone. Sin two. I did not want to talk and I wanted my own way about it. Sin three. Three sins in five minutes is doing pretty well in the sinning business, even for me!"

She approached physically two inches, and spiritually a thousand miles.

"What is the sect?" she asked.

"The Protestant Episcopal Church," I countered. After a surprised stare, she giggled so enchantingly that I loved her for butting in.

It developed rather quickly that she wasn't a temporary lonely person, but a permanently lonely one. She was a round peg that had tried new holes with amazing frequency. Three of the holes had been provided by jobs. Two by homes which had come with ex-husbands, for she was a much divorced person. She had exhausted the resources of her native State and was out to see what New York had to offer. It offered me!

Talking about yourself for the sake of clattering your tongue is a dreary business, but she was unhappy, in spiritual need, and she was eager to know the cause of my happiness. I do not know any theology. Religious hot-air bores me to death, but I knew a practical thing, for I knew the way out for her. I had found it for myself and I had seen other people find it. A talk with a woman like this is more exciting than the best mystery story ever written, because the story is true and through sympathy and Christ's power to help through you, you are in the middle of the story yourself.

This is unfinished business for me. It was a casual touch, but when we parted and I went to my meeting, she went to a shop to buy a New Testament. She wanted to find out for herself if there was confirmation in that book, for what I had said. I may never see her again, but something happened in that club room that I don't believe she or I will ever be able to forget. I believe that some day the work begun with her, will be finished; that she will find Christ and come through to a full surrender.

I was lunching one day with a Jewish acquaintance. The party was purely social, and her daughter joined me when we were having coffee. She was a charming child of fifteen to sixteen, eager to do her part in making the occasion a success. She began very naturally telling me about a dance that she had been to the night before.

"I like boys," she said, "but although it sounds funny, I have never seen the kind I like. The ones that come to the house to see my sister drink when they get a chance, and I don't like the way they behave with girls. I don't like the ones I know much better."

A little later she began very shyly and wistfully to tell me of an imaginary playmate who had been her companion ever since she could remember. He stood to her for everything that she had failed to find in the world about her. It was an extraordinary word-picture that she painted, of the way in which she had filled the gaps in that lonely inner life which so many young people lead. She had never been in a synagogue, for her parents had departed from their ancient faith. She had never been in a church, for they had found no other faith.

I told her about the Perfect Man, or rather not about Him, but about the things He did and said. She asked questions eagerly. Her last question brought a lump into my throat. "Do you suppose if I learned about Him, I'd have Him in place of the boy I pretend about?" She goes to school in a distant city, I may never see her again, but I believe that she has been started on a quest.

Sometimes casual contacts like these that I have described, go a great deal farther, but we cannot refuse to make any which are guided even if nothing more happens than the giving of a challenge. I am not in sympathy with the attitude that we can be satisfied with "dropping a seed" here and there. Even in the slightest contact when we talk on the major subject, we ought to be directed and ready to go all the way if we can. Even calling at Calvary is not the routine, drab business that it is sometimes considered. The clergy and staff treat it as a high adventure, for they go guided of God both as to when and where they go, and what they say when they get there. It is too easy to fill our hands with seeds and wander about the world dropping them. Too few seeds of this sort reach flower and fruit to make dropping them a man-size job to do for the Lord. Let us be thankful for every opportunity, no matter how slight, but let us also be keen to go further that we may help to bring to the point of surrender, those who are in spiritual need.

WHAT ARE THE BEST WORDS TO FIRST TEACH THE YOUNG

A Suggestion to Primary Class Teachers and Parents.

Rev. Dyson Hague, Toronto, Canada.

A great many parents, as well as Sunday-school teachers have wondered at times what are the best words to put into the opening mind of a child; the best seeds of the Word of God to first drop into the tender soil of the child heart.

Some years ago the Sunday School Commission of the Church of England in Canada, of which I was a member, had to grapple with this subject. As the result of a great deal of thought and labor, we came to the conclusion that the best words to give to the young child were the opening words of the Sixty-third Psalm:

O God, thou art my God.

The psychological value of this brief sentence, which is at once a confession of faith, a creed, and a prayer, consists in its brevity and its beauty. To begin with, the words are all monosyllables. In the next place they put into the child mind the primary truth imbedded in the human consciousness, the truth of the Being, the Personality and the Nearness of God, for, as the great French thinker, Pascal, finely said: "The heart has reasons which the reason does not know. It's the heart that feels God, not the reason." Primary truths are not demonstrable; for principles are felt, propositions are proved. In the third place it brings home to the child so beautifully the thought of the personal relationship to its Heavenly Father. Of course, there are other texts very simple, very sweet, very strong. For instance, there are a number of texts consisting of one syllable and three or four words that any child could learn, such as:

God is love;
The Lord is my Shepherd;
I am the Door;
I am the Way;
Thou God seest me;
Lord help me;
My Father Thou are the Guide of my youth.

What could be more beautiful than to implant these into the simple heart of the child and its tenacious memory. For, as I once heard the Rev. Mr. Lowe of the Diocese of Huron say, "What you put first into the trunk, you take out last".

Next in value and importance comes the teaching of a simple verse to the growing child to be repeated as a simple prayer, and, of these, three have proved of universal acceptance. Of the child prayer verses, I would be inclined to put as an easy first:

Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
Look upon a little child;
Pity my simplicity,
Suffer me to come to Thee, which may be considered the best because they bring to the child-thought the name and the image with a very beautiful adjective of the loving Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, and also embody in a very striking verse His beautiful call to the child-heart. Next in value we would put:

Jesus, tender Shepherd hear me,
Bless Thy little lamb tonight; etc.

and the following verses:

All this day Thy hand has led me, etc., and
Let my sins be all forgiven, etc.

It is at once sound in its teaching, sweet in its reality, and a very simple and comprehensive petition for the little child. Third and last, we would put:

Now I lay me down to sleep, perhaps the most universally used but certainly, to any Christian who seriously thinks, inferior in value from every standpoint to the other two, for the idea of bringing to the infant mind the idea of death is very objectionable to many.

But I want to tell my readers, especially the parents and primary class teachers, of four lines that have been a very great help to many of our children in the Canadian Church Sunday Schools. In fact I do not know of any four lines that seem to be more suitable for a small child individually, or for vocal repetition by a body of children corporately than these four lines. They have been called Bishop Baldwin's words for children. Bishop Baldwin was one of God's best men. A pious mother brought him up in the City of Toronto with a love for the Bible which was unusual even in those old days of reverence for God's Word. He became the most famous preacher in Montreal, if not in Canada, and in 1883 was consecrated the Bishop of Huron, of which he was the loved Bishop till 1903. One day he came to one of the Sunday Schools in London, Ont., and as the eyes of the boys and girls were fixed upon his beloved face, he said, "I want you to learn these words for me, repeat them line by line", and the listening scholars repeated the words:

Jesus died for me,
And shed His blood for me,
I love Jesus
Because He first loved me.

These words were caught up and repeated by hundreds. They are now being repeated by thousands, and individuals from many places might be able to tell of their marvellous effect upon the living and the dying. They are simple words, but they contain the very heart of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and I am sure that the secret story of their marvellous influence will be told in eternity. I can only say as a matter of personal practical experience, that if parents will teach their little ones to say these words, and Sunday-school Superintendents and Superintendents of Primary classes will cause the scholars to repeat them in unison, that they will find that they have not only a rhythmic beauty that is peculiar, but that they will bring into the plastic mind of the growing child a life principle of truth that time will not eradicate.

"What I Know About Flowers"

Sunday School Address, Written by Sidney Lanier for Master McKay, May 1, 1873.
(Lanier's Birthday Was Celebrated February 3.)

As my vision ranges over this multitude of youthful forms; as I catch the white gleam of banners, the gay fluttering of streamers, and the varied draperies of costumes; as I behold the sweet passing and inter-changing of red and white upon these clear complexions and the constant display of serious or merry feeling on these transparent countenances I could easily fancy that God had spoken some word of infinite magic, by which, in an instant He had transformed some glorious field of flowers into a more glorious field of human children. Ye fair and happy faces, ye unstained eyes and innocent brows of childhood, unto what shall I liken you, of all things bright and beautiful, save unto a host of flowers, fresh from some late rain of happiness and waving in the south wind of sweet emotion?

"To me, thou art a vision divine
Of myriad flowers lit up with summer shine
From the white myrtle-bud and lily-bell,
Like pearls that in the ocean waters dwell,
To those rich tints which on the tulips lie,
Telling their Southern birth and sunny sky."

Now, my Sunday-school comrades, undoubtedly you are like flowers in outward form and feature. Permit me to ask, are you like flowers also in your inward form and feature? Do you know that some of the finest and most fruitful lessons are to be learned by him who lovingly studies the manners and habits of the flowers? I have been studying them. Listen, I will tell you what I know about the life and death of flowers.

My comrades, the woods have a Sunday school every day, and all the boy-flowers and all the girl-flowers go to it. Now, the first thing—and one of the best things—that I know about the life of flowers, is that these flower-scholars never make any noise in school. It is true, sometimes they do lean over towards each other, when the wind blows, and whisper: so very softly that they do not disturb even the silent prayer of the trees. Now, if that little boy over yonder, for instance, who is talking nearly as loudly as I am, knew as much about flowers as I do, he would have learned long ago how very un-flower-like it is to make such a noise. Whoever heard of a tall Pine-Tree stooping down to stop some violets from talking too loud? Whoever heard of a Superintendent Oak having to send a Lily out of school for disorderly conduct? Whoever heard of a Beech-Tree being compelled to tie up two daisies with a grape vine for fighting and scratching in school? Whoever heard of a Pink screaming right outloud in Sunday school because a Rose had stuck a pin or a thorn, into it? Nobody. Whoever heard of Sunday-school boys in similar connections? Everybody. Indeed, this lesson which comes from the flowers is not only a lesson for us, but for children of larger growth, also, for men and women. I dare affirm that there is not in all this assemblage one single human soul but might find its advantage in contemplating this serene and blessed quietude of the flowers. There is a fine German proverb which declares: "Speech is silver, but silence is Gold." Who can rival the glory of Rose? And yet who is so silent in the midst of her magnificence? Ah, let us look upon the flowers—and let us learn to be still.

But I said that lessons were to be learned not only from the life of flowers, but also from their death. And this, at last, is the sweetest lesson of all. Mark how the flowers die. Without a single unseemly struggle, without a wail of regret for sin, without a moan of pain, without a rebellious wish for longer life, gently and serenely they fold their petals, like arms, and exhale their blessed lives away in fragrant sighs. Ah, my comrades, when we shall know that our Sunday-school days are over, forever, when we shall hear the frosty wind that will cut us down like the flowers; when we shall feel ourselves dropping, dropping away from the stem of our life; in that moment, God grant we may look back upon a life spent like the life of a flower, cheerful in sunshine and cheerful in rain, serene in life, serene in death. In that moment, God grant our souls may gently be blown upward, like odors of dying flowers, greeting all Heaven and its angels with the perfumed incense of hearts which have been made as pure as God's flowers by God's grace.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart"—Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by a sufferer in a hospital:

"For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee." Isaiah 41:13.

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

Book Reviews

THE BIBLE UNDER FIRE: By John L. Campbell, D. D. Introduction by Dr. Robert Dick Wilson. Cloth. Pp. 285. Published by Harper and Brothers, New York City. Price, $2.50.

A book which every thinking Christian should possess and digest at any sacrifice. The author departs from the field of apologetics and with sword in hand advances upon the ranks of our modern Philistines, "hewing to the line". The very fact that Robert Dick Wilson writes the Introduction is itself a testimonial to the worthiness of this contribution to the study of our confessedly skeptical Christianity. No phase of the problem is evaded. The treatise is marked by definiteness, directness, conviction and dauntless courage.

Ever since Dr. Herrick Johnson issued his "Christianity's Challenge", there has been needed a similar presentation of the claims of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints". The times have changed since Dr. Johnson's day and the issues have multiplied. Unspeakably dire is the result of our present-day religious education upon the young people. No really reasoning Christian can resist this argument. The opponents will not read it; for confessedly they never do look at the other side of the discussion, once they have become enamoured of the new knowledge. But the rest of us should.

Here is the history of the Biblical criticism from Jean Astruc, who, in 1753, utterly unspiritual and living a sensual life, laid the stones for the pathway of our later Modernists. The author shows with keen penetration the fallacy of reasoning which dissects Scriptural truth and patches unified narratives with assumed complexity of authorship. The illustration afforded by Bishop Nuelson, adopting these very methods, to prove that President Roosevelt was a myth, is striking and unanswerable. With the cardinal tenets of our faith, impugned or modified by the critics, Dr. Campbell deals with a frank and rational spirit. He proves all of the modern assumptions to be gratuitous, bores holes in the claim of the Deuteronomic authorship of the Pentateuch after the exile and the earlier historical works of the Old Testament, manifestly demonstrates the inspirational and supernatural character of the Bible, buttresses the ancient faith in the Incarnation, the Cross and the Resurrection and finally explodes the cherished figment of Evolution.

The schools which are affected by Dr. Campbell's caustic arraignment are wont to credit all opposers of their favorite hobbies with a mentality of fourteen years. But Dr. Campbell is a theological professor as is his friend and endorser, Dr. Wilson. Furthermore, Dr. Campbell is able to quote stalwart men whose intellectuality none may dare to discount. The wise crack that is so often flung at "fundamentalists" vaporizes as we consider the situation.

This reviewer is frank to confess that if he could not get another copy of this book, he would refuse to take a goodly sum in money for it. Every loyal child of the Heavenly Father will possess the like state of mind.

FACING CALVARY: By William Evans, Ph. D., D. D., The Bible Institute Colportage Association, 843 North Wells Street, Chicago, Ill. Price, 50 cents.

It is always good to be brought back to Calvary and this booklet, a meditation, serves that purpose admirably.

Every aspect of Calvary has its personal application and Dr. Evans brings out this personal appeal to utter self-surrender. We hope that this little booklet will serve to bring many face to face with Calvary and all that it implies. F. C.

BELIEF IN CHRISTIANITY LOST.

Mr. Editor:

(Extract from a personal letter.)

". . . . It brings to my mind a conversation I had with a college girl in the East, who had two cousins at St. Stephen's at Annandale-on-the-Hudson.

This is not a theological seminary, but is a Church college catering particularly to young men who intend to enter the ministry. This girl, the daughter of a clergyman in the Northwest, was telling me how her two cousins, sons of clergymen, have lost all their belief in Christianity since going to St. Stephen's, New York; how they ridicule the things taught them by their parents and by the Church. This, of course, is only to her. Their parents and presumably their pastors, know nothing whatever of their change of attitude since going into St. Stephen's. As long as these conditions are allowed to remain in the theological schools and the pre-theological schools we shall, of course, have un-Christian ministers in Christian churches, and the ultimate result is very easy to see. If I remember correctly, Mr. Bell, President of St. Stephen's is even mentioned in the Lusk Report (not in Lusk Report.—Ed.) as being a notorious radical. Certainly he is very well known as such."

"BUCHMANISM."

Mr. Editor:

I have read with interest the article by the Rev. Josiah R. Ellis, on "Buchmanism".

This is to register a protest against the use of the term "Buchmanism". This movement is doing so much to extend the Kingdom of Christ, not only through the churches in general, but, in very much larger measure, in our own Protestant Episcopal Church, that it seems a shame that it should be labeled "Buchmanism", or any other "ism".

I heartily agree with Bishop Shayler who calls this movement, "Acts of the Apostles Christianity".

Mr. Ellis seems to think that in those early times the "Good news of great joy" was published abroad by a comparative few of the apostles. That all the other disciples and even Matthias got their names on the Church roll, went to church regularly, said their prayers, and tried to be decent, respectable, conventional citizens. I think that is a good description of the present state of the Church, but it certainly does not describe "Acts of the Apostles Christianity".

The eighth chapter of Acts tells us about how the laymen went about preaching the Word, and goes on to tell about another layman called Philip. I expect Matthias was out preaching somewhere also.

It is evident that Mr. Ellis has never been to an "Acts of the Apostles Christianity" houseparty. I should like to read an article that I imagine he would write after he had been exposed to the atmosphere of a houseparty a sufficiently long time—say a week. We are all familiar with the advertisements of certain remedies, and the contrast "before and after taking". The contrast "before and after houseparties" is even more surprising.

I should again like to quote from Bishop Shayler in The Living Church of December 22. This quality of life that Mr. Ellis calls "Buchmanism" he refers to as follows:

"It has been my good fortune to share their experience in a small degree, and to share some fellowship in a larger degree. I can discover nothing in it but 'Acts of the Apostles Christianity'. This to my mind is the one great need of the Episcopal Church."

HEARTY THANKS.

Mr. Editor:

We wish to express through the columns of your valuable paper our gratitude for the responses, on the part of several of our mutual friends and readers, to the recent appeal to help give the many Little Children in our homes the best time they have ever had in their lives at Christmas. While the responses were not as many as heretofore, the children had a wonderful time and a never to be forgotten Christmas Tree; with eats a-plenty for six days to come. Of course, they were deprived of homes, and of their fathers and mothers, but in those sad hours of separation, with the help of the good people, we enabled them to forget their loneliness and great loss. So we would like you to help us say to these friends of these Little Children, we thank you heartily each and all and wish for every one a happy and prosperous New Year.

The influenza epidemic was good enough to delay its coming until after the holiday joys, but since then it visited us to the extent of over forty cases. This taxed our resources to the full, but up to the present time we have not lost a child by death or otherwise. The matron, doctors and nurses have been wonderful in their services and patience, and the children have been as good as could be under such cimcumstances. We do not know how many cases will follow, but we are still hopeful. Will you be good enough to let this be added also, that there are scores and scores of Little Children who need homes, fathers and mothers. These children are just what are needed in the homes which are childless, that these homes may be what they ought to be. Write us at Richmond, or Roanoke, if you are nearer, as we have over one hundred children waiting.

Very gratefully and with all good wishes, we are Cordially and sincerely yours,

Children's Home Society of Virginia,

C. E. Pleasants,

General Secretary of Finance.

PRAYERS AND THE DEAD.

Mr. Editor:

In the last issue of The Southern Churchman is a letter under the caption, "Prayers for and of the Dead". Reference is made to Paul's prayer for Onesiphorus and to the account of Dives and Lazarus.

Whenever we are dealing with the words of another it is very important that we quote ihm correctly. This your correspondent failed to do. Paul is made to say, "that he, Onesiphorus, might find favor with God in the day of judgment"; whereas Paul says, "May the Lord grant to him to find mercy from the Lord in that day". Nothing is said about the "day of judgment".

But what about Onesiphorus? Was he dead? It will be conceded that he was a believer—probably a convert of Paul—and if dead he was with the Lord in whose presence is fulness (pleroma) of joy, which means that his cup was so full that nothing more could be added; hence a prayer for him was unnecessary.

I cannot bring myself to believe that Onesiphorus was dead, for the following reasons: First, Every verb that Paul uses here is in what may be termed as an indefinite past time tense, and may be rendered as follows: "May the Lord grant to him to have found, etc". Second, If Paul prayed for the dead Onesiphorus that, in the day of judgment, still future, he might find mercy, etc., would he not have used the future tense? Therefore, Paul is looking backward, not forward. Third, The verb "to find" has a meaning "to find by experience"; also the word "mercy" has a meaning "A benefit the result of kindness". We may, therefore, paraphrase the prayer thus: "May the Lord grant to him to have found by experience (experimentally) once and for all that benefit from the Lord the result of his kindness to me in that day". What day? Why, the day he, Onesiphorus, "was in Rome and sought me out and found me". Paul had before said that "he had oft refreshed him and was not ashamed of my chains". This was the day; and Paul prayed that his friend and brother who had visited and ministered unto him at a great risk to himself, would be made to realize even now the preciousness of the assurance that, he who gave a cup of cold water only would in no wise lose his reward.

It is a grievous mistake to say that we must wait until "we all stand before the judgment of Christ" ere we can know that a reward is ours as a result of any kindness we showed His needy brethren. In His Word He gives to us to know right now that we have His blessing to be enjoyed as we journey through life here below. "God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labor of love, which ye have shewed towards His name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister" (Heb. 6:10).

Dives and Lazarus.

Now, with reference to the prayer of Dives for his brethren what availed it? What possible comfort can any one derive from one whose every petition was denied? To argue from this that the departed pray for the living is very near a non sequiter. The man born blind said, "We know that God hears not sinners". Dives was a sinner, otherwise he would have been with Lazarus. We read that there is one Mediator between God and man, Jesus Christ. The solemn truth (and hell is truth known too late), told Dives remains to this day, viz., "They have Moses and the prophets; we have the whole Bible; if we hear not that, which is sufficient to save us, then what?" See Heb. 2:3; 10:26-31; 12:25.

Church Intelligence

Foundations for Medical Centre Now Being Laid.

Some of the friends of St. Luke's International Hospital, Tokyo, residing in America, do not realize that construction of the main units of the new St Luke's International Medical Centre actually has begun.

Ground for the new Centre was formally broken on February 1, 1928, with impressive ceremonies attended by representative Japanese leaders in public life and by both American and Japanese clergy. Later in the spring the work of excavating was begun and the laying of the concrete foundations for the buildings, which will house the in-patient and out-patient departments, the College of Nursing and the public health department is now under way.

But buildings cannot rise without funds to buy the concrete and steel of which they are to be constructed. Unless money is rapidly provided the work of construction will have to cease and fragments of the noble group of buildings planned will have to stand uncompleted.

Chairmen in Thirty-one Dioceses Organizing Women Workers: By Jan. 25, women Chairmen for St. Luke's in thirty-one Dioceses had begun active preparations for their intensive campaigns. These Dioceses extend from Maine to Honolulu and the Chairmen are as follows:

Alabama, Mrs. Forney Stevenson, of Montgomery; Atlanta, Mrs. John M. Slaton, of Atlanta; California, Mrs. Philip Van Horne Lansdale, of San Francisco; Chicago, Mrs. Robert B. Gregory, of Chicago; Duluth, Mrs. C. C. Randall, of Duluth; Easton, Mrs. Thomas W. Perkins, of Chestertown, Md.; Erie, Mrs. C. F. Mackey, of Franklin, Pa.; Georgia, Mrs. James Davenport, of Americus; Fond du Lac, Mrs. Roy O. Mason, of Rhinelander, Wis.; Honolulu, Mrs. Walter R. Coombs.

Iowa, Miss Mabel Henderson, of Cedar Rapids; Long Island, Mrs. Raymond F. Barnes, of Brooklyn; Los Angeles, Mrs. Isaac Milbank, of Los Angeles; Maine, Mrs. Roger Vinton Snow, of Portland; Michigan, Mrs. H. J. M. Grylls, of Detroit; Minnesota, Mrs. F. A. McElwaine, of Minneapolis; New Jersey, Mrs. Charles Fitch, of Asbury Park; New York, Mrs. Charles Gilmore Kerley, of New York; North Carolina, Mrs. Lyman Cotton, of Salisbury; Northern Indiana, Mrs. William O. McBride, of Fort Wayne; North Texas, Mrs. R. L. McMeans, of Amarillo.

Ohio, Miss Kate Mather, of Cleveland; Quincy, Mrs. T. R. Stokes, of Kewanee, Ill.; San Joaquin, Mrs. Earl Marvin Price, of Bakersfield, Calif.; Santa Barbara, Mrs. F. F. Peabody, of Santa Barbara; South Carolina, Mrs. I. G. Ball, of Charleston; South Dakota, Mrs. E. P. Wanzer, of Armour, S. D.; Southern Ohio, Miss Mary E. Johnson, of Glendale; Southern Virginia, Mrs. James G. Scott, of Petersburg; Western Missouri, Mrs. Henry Burr, of Kansas City; Western Virginia, Mrs. Robert L. Kingsland, of Fairmont, W. Va.

Central Committees, on which men and women are working in conjunction, by the latter part of January had been organized in Albany, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and Western New York.

National Council Meeting.

The first meeting of the National Council in each year is the annual meeting, at which election of officers is held, and other business incident to annual meetings is transacted.

For the past nine and one-half years Dr. Lewis B. Franklin has served as Treasurer of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, and, as such, also of the National Council, elected to such office by General Convention, and since 1922 has also served as Vice-President under appointment by the Presiding Bishop. Bishop Murray, in reappointing Dr. Franklin as Vice-President, took occasion to express his great appreciation for the help Dr. Franklin has given him in the past years in this important office.

The Rev. Franklin J. Clark was re-elected secretary. The Presiding Bishop reappointed the Executive Secretaries of the six departments of the Council, together with the other officers of the departments serving with the Executive Secretaries. Dr. Franklin reappointed Mr. Charles A. Tompkins as Assistant Treasurer, and Mr. Frank A. Zubrod as Cashier. All these appointments were confirmed unanimously by the National Council.

The work of the Council and its departments is broken up not only into departments, but when occasion arises special committees are appointed to give consideration to any specific matter which may require such attention. Some of these matters require considerable study and investigation, thus making it necessary for the committees to hold over from meeting to meeting. All these committees were reappointed at this annual meeting. This also included the various commissions of the Department of Religious Education, of which there are thirteen.

For the past twenty years there has been in the Church Missions House a man who has given most faithful service in every department in which he has worked. He is now with the Adult Division of the Department of Religious Education, and the department brought in the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously by the National Council:

"Whereas: On June 10, 1928, Michael Francis Pfau completed twenty years of service at the Church Missions House; and

"Whereas: During that time he has spent himself faithfully and self-forgetfully in the Master's service; now be it

"Resolved: That the National Council, upon the unanimous recommendation of the Department of Religious Education, expresses to the said Michael Francis Pfau its sincere appreciation of his self-sacrificing service, and orders that a copy of this resolution be presented to Mr. Pfau and also spread upon the minutes of the Council."

Miss Edna Eastwood, who has recently come to the Adult Division of the Department of Religious Education, as Secretary for Home Study, was introduced by Dr. Ludlow.

Bishop Murray spoke most enthusiastically of his recent visit to Haiti and of the condition of the work there He stressed several points, but particularly the urgent need for a proper residence for Bishop Carson. The necessary land has been secured in a splendid location, and a new residence to be built thereon would cost approximately $15,000. Bishop Murray stated that he would personally assume the task of securing this amount without calling upon the resources of the National Council. He announced that $3,000 toward this had already been contributed by his own Diocese of Maryland.

Bishop Burleson, Assessor to the Presiding Bishop, who had been requested by him to visit the Missionary District of Honolulu, returned just in time for the meeting of the Council, and reported. The Presiding Bishop has appointed him bishop-in-charge of the Missionary District of Honolulu, pending the election of a bishop.

Miss Lindley and Dr. Lathrop, each of whom had been invited to teach in the winter conference of Church workers in Porto Rico, also made brief visits in the Virgin Islands, Panama, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic, and made most interesting reports on their visits to these Islands. What particularly impressed them was the eagerness of the people for the services of the Church. Dr. Lathrop said that one could go to service almost any time in the Virgin Islands and find several hundred people at service, whether it were early in the morning or in the evening. Large Sunday Schools were also noted. Bishop Murray spoke of this as a notable feature of the work in Haiti.

Congratulations were sent to the Council member recently elected Bishop of Lexington, the Rev. Dr. H. P. A. Abbott, formerly of Baltimore, now rector of St. Chrysostom's Church, Chicago.

The financial status of the Church's work required the most careful attention of the Council.

The whole situation is presented in the following paragraphs by Dr. Lewis B. Franklin, Vice-President and Treasurer:

On December 1 last, the Treasurer reported that there was $805,782 due before the end of the year on the amount which the dioceses notified the National Council to expect in the way of payments on their budget quotas. When the books closed for the year, $782,944 or all but $22,838 had been collected Of a total of $2,809,361 promised at the beginning of the year 99.2 per cent was paid.

Because of this splendid achievement

the National Council will close its books for 1928 with a surplus of more than $100,000 of income over expenditures. It must be remembered, however, that this happy result was achieved only after the reductions of appropriations last February to the extent of $237,924. In adjusting the budget at the beginning of the year, the National Council provided for a more rapid resumption of work in China than has been possible and a considerable part of the surplus for 1928 was due to this condition.

The prospects for 1929 are not as encouraging. With the stimulus of a General Convention, it was hoped that there might be a material increase in the support given by the people of the Church to the maintenance budget, at least to the extent that the high record of 1926 might be equalled or surpassed. This hope has not been realized. The dioceses tell us to expect for 1929 $2,820,739, which is only $11,432 more than their estimates for last year and $253,709 less than they told us to expect in 1926. The people of the Church have pledged $688,307 less than the budget quotas assigned by the General Convention.

General Convention has instructed the National Council, at its first meeting each year, to make a careful estimate of the income which will be available based on these reports from the dioceses and estimates of income from other sources. When this total is ascertained, the Council is under orders from Convention to adjust the appropriations for the year to an amount not to exceed the total estimated income. In order to avoid cutting the appropriations more than was absolutely necessary, the National Council at its meeting February 6 voted to apply toward meeting the 1929 budget the remaining balance in the account of 1927 and the estimated balance available from 1928. Even with these material additions to the income of the current year, the Council was faced with the necessity of cutting actual appropriations nearly $200,000. The difficulty of making this reduction in appropriations was intensified by the fact that General Convention had already taken more than $125,000 out of the budget as originally adopted by the National Council. As some one expressed it, "General Convention took the pound of flesh, it remained for the Council to draw out some of the life blood".

A considerable reduction was made in the several items for travel in the various Departments of the National Council and of the Woman's Auxiliary. This means that the valuable contacts from the Central Office with the dioceses and parishes must be limited. There was also a material reduction in the appropriations for printing and for the News and Field Bureau in the Publicity Department. The Commission on Evangelism, the Seamen's Church Institute of America, the Church Mission of Help, the American Church Institute for Negroes and other similar organizations receiving help from the National Council also suffered from the reductions. In the missionary field new work of great promise which had been endorsed by the Conference of Domestic Bishops held last April, by the National Council and by General Convention was abandoned. In addition to the elimination of certain specific items the appropriations to the domestic dioceses aided by the Council were reduced five per cent with the exception of such appropriations as are made from the United Thank Offering. The appropriations to the Continental Domestic Missionary Districts were reduced four per cent except for United Thank Offering items and Indian work. The appropriations for the Extra-Continental Missionary Districts, the Latin-American Districts and the Foreign Districts were reduced three per cent. These percentage reductions appear to be relatively small, but it is to be remembered that the major portion of the appropriations to the missionary field is for salaries. As these salaries are calculated on a minimum basis no reduction there is practical and the result is that when applied to the balance of the items the percentage must be multiplied many times.

Balanced budgets and surpluses instead of deficits may bring to the people of the Church a feeling of security for the financial status of our missionary enterprise, but no one realizes the cost to the missionary work of the reductions necessary in order to bring about the balanced budget will ever be satisfied until the Church as a whole undertakes to meet in full its missionary responsibility.

Adjusted Budget for 1929.

Showing cuts made in the work of the Church to close the gap between amounts authorized at Washington and later those reported by the dioceses as the sums they expected to pay in 1929:

The situation is summarized as follows:

Budget for 1929 as approved by General Convention		$4,224,670.00
Estimated income from Trust Funds and from United Thank Offering		715,570.00
Balance apportioned as quotas to thhe dioceses		$3,509,100.00
Dioceses report that they expect to pay in 1929 on these quotas		2,820,793.00
Balance of quotas not raised		$ 688,307.00
Towards this difference the Council has available:
Miscellaneous income	$ 86,500.00
Balance of 1927 Surplus	32,539.09
*a. Estimated Surplus of 1928	100,000.00
Balance of 1928 Contingent Fund	25,654.14
*b. Eestimated Lapsed Balances 1929 Budget	250,000.00	494,693.23
Net shortage, to meet which appropriations must be reduced		$ 193,613.77

*a. The exact amount of this surplus cannot be determined until final reports are received from distant fields. This surplus is properly available to meet the expenditures of 1929.

*b. Those Lapsed Balances are the difference between appropriations and actual expenditures. Appropriation must be made for a salary for each station in the mission field where a missionary is to be placed. Inevitably there are vacancies and unused appropriations. Savings which cannot be anticipated when the Budget is adopted are also effected in other ways.

The Nation-Wide Gospel Broadcast of the Vesper sermons of the Rev. Donald Grey Barnhouse, from the Tenth Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 5:30 to 6:00, Eastern Time, 4:30 to 5:00, Central Time.

The Lord has reserved for Himself many thousands in this country. Some echo of the cry of joy that has gone up from those who love the Lord Jesus Christ as they listen in to this broadcast is found in the hundreds of letters written from all parts of the country, each week, such as the following:

Wellington, Ohio.—As I listened, I was delighted to hear the old, everlasting Gospel so clearly, so uncompromisingly set forth. Sin, the Cross, the Blood, and Salvation are terms I hear so seldom, that when they are boldly proclaimed, my heart is stirred to its depths.

Washington, D. C.—I only heard a part of your sermon, but it rang so true to the blessed Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, that I cannot refrain from telling you the joy it gave me, in this age of rank Modernism. God bless you!

Real results in the saving of souls and building up of the saints are being accomplished.

Santa Anna, Texas.—I have just listened to your address. You made it very plain to me that if you follow the directions of the Book, it will take you home. I am to make this trip very soon, and have fully decided to take your advice and follow the directions as outlined.

Philadelphia, Pa.—I was "fishing" on my radio, and heard your voice by chance. I had not been to church for several years, but I listened to your sermon. Week after week I felt called back to listen in and finally I was born again while sitting beside my radio, and have now joined the church near here on profession of faith.

Setauket, N. Y.—Your sermon on Sunday night sent me to my room and to my knees, for It gave me a new and deeper vision than ever before of what Jesus Christ did for me on the Cross.

Shut-ins and those in isolated places rejoice in these messages.

Friendsville, Md.—We are neither of us able to attend church service. What a joy it is to be able to hear the Gospel preached over the radio.

Borger, Texas.—We are living out from town on a lease in an "oil field shack". It is in just such places that the Christian appreciates such sermons as yours.

Those who never attend church are being reached:

Kansas City, Kan.—I know a very wealthy bank president whom I have never known to enter a church, who listens to your sermon each Sunday.

York, Pa.—I was in a home where there are unsaved Sunday, and asked them if they would mind tuning in. I praised the Lord that they got to hear the truth. Am enclosing $1. Am sorry I cannot make it $1,000. Am just a poor working girl, but wanted to have a share in it.

Many are helping together by prayer.

Jerseyville, Ill.—My daily prayer is that God may support and continue this broadcast, also that He will give you the necessary strength and prevent Satanic interference. Am mentioning your broadcast to nearly every one I meet.

Americus, Ga.—As I listen I ask for God's power to use His Word for the salvation of souls.

This is a work greater than any man or any church, and is a service to the whole body of believers. The Lord is supporting this broadcast through His faithful children, who are sending in, mostly in small amounts, the $1,110, which it costs each week.

Perhaps God may lay it on your heart to support this work by prayer, or by a gift, which may be sent to "Radio Fund", P. O. Box 2000, Philadelphia, Pa.

Progress at Tai-kam Island, China.

The Rev. and Mrs. John Lake, of Canton, China, recently took twelve members of their Mission on a launch, provided by Mr. Bethell, Commissioner of Customs, Macao, to see their dreams coming true in this haven for lepers on Tai-Kam Island.

It lies in pirate-infested waters and its only inhabitants are pirate-fishermen, who have even lent aid and protection to those helping this enterprise. The Island, of seven square miles, has wooded hills, rolling plateaus, rice plains and bubbling springs. In the group of buildings now nearing completion are houses named for American donors: Scott, Tremont, Washington, Fisk, Mason, Cincinnati, White, Macon.

Over a hundred lepers in receiving stations on the mainland near by are anxiously waiting the glad word that they may come Home. Now the need for supporters, doctors, nurses, and furnishings is imperative.

Endowment Fund Month.

February is Endowment Fund month for the Church Periodical Club. The Endowment, now amounting to $40,000, has almost doubled since 1914. It has been made up from comparatively small gifts and bequests, more of which are always welcome as they extend and stabilize the work of the Church Periodical Club. The interest from the fund is used to buy books.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Virginia's Cathedral Shrine.

There is perhaps no greater need of our clergy and other Church workers than vacations spent to the best advantage not merely for physical upbuilding and refreshment, but also in spiritual renewal and strengthening for their responsibilities as leaders.

The Cathedral Shrine of the Transfiguration, Orkney Springs, Va., the Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, M. D., rector, is peculiarly fitted to meet this need. For five years many people, old and young, who have attended the services, have spoken of them as spiritual experiences never to be forgotten, and devout souls who have knelt at the Holy Communion have had a fuller understanding of the words of the Sanctus: "Heaven and earth are full of Thy glory."

Up to this time most of those attending the services have been summer visitors at the nearby hotel and neighboring cottages and motorists from elsewhere. An opportunity, long desired, has now come to make special provision for clergy and other Church workers, so that hereafter from spring to autumn groups of such may gather here for periods of quiet retreat and restful, congenial fellowship.

Side view of the Cathedral Shrine of the Transfiguration.

This is being made possible through the Shrine's acquiring several adjoining cottage properties. A gift of one thousand dollars from a Philadelphia Church woman has been supplemented by a few gifts of less amounts from widely separated donors, some of them never having seen the Shrine. The Bishop of Virginia has made a substantial contribution with the assurance that he will himself spend part of his summers at the Shrine. To carry out the project will require some eight thousand dollars more. The present intrinsic values of the Shrine are about ten thousand dollars, and the same generous interest of a few earnest Church people which brought it into being by their hallowed gifts will rally now to broaden its ministry.

The Swimming Pool. The Bishop of Virginia may be seen in the foreground.

It was on the Mount to chosen witnesses that the revelation of the Transfigured Christ came—to suffuse the after life on the plain with rich power and blessing. So it has been in every generation since. So it is today. "Come ye apart and rest awhile" is the Master's bidding to quiet mountain retreats, that the little group of His chosen messengers may in the joy of His Presence and in the rare fellowship of kindred souls tarry for a season in worship, meditation and spiritual converse.

Protestant Churches Hold Joint Services

The first Protestant Churches in Chevy Chase, one of Washington's most beautiful outlying districts, have united in a series of Lenten services to be held Thursday evenings in the several churches. The first of the series was held February 21, in the Presbyterian Church, with Dr. Hugh Black, of Union Theological Seminary, as the speaker. One of the services will be held in All Saints' Episcopal Church, of which the Rev. Mr. Cocke is rector.

Other Lenten Services.

A number of the churches in Washington are exchanging ministers for their Lenten services, and out-of-town preachers are also scheduled for many of the churches. The preacher for the noonday Lenten services at Epiphany Church during the week of February 17 is the Rev. Robert N. Spencer, rector of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Kansas City, Mo The first of the services for the combined congregations of St. John's and Christ Churches, Georgetown, on Wednesdays was held on Ash Wednesday at 8 P. M., with a splendid congregation attending. The Rev. Mr. Zabriskie, of Virginia Theological Seminary, gave the first of a series of lectures on the First Epistle of St. John.

Quiet Day.

A Quiet Day for the clergy of Washington was conducted by Bishop Freeman February 11 at Washington Cathedral.

Cathedral Sunday.

Washington Cathedral calls attention to a custom of about twenty years of observing the Sunday nearest the birthday of George Washington as "Cathedral Sunday". Many parishes throughout the country make special offerings on this day for the building of the Cathedral, and through the cooperation of the clergy and laity, special prayers are offered for the advancement of the Cathedral building as a witness for Christ in the national capital.

Sunday-School Institute.

The program of the February meeting of the Sunday-School Institute of the Diocese of Washington, included speakers and topics as follows: "Stories, When and Why?" by Miss Portia M. Oberly, Kindergarten of the Washington Public Schools, and "The Evangel in the Sunday School," by the Rev. Hulbert A. Woolfall, rector of St. Mark's Parish. The meeting was held in St. John's Parish Hall, on Tuesday, February 19, at 8 P. M., and all Sunday-school teachers and workers were invited to attend. M. M. W.

Lenten Evening Services.

Services are being held every Tuesday evening in Lent, at eight o'clock, at the Church of the Epiphany, under the auspices of The Churchmen's League, The Brotherhood of St. Andrew and The Laymen's Service Association. The general subject of the addresses is "The Supreme Appeal of Jesus Christ". The speakers are as follows: February 19, "To the Individuals". Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop of Washington; February 26, "To the Home", Rt. Rev. Robert E. L. Strider, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of West Virginia; March 5, "To the Nation", Rt. Rev. Warren L. Rogers, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Ohio; March 12, "To the Church", Rt. Rev. Frank Du Moulin, D. D., Philadelphia, Pa.; March 19, "In Perplexity", Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Bishop of Central New York; March 26, "In Sacrifice", Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop

Twenty-Fourth Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The twenty-fourth annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of Harrisburg, held in St. James' Church, Lancaster, on Monday and Tuesday, February 4-5, was the best attended and most successful meeting in the history of the diocese. Mrs. Caleb S. Brinton, of Carlisle, Pa., Diocesan President, presided at the meeting. On Monday afternoon, Mrs. Charles E. Betticher, of Baltimore, gave a lantern slide talk on missions. A Quiet Hour was led by the Rev. Harry D. Viets, rector of Carlisle. In the evening a missionary mass meeting was held, the principal speakers being Bishop Darlington and the Rev. H. W. Foreman, Secretary for Rural Work of the National Council.

Tuesday opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 7:30 A. M., by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Clifford G. Twombly, D. D. After the service, breakfast was served in the parish house. Other speakers were Miss M. A. Ridgley, whose subject was, "Our Work in Liberia"; Mrs. Gammack, who spoke on "Our Rural Problems of the Woman's Auxiliary". Reports were read by the secretaries of the various organizations functioning in the diocese and cooperating with the Woman's Auxiliary, all showing considerable progress having been made during the past year.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Coadjutor

"Quiet Day."

Bishop Murray and Bishop Helfenstein conducted the annual "Quiet Day" services in St. David's Church, Roland Park, on Shrove Tuesday. A luncheon was served after the service.

Mid-Day Lent Services.

Old Saint Paul's Church, Baltimore, started their mid-day Lenten services on Ash Wednesday with an unusually large congregation. Bishop Bennett, of Duluth, conducted a Mission at St. Paul's, and also preached at the noon services, February 13-15.

The Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., is rector of St. Paul's. These services, which will continue throughout Lent as usual, begin promptly at 12:20 P. M. and end promptly at 12:50 P. M.

The preachers for the following weeks will be as follows:

February 18-20, Rt. Rev. E. L. Strider, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of West Virginia; February 21, Rt. Rev. Edward T. Helfenstein, D. D.; February 22, Rev. Charles E. McAllister; February 25-27, Rev. Robert Johnston, D. C. L., D. D., Washington, D. C.; February 28, the rector; March 1, Rev. Hugh Birckhead, D. D.; March 4, Rev. William A. McClenthen, D. D.; March 5-7, Rev. Arthur Lee Kinsolving, Amherst, Mass.; March 8, Rev. Arthur M. Sherman, D. D.; March 11, Rev. Walter O. Kinsolving; March 12-15, Rev. Frederic S. Fleming, D. D., Providence, R. I.; March 18-22, Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, S. T. D., LL. D., L. H. D., Bishop of Central New York; March 25-28, Rev. Shirley C. Hughson, O. H. C., West Park, N. Y.

On Good Friday, March 29, 12 to 3—the rector will preach at the Three Hours' Commemoration of our Lord's Passion.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Bishop.

Results of the N.-W. C.

Thirty-eight parishes and missions have increased their pledges for 1929. The diocese paid its full quota for the last three years and at the last meeting of the Bishop and Council it was decided to pledge our full quota for 1929 though it is six thousand more per year than for the last triennium.

New Brotherhood Formed.

A new Chapter of St. Andrew's Brotherhood was organized in St. Mary's Church, Reading, last month, the Rev. Eugene A. Heim, rector.

St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo.

At the last meeting of the Bishop and Executive Council a resolution was passed petitioning the Bishop to appoint a committee of laymen to raise $15,000 for this most worthy project.

Conference on the Mystical Element in the Christian Faith.

An interesting and well-attended conference under the auspices of the Confraternity of the Mystical Life, was held in the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity on February 11, 1929. Clergy and laity from the diocese as well as from neighboring dioceses attended. Mr. H. Gibbs Chase, the Director-General, presided and read the paper of the Rev. H. Adye Prichard, D. D., on "Mysticism and Intellectualism". Dr. Prichard was delayed in sailing from England because the vessel on which he intended to return was taken from the list of sailings. The rest of the program was as follows:

"Mysticism and Evangelicalism," a paper by Dr. George C. Foley, of the Philadelphia Divinity School.

"Mysticism and the Blessed Sacrament," by the Rev. Frank M. Damrosch, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Newark, N. J.

"Mysticism and Healing," by the Rev. William T. Walsh, rector of St. Luke's Church, New York City.

"Mysticism and the Church," by the Rev. Henry B. Bryan, D. D., rector of Grace Church, Van Vorst, Jersey City, N. J.

"Mysticism and Social Service," by the Rev. Frank M. Crouch, New York City.

"The Winning Power of Prayer," by the Rev. Harrison Rockwell, vicar of All Saints' Church, New York City.

"The Christ Spirit," by the Rev. Herbert Parrish, D. D., rector of Christ Church, New Brunswick, N. J.

TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. C. S. Quinn, D. D., Bishop.

Twins Ordained Ministers.

Unique in the history of our Church was the ordination, January 2, of the Revs. Charles A. and Thomas W. Summers.

Seven years ago, twin brothers who had risen grade by grade in school—always together—dreamed of entering the Episcopalian ministry together.

That dream came true, when Thomas W. Summers and Charles A. Summers were ordained into the priesthood by Bishop Clinton S. Quin at Palmer Chapel, Trinity Church, Houston.

It was when graduating from Cleburne High School, according to the newly ordained priests, that they decided to enter the ministry. That was in 1921. They entered the University of Texas, where they graduated together with bachelor of arts degrees. From there, they went together to the Virginia Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va., where they received doctor of divinity degrees.

"We started in kindergarten together," said the Rev. Thomas W. Summers, "and all our education was along the same lines. During high school days, when it came to the question of choosing a life work, we sought to select something in which we believed we could best serve and it was inconceivable that we shouldn't go into that work together."

The brothers are twenty-five years old—just one year above the minimum for Episcopalian ministers. They were born in Cuero and were members of a family of nine children. Their father, a Presbyterian, is dead. Their mother, Mrs. C. A. Summers, lives in Austin.

At the ordination service the Rev. C. W. Sprouse preached the sermon. The Rev. John Sloan presented to the bishop Thomas W. Summers and the Rev. E. H. Jones presented Charles A. Summers.

For the time being, the brothers will continue their present work as deacons. The Rev. Charles A. Summers is in charge of student work at Autry House and at St. Stephen's Community Church, 1805 West Alabama. The Rev. Thomas W. Summers has been doing church work in Texas City, Dickinson and Park Place.

SPOKANE.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Cross, D. D., Bishop.

Convocation.

Steps were taken to accumulate an episcopate fund, looking toward making a diocese of the Spokane jurisdiction in the near future at the convocation held in February at All Saints' Cathedral, Spokane. Bishop E. M. Cross presided. Bishop F. W. Faber, D. D., of Montana, was the preacher of the convocation, when the Rev. John B. Pennell, of Pasco, Wash., was advanced to the priesthood.

The practice of personal religion was discussed at much length and Bishop Cross emphasized its need.

The Bishop's report indicated that financially the jurisdiction showed improvement. The Sunday-school children have decreased seven hundred during the last five years.

About five hundred attended the annual convocation dinner, which is the largest number ever to have attended. Bishop Faber gave the address.

The new members elected to the Council are: Archdeacon Coffin, the Rev. E. C. Schmeiser, the Rev. A. L. Bramhall and the Rev. A. C. Capp and laymen: W. H. Fornham, W. D. Vincent, G. G. Ewing and W. S. King.

The delegates to the Synod are: the Revs. S. T. Boggess, E. L. Rolls and A. C. Capp and lay: M. J. Chapman, B. G. Ewing and H. S. Collins.

Council of Advice: The Revs. E. R. Allman, S. T. Boggess and Archdeacon Coffin; lay: W. S. Sterling, Fred Phair and John King.

PRAYER.

Marion Doyle.

God, I have worshipped You in many ways;
Have seen You in the miracle of birth,
Have felt Your presence in my common earth
And seen Your face in nature's vast arrays.
And I have known You in the last faint breath,
The folded quiet hands and dreaming brow
Of that strange hour in which each one must bow
Unto the will of Your strong servant, Death.

But this is not enough. I pray to know
You in each trivial, irksome, earthy thing:
Let me be wise enough to see You cling
Beneath the cruel armor of my foe:

Dear God, before I finish my short span
Teach me to see You in my fellowman.

A Bishop's Lent Message.

In this season of Lent we should make a special effort to think seriously, to pray earnestly, and to school ourselves by wise self-discipline, in order that we may be in right relation with God, and may become what He desires us to be.

What is right relation with God? The idea of the family gives us the answer. He is our Father, whose love is declared to us in and through Jesus Christ: "He that hath seen me," said Jesus, "hath seen the Father." He loves each of us, as though there were no one else to love.

Yet none of us must behave as though we were solitary spoilt children. Love to God our Father can never be separated from love toward other members of His family. A selfish religion cannot be a following of Jesus, who is our elder Brother.

The love of each of us should go out in a series of circles, each wider than the other, like the circles when a stone falls into a lake. There is the inner circle of our own home and our intimate friends; there is the circle of our parish; there is the circle of our diocese; of the church at home; of that whole Church throughout the world which is in a special sense God's family. There is the widest circle—all mankind whom God made and whom our Lord died to save. We may rightly "begin at home" (indeed in some of our homes there is a good deal to be put right before they can welcome our Lord to dwell there) but our home circle will be poor and cold if our love never goes out beyond it; and our parish life will be barren and dull if we have no interests beyond the parish. The whole great family, the Church of God, claims our love and loyalty; and loyalty to that family and its Father means a burning desire to spread the knowledge of His love among men, near and far.

Let us see how this thought of the Family to which we belong may help us to be more real in our penitence, more earnest in our prayers, and more faithful in our Communions.

1. If only we can get a real vision of the Father's love, we shall perceive our utter selfishness. For all sin is a refusal to accept His love, the strong, purposeful, tender love revealed in Jesus. His will is love, and our sin is failure to do that will. It is the assertion of our own proud, greedy, lazy, selfish selves in our relation with our Father and with other members of the family. All sin is sheer nasty selfishness. And although men do not like to be told about it, it is nevertheless undeniably true that such evil things as slums, and sweating, and prostitution, and war, are sins which lie at the door of the society of which we all are members. No one of us may be directly responsible, and yet not one of us can have an easy conscience unless we are caring about such things, and doing our uttermost to remove them. Well may we say "the burden of them is intolerable".

And, as we ask for His forgiveness, never let us forget that we have no right to expect Him to forgive us, unless we are ready to forgive other members of the Family. Let all quarrels be got rid of before Easter comes.

2. That is one of the lessons of the Lord's Prayer, which is the prayer of the Family. True prayer does not begin at all with self; it begins with God. Before we speak of our own needs we speak to our Father about His honor, His Kingdom, and His will. And then we join others with ourselves as we ask the Father to provide all His family with the Bread needful for soul and body, and seek His forgiveness and protection.

Let us learn during Lent to be unselfish in our prayers. Let us revise and enlarge our prayers for other people. Above all, let us pray for the progress of that Missionary cause which is dear to our Father's heart. His will is that all should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth. He trusts His Church to cooperate in that will by prayer and gifts and active service.

3. If there is one part of our Christian life where the thought of the Family leaps to the mind, it is where the Sacrament of Fellowship—the Holy Communion.

It is true that each one of us, in that Sacrament, comes into close intimate touch with our Lord. But we are not at all true to His mind if we treat this service merely as a private devotion. We are children gathered together round our Father's table. We are of one family with all who communicate with us in our Parish Church; let us remember this in the church, and outside it. We are in fellowship with all Christian people who receive this sacrament throughout the whole world. We are in real communion with God's children in Paradise.

All who receive Jesus Christ, receive Love—for He is Love. Therefore, "if a man say that he has received the Body and Blood of the Lord and is void of love to other men, he is a liar". God is Love: the Body and Blood of Christ are human nature perfected in love by uttermost sacrifice. If we are in fellowship with God, we are by that very fact in fellowship with one another.—Selected.

The Sir Galahad of Poets.

Sidney Lanier's life is his most beautiful poem. There are few, if any, other distinguished Americans whose lives have been nobler and more admirable than his. He exemplified the ideal of chivalry he defended so warmly in his poem, "The Symphony"; he attained the "large and hearty manhood, compounded of strength and love", which he coveted for his sons.

If one were to seek a fitting epitaph for Lanier, no words could be found that would better epitomize his character and career than the simple yet beautiful epigram found in his own "Tiger Lilies": "Noble and long endurance wins the shining love of God." For his was pre-eminently a life of struggle, not only with the wasting disease of which he was a victim, but also with the gaunt spectre of poverty. A brave and spotless soldier in the Civil War, his nobility of character, like that of Robert E. Lee, shone forth even more brightly against the dull, drab background of the reconstruction era than it had in the midst of the war. His courageous bearing in those dreary days of post-bellum desolation, in which, as he himself once wrote to Bayard Taylor, "pretty much the whole of life has been merely not dying", illustrates strikingly his own assertion that moral fortitude is "more manly" than mere physical bravery.

Nor did Lanier allow the passions aroused by the great internecine struggle, with its unfortunate sequel of reconstruction, to embitter his spirit. He was by no means a vindictive or irreconcilable Confederate. Like Lee again, he was willing to accept the decision of Providence and to remember that he was once again a citizen of the United States. "It is only the small soul," he wrote to his wife in 1875, "that ever cherishes bitterness; for the climate of a large and loving heart is too warm for that frigid plant. Let us lead them (his sons) to love everything in the world, above the world, and under the world adequately: that is the sum and substance of a perfect life." In a Confederate memorial address delivered five years before he had sounded the keynote of reconciliation and resultant harmony: "Today we are here for love and not for hate. Today we are here for harmony and not for discord. Today we are risen immeasurably above all vengeance. Today, standing upon the serene heights of forgiveness, our souls choir together the enchanting music of harmonious Christian civilization."

Like Galahad, Lanier had the strength of ten because his heart was pure. All has been fittingly said of him by his biographer, he was "a true knight-errant, never disheartened by difficulty, never despondent in the face of dangers, always brave, full of resources, confident of ultimate triumph." A visitor pausing before a bust of him is said to have uttered the single word, "Christ-like". For like Milton, Goethe, and Arnold Bennett, Lanier felt that nobility of character is the prerequisite of lofty art. While a military prisoner in the Civil War he was "a spirit of redeeming purity" among the unfortunate inmates of the prison. He revolted against the laxity of morals he found in the lives of certain eminent musicians. To him "the beauty of holiness and the holiness of beauty" were identical. He held that the poet is to tower above the mass of mankind in character as does the tallest corn stalk above its fellows in the field,

Teaching the yeomen selfless chivalry
That moves in gentle curves of courtesy.

In consistent loyalty to the highest ideals of art, he found peace and satisfaction. He experienced, as he put it, "the quiet and yet joyful activity of one who knows exactly what his Great Passion is and what his God desires him to do".

Lanier's beautiful character rested upon a firm foundation of Christian faith. In the midst of his many trials he recognized so many evidences of God's care that he never fell into despair. "It seems as if the good Lord always took care of me," he once remarked. There were, to be sure, seasons in which his childlike faith was subjected to the questionings of doubt, but his soul had built itself

"A nest on the greatness of God and had won
God out of knowledge and good out of infinite pain
And sight out of blindness and purity out of a stain".

He had accepted the blessed invitation of the consoling Christ, and though heavy laden, had found rest for his soul. "I say to myself," he wrote to his fellow poet, Paul Hamilton Hayne, "where are the strong arms in which I, too, might lay me, and repose, and yet be full of the fire of life. And always through the twilight, comes answer from the other world: Master, Master, Master, there is one, one Christ: in His arms we rest." Two of the most beautiful tributes to the Christ in the English language are Lanier's "The Crystal" and "A Ballad of Trees and the Master".—Prof. Gilbert Voigt, in Lutheran.

The Unfailing God.

We grow accustomed to failure. There is never a success but is built upon a dozen failures. There is no man so wise, so strong, so good, but his path is marked by many a failure. Wise men are not wise enough, strong men are not strong enough, good men are not good enough, to avoid failure; and many a store of failure is sad and tragic enough, and sometimes the failure is a failure of love and friendship and truth, and this is the worst of all. When those we trust betray us, when those we love forsake us, when those we have helped revile us, the failure bites deep into the soul. But one thing stands out boldly against this record of human failure. God never fails. His strength knows no weakness, His wisdom never blunders, His goodness holds no flaw. Father and mother may forsake, human love may prove untrue, but there is no possibility of the Eternal Father ever ceasing to love His own.

A LENTEN PRAYER.

"I Am Among You As He That Serveth."

"O Blessed Jesus! when I see Thee bending,
Girt as a servant, at Thy servants' feet,
Love, lowliness and might, in zeal all blending,
To wash their dust away, and make them meet
To share Thy feast, I know not to adore
Whether Thy humbleness or glory more.

"Meek Jesus! to my soul Thy spirit lending,
Teach me to live, like Thee, in lowly love;
With humblest service all Thy saints befriending,
Until I serve before Thy throne above—
Yes! serving e'en my foes, for Thou didst seek
The feet of Judas in Thy service meek.

"O blessed name of Servant! comprehend-
Man's highest honor in his humblest name;
For Thou, God's Christ, that office recommending,
The throne of mighty power didst truly claim.
He who would rise like Thee, like Thee must owe
His glory only to his stooping low.

"Daily my pilgrim feet, as homeward wending
My weary way, are sadly stained with sin;
Daily do Thou, Thy precious grace expending,
Wash me all clean without and clean within,
And make me fit to have a part with Thee
And Thine, at last, in heaven's festivity."

—"A Man of Sorrows."

Fellowship With Christ.

The upward way never grows easy. There is always the cross to carry, the burden to bear. But there is joy in the new views that we obtain as we climb higher and higher. There is a sense of satisfaction that we are counted worthy to enter new fields of service and to have new fellowship with the Saviour in His sufferings. And as we ascend in this upward way, a truer, deeper love for God and for man fills our souls, and the blessing of a nobler, brighter, stronger, happier life settles down upon our spirits.—Selected.

When winter sun on casement shines
I vision once again
My mother at sill-gardening
Behind the window pane.

Mauve heliotrope, geraniums, too,
And fuchias, rose and white
Prim-roses and some violets blue
Made fragrance day and night.

And now I know God made them bloom
Beneath her loving care
To fill her heart with thought as sweet
As incense of a prayer.

American Scripture Gift Mission

What It Is

The Scripture Gift Mission was founded in the year 1888 in London, England, for the purpose of circulating the Scriptures throughout the world.

The American Scripture Gift Mission was started in 1907 to distribute the Scriptures in the United States, Mexico, the West Indies, Central America and parts of South America.

In the United States it ministers primarily to those in the rural sections of the country (more than in the large cities) and includes our native American Indians in the Southwest and the foreign population.

It is interdenominational, non-sectarian and not conducted for profit. It has no agents, but supplies Scriptures at cost or free of charge as far as possible to pastors, teachers, Christian workers and missionaries, and therefore is glad to receive donations from these pastors, teachers, etc., as well as from interested friends for this make possible a more extended circulation.

The Scriptures are printed in over one hundred different languages and are attractively illustrated with pictures of actual life scenes, made by artists sent to the Holy Land especially for this purpose. Imaginary pictures are not used.

What It Has Done

Thousands of Gospels, Testaments and Bibles are circulated annually amongst people, in our own country, many of whom, strange as it may seem, have never own a copy of the Scriptures.

The results of this distribution are apparent in improved living conditions, both moral and spiritual. Entire communities have been changed through the reading of the Scriptures which are able to make one wise unto salvation.

What Are Its Possibilities?

The extension of the work is limited only by the income derived from free-will offerings and the voluntary contributions of those who wish to pay the cost of the Scriptures which they order for distribution.

The rapid increase of our population presents an ever growing need. There are today thousands of homes where the Scriptures are unknown. We cannot but feel that this condition is a menace to the future of our nation, which was originally founded upon a belief in the Bible. Will you not bear this in prayerful interest upon you heart?

CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

Mary Beale Carr.

Our Christ was crucified
That you and I might live,
Still this last plea He made,
"Forgive! Forgive!"

In each dear hand and foot
A nail was driven through.
And yet His voice we hear,
"They know not what they do."

A crown of thorns was placed Upon His loving brow,
And through His side a spear,
"Not as I will, but Thou."

O! Man of Sorrows may
We hold Thy cross on high
And never by misdeeds
Again Thee crucify!

The Quest.

Once there came to the land of the Every-day a messenger from the King. In his hand he carried glasses to help him in the search which he was making. Under his arm he was carrying a scroll. On his face there was a look of deep concern.

How could he ever find the most beautiful thing in all the world? There were so many beautiful things that he had no idea where to begin. Yet this was his commission: "Of all the beautiful things, choose for me the most beautiful."

So the messenger called for heralds and sent them forth to ask of the people of the Every-day their help in choosing for the King.

"Bring to me your most beautiful thing," he said. "Then I will choose from these things what I deem most beautiful."

And one brought a wonderful gem. It was clear as crystal; it sparkled in the light and seemed to beg to be chosen. The rays of the noonday sun shone through the stone and all the people cried with one voice:

"How beautiful! How wonderful! We have never seen the like!"

"Surely," thought the messenger, "I shall never find anything so rare as this. I will take it to the King."

But a voice cried: "Wait, ah, messenger, wait! That which is dead can never be the most beautiful thing. Surely I have here that which far exceeds the stone which you have seen. I beg you look at this."

Then he opened the cover of the great box that he carried.

In a bed of shimmering white there lay a beautiful rose. Its leaves were still wet with the dew of the garden. Its petals were as perfect as perfect could be. Then as the sun shone into the box, the exquisite rose caught also the rays of the sun and slowly the beautiful petals began to unfold.

There was silence in the group of people about the box. What a wonderful thing the man had brought to the messenger! It had beauty, but it had also life.

Yet even as they looked there came another. By his side walked a great dog. His hair was like silk; his eyes were tender as a child's; his face was as knowing as a person's. Quietly his owner brought him forward, saying: "This is to me far more beautiful than the rose. This has beauty and life, but it has also usefulness. It has saved the lives of many."

And he patted the head of the faithful animal.

Then a mother pressed through the crowd and said: "Surely no animal is so beautiful as a child. See! here is my little one. She has beauty and life and usefulness—and she has also the magic beauty of innocence. See her hands, and her little feet, and her golden curls. I am sure there is no more beautiful thing in all the world than my baby."

Then the messenger sighed. What could he do? He just could not find the thing that the King had asked him to find. All were so beautiful. Wishing to be by himself, he walked away. Into a path alone by himself he went.

Then he heard voices, and, brushing aside the branches, he saw a young maiden who played with a little child. Her touch was very tender as she played the childish game. And when they had finished, the messenger held his breath, for the child had thrown a tiny arm about her neck and the yellow curls of the baby were close to the brown ones of the maiden. And the maiden's face was wreathed in a wondrous smile.

"That is beauty," said the messenger. "That is rare beauty. But why is she so beautiful? I must see."

Quickly he unfastened the glasses from their case and turned them to the picture before him. Then, because they were magic glasses used only by the King, he could see why she was beautiful.

In her mind he found clean thoughts; in her life he found kind deeds; in her soul he found a high ideal; in her heart he found a mother-love for little children.

Then the messenger took from his arm the scroll which he carried and with his stylus he wrote these words.

"In all the world I find no more beautiful thing than a maiden who is reaching toward life's highest goal—a noble womanhood—with love to show her the way."

Zeno the Wise.

"Good night, Zeno. Lie down on your mat. The children are all asleep and it's time for good doggies to go to sleep, too."

Zeno wagged his tail and Mr. White patted the dog's head. Then Mr. White climbed the stairs and Zeno lay down on his mat in front of the open fireplace.

It was chilly outside for a cold wind was blowing from the sea, but Zeno felt very comfortable in the living room of the great orphanage, for the fire had not been entirely covered and now and then bright little flames shot up through the ashes. When this happened the dog would open his eyes to watch the flickering light, and then as the flame died down and it became dark he would go to sleep again.

Suddenly there came a loud crack. Zeno sat straight up on his haunches. A bright spark shot out from the fireplace and landed right in the box of shavings and kindling wood that one of the boys had brought in from the carpenter shop. Pretty soon there was a sputtering noise and then a very bright flame, much brighter than the flames Zeno had been watching. The kindling wood was all burning with a very sharp crackling noise, and it was sending out many sparks. One of these sparks landed on some cushions and they began to burn, but instead of sending out bright flames they sent up black smoke. The smoke began to fill the room, and Zeno felt very queer. Something was wrong, he felt very sure of that.

Now, all this time Mr. White, who with Zeno's help, took care of the great Near East Relief orphanage with its thirteen hundred children, was sound asleep, as were all the children. And they slept right on, although the smoke had formed a great dark cloud in the room and the red flames were burning a hole in the floor of the living room.

Then as if in a dream Mr. White felt something cold pressing hard against his cheek. He opened his eyes. There was Zeno standing over him and the cold thing that had pressed against his cheek was Zeno's nose.

In a moment Mr. White smelled the smoke and he hurried out of bed and ran downstairs to put out the fire.

None of the children knew anything about the fire, until the next morning, when Mr. White told them and praised Zeno for being such a wise and faithful dog. The boys cheered and shouted, "Hurrah for Zeno!" while Zeno frisked and barked to show how happy he was that the children had been kept from harm.—Selected.

Little Boy.

Little Boy was playing in the yard. Mother was busy in the kitchen. There was so much to be done. "I'll call Little Boy to help dry the dishes," she said. She went to the window and called, "Come, Little Boy, and help mother." But Little Boy didn't want to stop playing. He didn't want to help.

He came slowly to his mother. His lips were out. He had a frown on his face. His mother looked at him. She saw his pouting lips. She saw the frown on his face. She was sorry. She shook her head and said sadly, "Mother couldn't use a little boy like that. Run back to your play."

Little boy went out where his pet pigeons were. They were cooing. He stopped to pick up one of them. The pigeon looked at him and flew away. Then all the other pigeons followed and Little Boy was left alone. "I wonder why they didn't want me here," he said.

He whistled for his dog. Shep came running. But when he saw Little Boy's frowning face, he ran back. "Doggie don't want to play with me," he said. "Kitty, kitty, kitty," said Little Boy. Kitty listened but she thought Little Boy's voice sounded cross, so she hid under the steps.

Little Boy felt lonesome. He wondered why none of his pets wanted to play with him. "I'll go and stay with my mother," he said. Then he remembered how he had acted about the dishes. He was sorry he had been cross. He would go and help his mother now. He ran as fast as he could. "O Mother, Mother," he said, "I'm sorry. I want to help you. Please, may I?" His face was bright and happy. His voice sounded sweet. Mother smiled and Little Boy smiled back at her. "Yes," she said, "I have left the dishes for us to dry together. Mother knew her little boy would be sorry and come back to help."

After the dishes were all dried and put away, Mother and Little Boy went out under the cool trees. Doggie and kitty heard Little Boy laughing and came running to him. The pigeons listened and then flew down on the shoulders of the happy little boy.—Selected.

TOO MANY DOLLS.

I have a little pussy cat;
I have a doggie, too:
And so many, many dollies
I scarce know what to do.

But—say! a little girl I know
Has not a single one,
I'm going to give her two of them—
Oh! it will be such fun

To see how happy she will be
With these two dolls of mine.
I'll go right now and dress them up
So they will look just fine.

Catching a Bear.

At Johnson's lumber camp in the Maine woods, between Long Pond and Miseree stream, north of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a Frenchman was employed as cook. Behind his table was the usual long horizontal window, which gives the extra amount of light needed for the cook's work. Out of this window the Frenchman—Henri by name—was in the habit of throwing his waste food. One day he discovered that a big bear was coming in the dark evenings to refresh himself on what he found there.

Now, Henri had never had any experience in bear-catching, but he sat down and thought the matter over seriously. The result was that he took a rope and, making a noose in the end of it, set the loop over the bait in such a way that the bear might get entangled in it. The end of the cord he took into camp through a crack in the window where he could hold it if the bear was caught.

That night he watched, and the bear came. Henri wound the rope round his arm so as to have a good grip, and waited breathlessly. Bruin nosed about after his usual food, and all at once found himself entangled. With a tremendous growl he jumped to escape, and the next instant Henri was hauled out of the window, taking the sash with him in the most unceremonious manner. He was glad enough to get the rope clear of his arm, and let the animal go his own way.

Not many days passed before the bear got over his fears and began coming again after the kitchen scraps. Henri cogitated once more how to catch and hold him, and hit upon so fine a plan that it made him laugh at his work to think of it.

He procured a rope much longer than the first one, so long, indeed, that when the noose was set and the rope was brought in through the window crack, it reached nearly the whole length of the camp. This arranged, he told the crew that he expected to receive a visit from the bear that evening.

"When you hear me call," he said, "you must jump for the rope and pull with all your might."

They agreed, and Henri stood at the window and watched. By and by the bear came, and soon he was in the noose.

"Pull!" shouted Henri, and the twenty woodsmen gave the rope such a tug that the big bear at the other was as helpless as a baby. In he came, through the window, much quicker than he had jerked Henri out of it on the previous occasion.

Indeed, he entered so suddenly that he found Henri all unprepared for his visit. The cook slipped and fell, and the bear fell upon him. To make matters worse, the creature carried with him everything within reach of his long legs—the window-sash, the table, the bread-board, the rolling-pin, the bread-pan, and a miscellaneous lot of dishes and cooking utensils.

For a moment there was "confusion worse confounded" in that end of the camp. The ludicrous mixture of scared Frenchman, scared bear and rattling tins threw the men into convulsions of laughter. Then one big fellow, rightly thinking that the cook might get hurt in the melee, seized a handspike and dealt the bear a blow that finished him, and order was restored. Henri set no more bear traps.—Lutheran.

Jimmy Todd and the Gold Star.

Just as the Busy Bee Class was finishing its work and putting away its pencils, something very exciting happened. The superintendent came in and told them that in just four Sundays, on Children's Day, there was to be a prize given to the class that had the most new members, the most members on time, and was the best-behaved during the class hour. The winner was to get a splendid big gold star.

The Busy Bees were like busy bees as they walked home from Sunday School. Just suppose that they, the very smallest class of all, should win that big gold star! Then somebody said something that made them all very sad.

"Jimmy Todd!"

That was the name of a boy who caused a lot of trouble to the class, for Jimmy Todd simply could not keep still. He talked out, right in class, and gave answers that were not right at all, but meant to make the pupils laugh. He scuffed his feet and whispered. How could the Busy Bees be the quietest and best behaved class with Jimmy Todd in it?

"Well," said Harry, "we'll have to put him out."

The others frowned. Nobody liked that idea. It wasn't right to ask a boy not to come to Sunday School. Then Andy Harris had an idea.

"I don't believe Jimmy means to be so noisy," he said. "He has so many brothers and sisters at home that he can't be heard unless he shouts. He can't get used to being quiet on Sundays."

Andy's idea was to teach Jimmy to be quiet. Harry said that he would ask him to come to his house next Saturday night, when he and his sister studied their lesson.

"Then he will know the lesson and won't have to ask so many loud questions," he said.

Andy promised to stop for him early Sunday morning and walk to Sunday School with him. Then Jimmy would have a chance to tell him all the things he needed to be told, and wouldn't have to tell them in Sunday School.

Helping Jimmy got to be a game. They divided up the Sundays, naming one person for each Sunday to keep Jimmy quiet. But what do you think happened? Jimmy was quiet on Sunday, but he brought his brother with him, and they had to take care of him! And the next Sunday he brought two more brothers, and they each brought a friend. That was because he was enjoying the class and wanted the others to enjoy it.

It was fun for the class to take care of all these boys and get up early to talk to them on the way to Sunday School. But then a dreadful thought came. They had been so busy taking care of Jimmy Todd that they had forgotten all about doing the other things to win the gold star!

They felt bad when they thought of that, for it was on the way to class on Children's Day, so that nothing could be done. It was a sorry row of faces that looked up at the superintendent as he started to speak.

"I am glad to give the gold star to the Busy Bees, the smallest class of all, but the hardest working. They have been the best behaved, the quietest and have had more members on time and more new members than any other class."

The boys and girls could hardly believe their ears. Even after the big gold star was shining on the wall behind their class, they were still amazed. Then Andy Harris began to laugh.

"Why, it's all Jimmy," he said. "The new members came with him, and we were all on time because we walked to Sunday School with them.

God's Christmas Gift.

Every little girl and boy knows the joy of hanging up a Christmas stocking. There is no feeling quite so nice as that early-morning feeling, when the stockings are full and knobby! And then, oh, joy, there is the running to show them to father and mother!

Christmas-time has many delights, but the delight of a surprise is the most wonderful of all.

Piccola thought so, too. She was a little French girl. She lived in France, but the great war had left her parents very poor. She hadn't many clothes to wear, and the food she ate was very coarse and plain. Sometimes she hadn't any food at all.

But Piccola was a very happy child. Food and clothes are very pleasant and necessary, but they do not make you happy. It is love inside your heart that makes you happy.

Now, the story I am going to tell happened at Christmas time. Piccola was very excited. She said to herself a hundred times a day: "I am sure that Santa Claus will remember little Piccola." When father and mother heard this they were very sad.

"I am out of work, so I have no gifts for little Piccola," said her father sadly.

"Alas, neither have I!" said mother. And both of them were very troubled. But Piccola was very happy. "Santa Claus will remember little Piccola," she said, with a smile. And although father and mother told Piccola how very poor they were, yet Piccola kept on saying: "Santa Claus will remember me. He will never pass me by."

Father and mother were surprised to see the bright face of their little girl. "Santa Claus remembers all children on Christmas Day," said Piccola.

At last Christmas Eve came. Piccola went to her poor little room, took off her shoes, and put one little shoe on the window-sill for Santa Claus to fill. Little girls did things that way in Pic-cola's country. And the little shoe looked so sweet all by itself on the ledge.

"I know he will never pass me by," said Piccola softly. Then she shut her eyes and was soon fast asleep.

But father and mother felt very sad. They knew that there would be no gifts in the shoe. They were much too poor. But, oh, how they longed to fill that little waiting shoe with the most beautiful present in the world!

Little Piccola slept so peacefully all through the quiet night. And when the early morning light came creeping through the window, Piccola awoke. She rubbed her eyes, then sat up in bed. Ah, yes, now she remembered everything. It was Christmas Day. Last night she had put her shoe out for the good Santa Claus to fill. She rubbed her eyes once again. She was quite awake now.

She slipped out of bed. It was very cold. But Piccola did not notice the cold. She picked up her shoe, and what do you think was there?

It was a most wonderful present. But if you tried to guess all day and night, I am sure you could never do so. For there, tucked away in the shoe, was a tiny bird. It had flown in through the window right into the warm shoe. Poor little shivering bird!

Piccola was delighted. This was indeed a perfect present! She took up the shoe very carefully in her hands so as not to frighten the bird, and hurried into mother's room. Father and mother stared at Piccola when they saw her carrying the shoe.

"What is it?" they asked both together.

"Oh, look, look!" cried Piccola as she held out the shoe.

Father and mother peeped into the shoe, and there they saw a tiny bird.

"Santa Claus left it in the shoe for me," said Piccola.

Father and mother looked at each other. They never said a word. There were full of joy to think that Piccola was so happy.

"It is so cold and hungry," said Piccola. "I shall warm it and feed it," she said.

It was a happy Christmas morning for Piccola. She warmed the tiny thing by the fire, and fed it with crumbs. As the bird felt the heat and ate the food it got better. Piccola was delighted. Fancy such a lovely present coming to her in that little shoe!

When the little bird began to fly about and chirp its thanks, Piccola felt that there was nothing nicer in the whole wide world. Not many little girls would have wakened up that morning to see a bird in their shoe. Piccola was really very lucky.

And the little bird stayed with Piccola. It sang to her and chirped from morning until night.

Happy, little bird! Happy, happy Piccola!—From All-the-Year Stories, by Elsie H. Spriggs.

"Mike."

He was small and black, with a white vest and four white feet. His head and ears were rather long, eyes very bright, and his strong, deep-chested little body was "coupled up like a Cadillac. Built for strength," grown folks said, but his small boy friends knew that he could "run like greased lightning".

Brother had brought him to Billy on his last visit home, and the two little boys were great friends and chums, sharing everything except their beds. Mother drew the line there.

Billy liked to play ball, and so did Mike. He was a splendid "fielder", and more fun than all the boys put together. When they failed to catch a "fly" or "grounder", Mike flew after it, seized it in his mouth and then the real fun began.

First he would lie down with the ball between his front feet, and half close his eyes, just as if he were going to take a nap, but he was watching the boys all the time, and all the muscles in his strong little body were ready for him to spring up and run as soon as the boys came near.

They would form a circle around him and try to close up gradually, so that he could not escape between them. But it was no use. He would let them get almost to him, and then dart away, right between them, and the chase was on.

Around and around, darting in and out among them, he ran with the ball in his mouth, bright eyes dancing and long ears flapping, while the boys, laughing, shouting, scolding, ran after him, until they all fell on the grass, tired, hot, and happy. And then how they petted the panting little mischief-maker, as he came up, and laid the ball on the grass at his proud little master's feet.

"Billy, he sure is some runner," they all agree, as they roll on the grass, resting and cooling off before starting to play another game.

Mike loved the boys and liked to play with them, because they were kind to him and did not treat him badly. When dogs are mean, somebody else has been mean first. When they are good, somebody else has been good first.—Exchange.

Deaths

ROBERT BEVERLEY.

In Memoriam.

ROBERT BEVERLEY, of "Blandfield", was called to life eternal at his ancestral home in the early morning of December 28, 1928.

He was born at "Avenel", Fauquier county, Va., April 26, 1858, the fourth son and tenth child of Robert Beverley and Jane Eliza Carter, his wife; attended private school at home and entered the Virginia Military Institute in the fall of 1873 and graduated with the class of 1876.

In December, 1879, he married Richardetta Earl Carter, daughter of Major R. H. Carter, of "Glen Welby", and Mary Welby de Butts, his wife. He is survived by his wife, three sons and one daughter, R. Carter and W. Welby, of Richmond; R. Bland, of Fauquier, and Fannie Scott, wife of Rev. Herbert S. Osburn, of Tappahannoc (one son (youngest), J. Hill Carter, died in 1915); eight grandchildren and two brothers William and J. Hill Carter Beverley, of Fauquier.

A farmer, keenly alert and interested in all that pertained to the welfare of the farming industry. His advice and counsel was much sought and he was frequently attending meetings and writing articles in the interest of some progressive movement.

His public spirit was also manifested in his untiring efforts in building the first telephone line through his county, improving postal and steamer service and later in the building and maintenance of good roads. It was largely due to him that the "Tidewater Trail" was established as a State road, and his efforts also contributed much to the building of the "Downing Bridge". Helping to establish passenger and bus lines and improving schedules, he was always urging progress. A member of the Board of Directors of the State Farmers' Educational and Cooperation Union, State Fair Association and Rappahannock Valley Inc. He was president of the Bank of Essex and much interested in its phenomenal growth.

Although these and other matters of public welfare commanded his attention, his church always came first. A vestryman of St. Anne's Parish for more than forty years and treasurer for many years, he was ever a loyal and faithful witness for Jesus Christ. At his Bible class and other church services he was always found in place. For years when his parish was without a rector he kept his church open by regularly conducting lay services. In 1886 he first attended the Council of the Diocese of Virginia, and since that time, forty-two years ago, he has sat in thirty-four of these annual gatherings, always taking an active part in their deliberations. As a member of the Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society for fourteen years, he did not miss one of its fifty-six quarterly meetings. He represented his Diocese for twelve years as deputy at the four triennial general conventions held at Detroit, Portland, New Orleans and Washington.

A member of the Board of Trustees of the Diocesan Schools and of the local board of St. Margaret's School, he took an active part in their development and started the Bishop Brown Scholarship Fund. Also member of the Board of Visitors of the Blue Ridge Industrial School.

He organized the Layman's Association, first in the Rappahannock Convention and later throughout the Diocese, and was greatly interested in evangelism. He believed that the laymen of the Church were called to be witnesses for Jesus and by precept and example he sought to lead all with whom he came in contact. To him the family altar was a sacred heritage of his saintly mother, and every morning the family gathered under his leadership to seek Divine strength and guidance. A home in which the Master was ever the welcome guest. A household of joy and happiness, charmed by his loving personality and genial hospitality.

He was in all things genuine.

Modest and unassuming, never seeking fame or preferment, he was, in all circumstances of life, a helper.

To him the Bible was the Word of God—where he diligently sought the bread of life—for which he hungered. In his daily walk and conversation he was guided by its precious truths and to him its promises were real.

With his heart ever filled with burning zeal for his Master's work, he was always staunch and unwavering. Ever courageous and true to his convictions. His sane judgment, keen business sagacity and unimpeachable integrity were qualities he never failed to devote alike to religious and secular duties. His church problems were always his, and for them he spent himself unsparingly. His time, talent and means were ever cheerfully and ungrudgingly given for others in the Master's name.

A father, wise and patient, faithful and devoted husband, a friend who never failed. Ever kind, generous, thoughtful and courteous. Truly as with the apostle Paul, with this disciple of Jesus Christ, "to live is Christ, to die is gain". Threescore years and ten, full of good works and now "in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." Eph. 4:13.

It was a noble end certainly. Men lose their love and trust and hope as they grow old. Here was a man who kept them all fresh to the last. Men cease to have strong convictions, and grow cynical or careless. Here was a man who believed more and not less, as he knew more of God and of himself and of the world. His old age did not come creeping into port, a wreck, with broken masts and rudder gone, but full-sailed still and strong for other voyages in other seas.

We are sure that his was the old age that God loves to see. To such men alone is God's promise to David fulfilled: "With long life will I satisfy Him and show Him my salvation."—Phillips Brooks.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett. D. D., Bishop.

Personal Evangelism.

February 4-8 a personal evangelism campaign was carried on in Lynchburg, under the auspices of the Virginia Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. A. H. Lichty, State Secretary, describes it in the succeeding paragraphs.

"George Irving, of our National Staff, General Secretary Cartlich of the Lynchburg Association, and myself enlisted the cooperation of several Lynchburg pastors in conducting a five days' systematic effort in getting men and boys to accept Christ and unite with the Church of their choice. About one hundred laymen, mostly young men, actively shared in this work.

We met each evening for supper and an exchange of helpful experiences. On only one evening were there less than one hundred present and sometimes there were as many as one hundred and twenty-five. In short, we simply adapted the short financial campaign idea to the work of winning individual men for Christ instead of raising money.

Dr. T. C. Skinner, pastor of the First Baptist Church, presided at all meetings. During the opening meeting he said, "This is the most significant meeting I have attended since I have lived in Lynchburg.'

Some of the noticeable results were:

First: Many decisions to become Christians and unite with the Church.

Second: A new discovery by the workers as to how easily they can help others.

Third: Pastors learned how to use laymen better in enlarging the Church.

Fourth: A new realization of the religious value of Y. M. C. A. leadership.

Personally, I consider the week one of the most fruitful and satisfying I have ever experienced. It is my purpose to help arrange for similar efforts in some of our other Association cities as soon as the way can be found."

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Archdeaconry of Albany.

Regularly twice a year the clergy of the Diocese of Georgia in the Archdeaconry of Albany, the Ven. J. B. Lawrence, D. D., Archdeacon, meet for two days of services, Bible study, book review and for the presentation of special subjects. The semi-annual meeting of the current year was held January 15, 16 and 17, in St. Paul's Church, Albany, the Rev. Harry S. Cobey, rector. Addresses at two of the evening services were delivered by the Rev. John Gaynor Banks, D. S. T., Director of the Society of the Nazarene, and the Rev. Harrison W. Foreman, Secretary for Rural Work of the Department of Christian Social Service of the National Council. During the meeting of the Archdeaconery, the Executive Board of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary held its semi-annual meeting. The following program was carried out: Opening service, Tuesday evening, January 15, sermon by Dr. Banks; Wednesday morning visit to the colored parochial school of St. John's Mission, followed by service of the Holy Communion at ten o'clock, the board of the Woman's Auxiliary meeting after this service, the clergy meeting for book review and later a business session; at the service of evening prayer, sermon by Mr. Foreman. The following morning visit to the parochial school of St. John's, followed by Litany, Bible study and business session, and in the afternoon a young people's hour, conducted by Mrs. C. C. J. Carpenter and the Rev. Lloyd W. Clark; later visit to the county jail. At the service of evening prayer, sermon by the Ven. C. C. J. Carpenter, Archdeacon of Georgia.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. Fiske, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. H. Coley, D. D., Suffragan.

Hearing and Non-Hearing Brethren.

There was a service unique in the annals of Central New York in Trinity Church, Syracuse, on January 13. The eleven o'clock service of Morning Prayer was made a combined service in which the rector, the Rev. Hubert S. Wood read the office in the usual way, while the Rev. Herbert C. Merrill, missioner to the Deaf in the Dioceses of Albany, Central New York, and Western New York, rendered it simultaneously in the sign language. Similarly, the sermon, which was by Mr. Merrill, was read in signs by him and orally by Mr. Wood. The pre-sermon hymn, besides being played on the organ and sung by the choir, was sung in signs by Mrs. Robert E. Conley, a deaf young woman, clad in the usual choir vestments. The mixed congregation numbered about four hundred, the hearing members learning something about the deaf and what the Church is doing for their spiritual welfare, and the deaf had opportunity to become better acquainted with their hearing brethren.

Personal Notes

The Very Rev. Howard Chandler Robbins, D. D., Dean of the Cathedral of St. John The Divine, who for six years (1911-1917) was rector of the Church of the Incarnation, has been elected by the rector, wardens and vestrymen to a position on the staff of that parish, and has accepted to take effect the thirty-first day of March next. Everybody in his old parish is looking forward to Dean Robbins' return home with grateful hearts.

The Rev. Charles C. J. Carpenter, rector of Grace Church, Waycross, Ga., has accepted a call to be rector of St. John's Church, Savannah, Ga.; change to be effective after April 1. His new address will be St. John's Church, Bull and Charlton Streets, Savannah.

The Rev. Henry C. B. Thomas, formerly rector of Sherwood Parish, Cockeysville, has received and accepted the appointment at Chaplain of Donaldson School, Ilchester, Md. He assumed his new duties on February 10, last.

The Rev. J. Manly Cobb, of Blacksburg, Va., has accepted the call to become rector of Trinity Church, Takoma Park, D. C., and will assume his new duties March 16.

The Rev. Anthony R. Parshley has resigned as rector of St. Paul's Church, Lancaster, N. H., and after April 1 will be rector of St. Michael's Church, Bristol, R. I.

JUST ask one of the telephone operators who serves you how she manages to maintain such unfailing courtesy at a big switchboard.

"It wasn't easy at first," she'll admit. "I found that a sedentary job indoors all day was almost too much for me. I realized that if I was going to make good on the job—and I loved it!—I'd have to keep myself in the very pink of condition.

"I've done it with Nujol—nothing else. It's kept me from having headaches and colds and that awful let-down feeling. Kept my nerves from getting jangled and fatigued, too.

"My doctor tells me that Nujol isn't a medicine. It's simply a pure natural substance. It keeps your system functioning as nature meant it to, even under abnormal conditions. It not only prevents an excess of body poisons (we all have them) from forming, but aids in their removal."

Nujol can't possibly hurt you or upset you. Get a bottle today. Perfected by the famous Nujol Laboratories, 26 Broadway, New York. It's sold at all drugstores, in sealed packages only.

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 2, 1929. No. 9.

Saviour! when in dust to Thee
Low we bow the adoring knee,
When, repentant, to the skies
Scarce we lift our weeping eyes,
Oh! by all Thy pains and woe
Suffered once for man below:
Bending from Thy throne on high,
Hear our solemn litany!

By Thy helpless infant years,
By Thy life of wants and tears,
By Thy days of sore distress
In the savage wilderness,
By the dread permitted hour
Of the mighty tempter's power:
Turn, oh turn a favoring eye,
Hear our solemn litany!

By the sacred grief that wept
O'er the grave where Lazarus slept;
By the boding tears that flowed
Over Salem's loved abode;
By the anguished sigh that told
Treachery lurked within Thy fold;
From Thy seat above the sky,
Hear our solemn litany!

By the burden Thou didst bear,
By Thine agony of prayer.
By the cross, the nail, the thorn,
Piercing spear, and torturing scorn;
By the gloom that veiled the skies
O'er the dreadful sacrifice;
Listen to our humble cry,
Hear our solemn litany!

By Thy deep expiring groan;
By the sealed sepulchral stone;
By the vault, whose dark abode
Held in vain the rising God:
Oh! from earth to heaven restored,
Mighty, re-ascended Lord,
Listen, listen to the cry
Of our solemn litany!

PIEDMONT PARISH, MARSHALL, VA.

Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Rector.

A STATEMENT.

About two years ago we began making special appeal for funds with which to purchaes a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00, and we wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of edbt. Who will help?

The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, endorses th's appeal.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $..... to be paid in cash or istalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"No prayer is ever lost."

Unexpressed love to God will die.

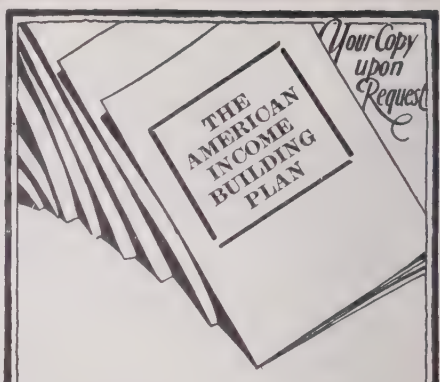
"Where another shares the load,
Two draw nearer God."

We shall never really help people by merely trying to interest them.—Rev Wm. Porkess, D. D.

The true patriot rejoices when his country fulfils its office for other nations, and not when it brings them under its yoke.—Bishop Westcott.

To magnify difficulties may discourage us from attempting the one thing that God wants us to do, and that we can do. When we dare difficulties they disappear. —Selected.

The great men of the world don't talk about the importance of their work; they just do whatever comes to hand; it's only second-rate men who say that their talents haven't full scope.—A. C. Benson.



"In simple trust like theirs who heard
Beside the Syrian sea
The gracious calling of the Lord,
Let us, like them without a word Rise up and follow Thee."
—Whittier.

The river Nile runs through Egypt twelve months of the year, but the river does not bless Egypt until it overflows its banks. And so, the Spirit of God in our hearts; it does not bless and do the world around him any good until it overflows the heart.—Ex.

The order of thought, then, is as follows. We praise some qualities because we judge that they make for fulness of life; they are such, to borrow a thought from Kant, as we can "will to be a universal law". We judge others to be evil because "the end of these things is death". Then we find in God a complete fulness of the good qualities and a complete absence of the evil ones. And God's will is our law because we believe His nature is our pattern.

Every public speaker is dependent upon his hearers for the effectiveness of his message. One good listener in an audience can assure a speaker's success. One indifferent or unfriendly listener can weaken the force of the best address or sermon ever delivered, and we see may see to it that that one is never ourselves. Of course, it is the speaker's obligation to win good listening; but it is just as much the hearer's obligation to give it attention. Team work here means what it does everywhere—that one and one make more than two.

Many nominal Christians are worshipping an unknown God. The trouble is they seek to know God through philosophy, science, law, or nature. They cannot find Him, and declare Him unknowable. People are much at sea, life confuses them. Here is found the necessity for Christ; He in human form, in human, voice, and human life had declared God, and none comes unto the Father but by Him. In Christ is light, revelation, and life.—Bishop Shayler.

TIDEWATER TALES

A book into which is gathered the folklore, traditions and history of Tidewater Virginia. Written in a delightful informal style by Prof. William C. Garnett.

The President of a College in South Carolina writes: "I have never read a work of this kind the style of which I have found more attractive, simple and yet elegant, interesting but never monotonous."

A prominent representative of a Publishing Co. writes: "This book will be read by our children and children's children. I could read 'A Fox Hunt 'Fo de War' every week."

A prominent attorney in Washington writes: " . . the charming description of the old homes, the history and traditions, and the true-to-ilfe stories in local color, combined to delight me."

A professor in one of the Virginia Universities writes: "You have put posterity in your debt by presenting so skilfully to them characters that have passed to the beyond."

LENTEN LESSONS FROM THE CENSUS

Progress of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, in membership and in proportion of membership to total population of the country, is shown by obtainable figures. Study of these figures should cause very serious thought, especially among the laity, and some earnest Lenten resolutions.

The General Convention of 1892, thirty-seven years ago, at Baltimore, received reports from a committee, evidently exceptionally careful and diligent, on the growth of the Church in this country. Taking this report, evidently prepared from search of the records, until the government report on religious bodies for 1916, with the government estimates of population in that year—and experience has demonstrated that government estimates usually are wonderfully accurate—we get membership of our Church, in proportion to population of the country thus—

1830, 1 member to 416 population.
1840, 1 member to 308 population.
1850, 1 member to 292 population.
1860, 1 member to 214 population.
1870, 1 member to 175 population.
1880, 1 member to 151 population.
1890, 1 member to 123 population.
1916, 1 member to 92 population.

The last of these figures necessarily is approximate, based on estimate of the total population for 1916, six years after one decennial census and four years before another, according to the normal rate of increase as shown by preceding and succeeding official returns.

The 1916 tabulation is the last that can be taken fairly as basis for study and comparison, the Church authorities reporting then, as had been the rule, none but recognized and regular communicants as "members". In 1926 the method was changed, probably under government instructions, and all baptized persons were reported as "members" of the Church, which always has been the custom of the Roman Catholics. This change made an apparently abnormal increase of membership in our Church almost of 800,000, from 1,092,821 in 1916 to 1,859,086 in 1926, nearly 80 per cent, in the ten years from 1916 to 1926. In 1892, when the count was limited to actual communicants, the membership was reported at 532,054 by and to the Church authorities, the government not then taking any census of "religious bodies". In 1906 the number of communicants was reported, to the Church, at 886,942, approximately one communicant of the Church to each 100 of population. The Church and census figures for 1916 show gain of a little more than 23 per cent in those ten years.

These cold figures show that while the Church continues to gain, both in total membership and in membership in proportion to population, the gain has been slowed.

It will be noted by the observant that the strongest gain, in proportion of Church membership to population, of any decade of the ninety-six years included in these records was from 1830 to 1840. Railroads and steamboats were opening up new country, increasing wealth and extending enterprise enormously—"flush" and wild times in some sections—but the spirit of the sturdy, valiantly self-sacrificing, indomitable old apostles and pioneers who had rescued the Church from beneath a smothering avalanche of hostile prejudice was yet living and inspiring and stimulating the laity to work shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart, soul to soul, with the clergy. Coarse materialism, intellectual effeminacy and diletantism had not yet developed from the enervating influences of increasing wealth, social ambitions and craving for cheap publicity. There was no invitation nor place nor opportunity for idlers, weaklings, cranks, clowns or mere job seekers. Conditions called for real men, clergy and laity, and the men were there and answered the call. So the Church grew from one in 416 to one in 308, in those ten eventful years.

We have the men yet. Most of our pulpits are occupied by men with the crusader spirit, ready to lead a revival and charge onward if the men and women in the pews—and too many of them are too often out of the pews in which they should be—will help, faithfully and zealously. This Lent is a good time for beginning. The harvest is very ripe and ready and in danger of fearful injury from many eager foes if neglected.

History repeats itself in our Church. As wealth has increased and security has appeared more assured, zeal and striving have relaxed, parasites and camp followers and treasons have crept in, the vain and the strutting and frivolous followers of fantasies and heresies have obtruded and displayed themselves.

There was diminished growth in the second of the two last periods in which the count was confined to communicants. In the sixteen years from 1890 to 1906 the increase averaged more than 22,000 a year. In the ten years from 1906 to 1916 the average yearly increase was not quite 20,600.

The membership of all religious organizations in the United States, including Jewish congregations and Mormons, increased in the ten years, 1916 to 1926, nominally, from 42,926,000, using round numbers, to 55,624,000, an apparent gain of 12,698,000. Aside from the partly fictitious gain of the Protestant Episcopal Church, caused by the change of meaning for "membership", much of the gain of 730,000 shown for the Jews was caused by a somewhat similar change with them. In 1916 they reported none but pew holders or regular attendants at synagogues, but in 1926 they reported all persons recognized as of the Jewish faith. The Roman Catholics gained 2,884,000 and reported for 1926 total membership of 18,605,000, between a sixth and a seventh of the total population. Excluding the Jewish congregations, 4,087,000, the total membership of churches in the country is 50,137,000, of which the Roman Catholics have rather more than one third, the remaining two thirds divided among the 211 Protestant "religious bodies" reported in the last census. The Roman Catholics gained something more than 18 per cent in the ten years, 1916-1926. All Protestants gained 9,184,000, or 40 per cent, including, however, the abnormal gain credited to the Episcopalians.

The last decade for which actual figures of communicants in the Episcopal Church are available is that from 1906 to 1916. Gains in this decade in some States, given in round figures, and avoiding the confusion of fractions, as shown by the census, may be suggestive:

In Virginia, communicants, from 28,000 to 33,000, not quite 18 per cent in ten years; District of Columbia, 13,700 to 18,300, 34 per cent; North Carolina, 13,900 to 18,500, 33 per cent; South Carolina, 8,500 to 11,000, 29 per cent; Georgia, 9,800 to 11,000, 12 per cent; Alabama, 9,000 to 10,000, 11 per cent increase in ten years; Mississippi, 5,700 to 6,000, about one-half of one per cent gain in ten years; Arkansas, 4,300 to 4,400, practically no gain in the ten years; Louisiana, 9,000 to 11,600, 29 per cent; Tennessee, 7,800 to 10,000, 28 per cent; Texas, 14,000 to 17,000, 21 per cent; Maryland, 35,000 to 38,000, less than one per cent; West Virginia, 5,200 to 6,800, 31 per cent; Florida, 8,600 to 10,400, 18 per cent; Oklahoma, 2,000 to 3,500, 75 per cent; Massachusetts, 51,000 to 75,000, 47 per cent; New York, 193,900 to 227,000, 17 per cent.

Other figures, some encouraging, others shameful, will be presented especially for consideration of the laity before the Lenten season goes by. They make a trumpet call, a solemn warning, an urgent summons, to service, to the laity of the Church. Most of our clergy are earnest, self-sacrificing, devoted men; but to the most intensely ardent, faithful clergyman a cold, indifferent, congregation is chilling. Each nominal Episcopalian neglectful of his religious duties or performing them perfunctorily—with apparent feeling that he is condescending to do a favor to the Almighty by attending services regularly, or when there is no special appeal to his indolence or his inclination, and by dropping in the contribution plate a careless gift or one grudgingly and carefully assigned—is a clog on the rector's feet, a repression of his fervor, a hindrance to his work.

Let us consider the figures and do serious thinking this Lent on whether we are helping or hindering the advancement of the Church, of the cause for which the Saviour of mankind died. The General Convention of the Church pledged it, and each member, to special evangelistic work this year. Responsibility for making that pledge good is on every Episcopalian. It is for each of us to decide whether we shall do our respective parts honestly and faithfully, cooperate with our rectors loyally and help give them new inspiration and hope; or whether we shall drone along, leaving other Christians to do our work while our Church limps weakly at the rear of religious progress, inviting derision and incurring inevitable decay.

THIRD SUNDAY IN LENT

Berkeley Minor

COLLECT.

We beseech Thee, Almighty God, look upon the hearty desires of Thy humble servants, and stretch forth the right hand of Thy majesty to be our defense against all our enemies, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

IN our Church Catechism we learn that the devil and all his works and agents are the great enemies against whom there is no defense save in God's protection which we invoke so earnestly in this collect, which we cannot effectually use, unless we, as His humble servants, have a hearty desire for such defense. In another part of our Prayer Book (the Litany) we find earnest petitions for defense against these spiritual enemies. Thus the Church teaches us, where our chief dangers lie; how Satan aims his fiery darts at the soul rather than the body; wiser now than when he sought by bodily suffering to seduce Job from his allegiance to God. A hymn in the old P. B. of my youth teaches the same:

"What arrows pierce so deep as sin?
What venom gives such pain within?
Thou great Physician of the soul,
Rebuke my pangs and make me whole."

And bodily ills are by no means always our enemies; but often are blessings in disguise. Sickness, and even death, may be kind friends, as the same hymn says:

"Oh! if I trust Thy sovereign skill,
And bow submissive to Thy will.
Sickness and death shall both agree,
To bring me, Lord, at last to Thee."

THE Epistle is Ephesians 5:14: "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children," is a striking simile. "Imitators of God" is the R. V. and more exact than "the followers" of God in the A. V. We are to follow and imitate God, as children imitate their parents; and they are wonderful imitators. We parents cannot be too careful about the example we set to our children. A story is told of General Lee, that he noticed how one of his boys, when he was walking in the snow, followed him closely, taking quite long strides, that he might place his little feet in the tracks made by his father's boots. "It was a lesson to him (he said) how careful his walk through life should be, if his conduct was to be so carefully imitated by his children." So we, children of God, have God manifest in the flesh to imitate, just, as dear children, we are led by a certain loving instinct to imitate our earthly parents.

St. Paul in the Epistles goes on to say: "And walk in love, even as Christ also loved you and gave Himself up for us for an odor of a sweet smell" (R. V.) The self-sacrificing life and death of Christ for all mankind, both friends and enemies, is so lofty an ideal that at times we are apt to despair, and to slacken our efforts to be imitators of Him; but let us not be discouraged. There are many promises in the Bible of ample assistance in our efforts to be "imitators of God as dear children". A very notable one is in 1 Cor., chap. 10. After enumerating a number of the temptations of God's people in the wilderness, whereby many of them had been "overthrown", because they lusted after evil things, Paul warns the Christians at Corinth, saying (v. 12): "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall"; but, as if he feared they would be too much discouraged by so many examples of failures under temptation, he says (v. 13): "There hath no temptation taken you, but such as man can bear; but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make also the way of escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (R. V.) "God the Holy Ghost who sanctifieth us and all the people of God," may be relied upon to be "a refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble (Ps. 46:1). And "Do not take trouble on trust," as an old proverb says. Divine grace is only promised, as we need it, just like our bread (for the body), which our Lord bade us pray for, "day by day".

THE Gospel is St. Luke 11:14-23. This is one of the saddest scenes in the life of Jesus, when His enemies charged Him with being in league with the devil, the great foe of mankind. Beelzebub was one of the chief gods of their heathen neighbors, the Phoenicians, and the Jews in derision had given his name to the chief of evil spirits, whom we commonly call Satan.

The charge against Jesus was not only false, but absurd, as He shows His enemies in a perfectly simple and logical way; so simple as to have become a proverb: "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation, and a house divided against a house falleth. If Satan also be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand? Because ye say that I cast out devils by Beelzebub." They can make no reply; but blinded by prejudice and passion, are unconvinced. "A man convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still."

One precept of this Gospel is that it is impossible for one of Adam's lost race to be neutral in the great conflict between good and evil. We must be on the side of the Great Captain of our Salvation, or against Him, under Satan's banner. Jesus says here: "He that is not with me is against me; he that gathereth not with me, scattereth." He had said in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:24): "No man can serve two masters. . . . Ye cannot serve God and Mammon."

Here He says just as plainly that there is no middle ground. Satan is very willing for men to try to take such a stand; for thereby he has many unconscious adherents. This teaching rings out clear in Joshua's last charge to Israel at Shechem, just before his death: "Choose you this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served, that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell; but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord" (Josh. 24:15).

CHIEF JUSTICE JOHN MARSHALL

An Humble Christian and Soldier of the Cross: Vestryman of Monumental Protestant Episcopal Church, Richmond, Va.

IT is not long since a gentleman was traveling in one of the counties of Virginia, and about the close of the day stopped at a public house to obtain refreshment, and spend the night. He had been there but a short time, before an old man alighted from his gig, with the apparent intention of becoming his fellow-guest at the same house. As the old man drove up, he observed that both the shafts of his gig were broken, and that they were held together by withes formed from the bark of a hickory sapling. Our traveller observed further that he was plainly clad, that his knee buckles were loosened, and that something like negligence pervaded his dress. Conceiving him to be one of the honest yeomanry of our land, the courtesies of strangers passed between them, and they entered the tavern. It was about the same time that an addition of three or four young gentlemen was made to their number—most, if not all of them, of the legal profession. As soon as they became conveniently accommodated, the conversation was turned by the latter upon an eloquent harangue which had that day been displayed at the bar. It was replied by the other, that he had witnessed, the same day, a degree of eloquence no doubt equal, but that it was from the pulpit. Something like a sarcastic rejoinder was made as to the eloquence of the pulpit; and a warm and able altercation ensued, in which the merits of the Christian religion became the subject of discussion. From six o'clock until eleven, the young champions wielded the sword of argument, adducing with ingenuity and ability, everything that could be said pro and con. During this protracted period, the old gentleman listened with all the meekness and modesty of a child. . . . Our traveler remained a spectator, and took no part in what was said. At last one of the young men, remarking that it was impossible to combat with long and established prejudices, wheeled around, and with some familiarity exclaimed, 'Well, my old gentleman, what think you of these things'? If, said the traveller, a streak of vivid lightning had at that moment crossed the room, their amazement could not have been greater than it was with what followed. The most eloquent and unanswerable appeal was made for nearly an hour, by the old gentleman, that he had ever heard or read. So perfect was his recollection, that every argument urged against the Christian religion was met in the order in which it was advanced. Hume's sophistry on the subject of miracles was, if possible, more perfectly answered than it had already been done by Campbell: and in the whole lecture there was so much simplicity and energy, pathos and sublimity, that not another word was uttered. An attempt to describe it would be an attempt to paint the sunbeams.

"It was now a matter of curiosity and inquiry who the old gentleman was. The traveller concluded it was the preacher from whom the pulpit eloquence was heard—but no, it was the Chief Justice of the United States.

"Says Bishop Meade: 'Justice Marshall had no hope of the revival of the Church in Virginia, though contributing liberally to the efforts made for it. He lived to see himself mistaken, and to unite with his children and grandchildren in the services of our resuscitated Church in the very place of his nativity and amid the scenes of his early life. In my frequent visits to Coolspring and Oakhill, I often met with him, as I had done at my father's house, and other places in Frederick, in more boyish days. Though not a communicant, he was the sincere friend to religion and the Episcopal Church. I can never forget how he would prostrate his tall form before the rude low benches without backs, at Coolspring meeting house, in the midst of his children and grandchildren and his old neighbors. In Richmond he always set an example, to the gentlemen, of the same conformity, though many of them did not follow it.' Bishop Meade then gives an extract from a letter of the Rev. Dr. Norwood, which, the Bishop says, and all Virginians know, 'may be entirely relied on': 'I have read some remarks of yours in regard to Chief Justice Marshall, which have suggested to me to communicate to you the following facts, which may be useful should you again publish anything in relation to his religious opinions. I often visited Mrs. General Harvey during her last illness. From her I received this statement. She was much with her father during the last months of his life, and told me that the reason why he never communed was, that he was a Unitarian in opinion, though he never joined their society. He told her that he believed in the truth of the Christian revelation, but not in the divinity of Christ; therefore he could not commune in the Episcopal Church. But during the last months of his life he read "Keith on Prophecy', where our Saviour's divinity is incidentally treated, and was convinced by his work, and the fuller investigation to which it led, of the supreme divinity of the Saviour. He determined to apply for admission to the communion of our Church—objected to commune in private, because he thought it his duty to make a public confession of the Saviour—and, while waiting for improved health to enable him to go to the church for that purpose, he grew worse and died, without communing. Mrs. Harvey was a lady of the strictest probity, the most humble piety, and of a clear discriminating mind; and her statement, the substance of which I give you accurately (having reduced it to writing) may be entirely relied on.

" 'I remember to have heard Bishop Moore repeatedly express his surprise (when speaking of Judge Marshall) that, though he was so punctual in his attendance at church, and reproved Mr. ———, and Mr. ———, and Mr. ———, when they were absent, and knelt during the prayers and responded fervently, yet he never communed. The reason was that which he gave to his daughter, Mrs. Harvey. She said he died an humble, penitent believer in Christ, according to the orthodox creed of the Church.

" 'Another fact, illustrating the lasting influence of maternal instruction, was mentioned by Mrs. Harvey. Her father told her that he never went to bed without concluding his prayer with those which his mother taught him when a child—viz.: the Lord's Prayer, and the prayer beginning 'Now I lay me down to sleep'.

"But what could be more touching than the unconscious testimony of the Chief Justice himself, to his own exalted character, as shown in the affecting tribute to his wife, written by himself December 25, 1832—'This day of joy and festivity to the whole Christian world is, to my sad heart the anniversary of the keenest affliction which humanity can sustain. While all around is gladness, my mind dwells on the silent tomb, and cherishes the remembrance of the beloved object which it contains.

" 'On the twenty-fifth of December, 1831, it was the will of heaven to take to itself the companion who had sweetened the choicest part of my life, had rendered toil a pleasure, had partaken of all my feelings, and was enthroned in the inmost recesses of my heart. Never can I cease to feel the loss and deplore it. Grief for her is too sacred ever to be profaned on this day, which shall be, during my existence, marked by a recollection of her virtues.

" 'On the third of January, 1783, I was united by the holiest bonds to the woman I adored. From the moment of our union to that of our separation, I never ceased to thank heaven for this its best gift.. Not a moment passed in which I did not consider her as a blessing from which the chief happiness of my life was derived. This never-dying sentiment, originating in love, was cherished by a long and close observation of as amiable and estimable qualities as ever adorned the female bosom. To a person which in youth was very attractive, to manners uncommonly pleasing, she added a fine understanding, and the sweetest temper which can accompany a just and modest sense of what was due to herself. She was educated with a profound reverence for religion, which she preserved to her last moments. This sentiment, among her earliest and deepest impressions, gave a coloring to her whole life. Hers was the religion taught by the Saviour of man. She was a firm believer in the faith inculcated by the Church (Episcopal) in which she was bred. I have lost her, and with her have lost the solace of my life! Yet she remains still the companion of my retired hours, still occupies my inmost bosom.'

"Chief Justice Marshall died in the City of Philadelphia, on the sixth day of July, 1835; and lies buried in the old Shockoe grave-yard at Richmond. The modest epitaph (with blanks filled) directed by himself to be inscribed upon the plain slab which shelters his grave, is as follows:

" 'John Marshall, son of Thomas and Mary Marshall, was born on the twenty-fourth day of September, 1755; intermarried with Mary Willis Ambler the third of January, 1783; departed this life the —— day of ————, 18—'; to which simple story, this grateful generation might add (from the epitaph of the 'Father of English Equity'):

" 'In whom all the virtues that make a great and good man
Were very conspicuous, without the blemish of any vice.' "

CALLING EVOLUTIONISM'S BLUFF

Rev. J. W. Morris, D. D.

IT demands unusual courage for a scientist, who values his standing with the dominant School of Scientific theorists, to call in question the orthodox dogma of evolution, the rejection of which is supposed to mean the denial of truth itself and of plain facts of science.

Such a bold man has appeared in the person of Dr. Austin H. Clark, eminent biologist of the Smithsonian Institute. He has exposed himself to the anathemas of those who hold the faith of Evolution, by daring to challenge the boasted proofs of transformation of species and of the gradual development through billions of years of all creatures from primordial germs. He especially has the audacity to deny one especial tenet of the creed of fundamentalist evolutionism, viz.: the origin and development, through natural forces, of rational and self-conscious human beings from animal and ape-like forms. According to him there is no evidence at all to show that man, through the savage method of bloody tooth and claw, had his origin in the brute. There are no such things as "missing links". Scientists have never been able to fill the gaps between different groups of animals. Man appeared suddenly, unannounced by any transient abnormal forms, and substantially the same at his appearing as he is today. All the laborious skeletal reconstructions of ape-men are mere guesses with no scientific data to go upon.

Dr. Clark seems to hold essentially the old truth that species are fixed, while within them variations and developments are multiform. If we are to have a world capable of genuine classification, this would seem to be indubitable. A world in which all plant and creaturely life was in continual flux, would be a chaos. And so Dr. Clark is reported as saying: "So far as concerns the major groups of animals, the creationists seem to have the better argument. There is not the slightest evidence that any one of the major groups arose from any other. Each is a special animal complex related more or less closely to all the rest, and appearing, therefore, as special and distinct creation."

We seem to be getting back to the scientific statements at Genesis 1:11, 12 and 24, 25. Moses states that plants and animals were not made through bewildering fluctuations; but that each was created after its kind. From the beginning, he tells us that the kinds or species of creatures have existed.

To the orthodox evolutionist this is a denial of the faith —a return to the superstition of creationism. By his creed, given plenty of time and endless variation, Evolution can by natural laws make anything. But it must be acknowledged that no mere force, however prolonged, can create anything. Creation and Evolution are contradictory terms. Evolution means the rolling out of what already exists: Creation is the bringing into being of what did not exist.

It is the confusion of the technical term evolution with all sorts of development, that has given this naturalistic philosophy its commanding position in the scientific world. To confound the growth of a plant from a seed, or the development of the steam engine from the tea-kettle, with what scientists really mean by evolution is to obscure truth. By accrediting to a grandiose but unproven theory vast numbers of undoubted facts that in no way belong to it, a naturalistic philosophy has swept, like a sorocco, over our colleges and universities, withering and parching all spiritual values.

Dr. Clark's highly technical treatise appeared in the Quarterly Review of Biology edited by Dr. Raymond Pearl, of Johns Hopkins University. His views would doubtless be ignored, if they came from some Bryanite preacher, blinded as is thought by dogmatic bigotry, or from some Tennessee legislator supposedly opposed to truth; but coming from a biologist of accredited position and unquestioned learning, it cannot well be relegated to the limbo of obscurantism and scientific ignorance.

The question necessarily arises why a discredited theory, known to be the root of widespread infidelity, should be insisted upon in our state-paid schools as the last word and infallible truth of science?

Why should it be thought just and right to prohibit the Holy Scriptures in our schools while freely admitting dogmatic evolution? Why may the state teach our youth the faith and the creed of evolutionism, but must not by any means teach them the principles of Christianity? Should a materialistic philosophy he favored to the detriment of the spiritual teachings of Christianity?

Our enlightened educationalists have brought us to a strange pass. It is this: The Christian religion may not be taught in our schools, else sectarianism will be fostered: but the dogma of Evolution must be taught, else the truth will be prejudiced. It seems to be thought more important for our youth to learn the materialistic cult of evolutionism, than the holy truths of Christianity. It is abominable obscurantism, apparently, to exclude from our state-paid institutions the irreligious tenets of evolutionism; while it is the finest enlightenment to debar from them the Book upon which our civilization and morals are based.

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

By W. W. Rugh

Founder and Associate Dean of the Bible Institute of Pennsylvania, 1418 North Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: These simple studies in God's Word are intended for home and class use by those who wish to know our blessed Lord and to make Him known.

II CHRONICLES.

THY way, O God, is in the Sanctuary" (Ps. 77:13). This is a key verse to help to understand these books of Chronicles.

Subject.

In this book, we are told of God's dealings in grace and righteousness with Israel from the building of the Temple by Solomon until it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar.

1. Chs. 1-8. Building, dedication, and glory of the Lord's House and of Solomon's reign.

2. Chs. 10-16. Division of the kingdom and departure from the Lord, but His strength revealed to those whose hearts were perfect toward Him (ch. 16:9).

3. Chs. 17-20. Affinity of Jehosaphat with Israel's king, and God's grace in separating and giving victory over Judah's enemies.

4. Chs. 21-24. The lamp in David's house sustained by the lamp in the Lord's House, even though the kings of Judah were wicked (chs. 21:7; 22:11, 12).

5. Chs. 25-28. The throne of David judged by the One enthroned between the Cherubim (chs. 25:15; 26:20; 28: 24, 25).

6. Chs. 29-36. Special blessing upon the house of Judah because Hezekiah and Josiah walked according to the law of God's House. But Judah's apostasy ended in the destruction of the Temple and city of Jerusalem by the Babylonians.

Purpose.

To reveal typically God's thought for Israel in the future, and to teach us the causes of failure to live in the enjoyment of the conscious presence of the Lord, this book was written for us by the Holy Spirit.

It is supposed to have been written by the hand of Ezra, the man of God who learned the deep things of God (Ezra 7:10).

1. Chs. 1-9. Solomon's glory was but the reflection of the glory of the Holy One of Israel dwelling in the Temple (ch. 7:1, 2).

What glory will Israel behold when David's greater Son builds a Temple which will fully reveal the glory of the Builder (Matt. 25:31; Heb. 3:1-6; 1:3; Matt. 17:1-8).

What glory will Israel behold when they see the King in His beauty, and rule with Him during a millennium of righteousness (Isa. 9:6, 7; 32:1, 17; 33:17).

But we behold His glory now, and are transformed into His image from glory to glory, as we look steadfastly upon Him, as revealed to our hearts by His Spirit in the Word (2 Cor. 3:18; Col. 3:12, 13).

2. Chs. 10-16. In spite of the church quarrels and multiplied creeds, the Lord gives His strength, His grace to those who trust and obey Him (Rom. 12:1, 2; Eph. 6: 10-18; Phil. 4:13; Neh. 8:10).

3. Chs. 17-20. Fellowship or partnership with the world will always mean defeat, but God's grace is multiplied unto those who are willing to live a separated life, dead to sin and to the world (James 4:4; 1 John 2:15; Col. 3:1, 2; 2 Cor. 6:16-18; Gal. 6:14; 2:20; Rom. 6:11; 8:13).

4. Chs. 21-24. All the light of a new life that shines through us comes from beholding Him, who is our light and our salvation (John 8:12; Ps. 27:1; 34:5).

5. Chs. 25-28. The judgment of the One dwelling between the cherubim is always in righteousness on the basis of the cross, for His eyes are upon the Mercy Seat, our Propitiation (Rom. 3:25 R. V.; Heb. 9:5; Rom. 4:5; 1 John 1:9).

6. Chs. 29-36. What marvelous tokens of grace are being manifest to an apostate church before the hour of judgment comes, but the apostasy will ripen quickly as these tokens are rejected and then judgment will be swift and sure (2 Thess. 1:8, 9; 2:10-12; 2 Peter 2:1; Rev. 3:14-22).

THE ATONEMENT OF CHRIST

FROM what hath been said upon the Atonement which Jesus Christ hath made for sin, we may see the reason, and be convinced of the truth of the declaration made by St. Peter to the Jewish rulers: "Neither is there salvation in any other than Jesus Christ; for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved". For this is only saying in other words, that there is no salvation for fallen man but only through the Atonement and intercession of the One Mediator between God and man, Jesus Christ our Lord.

On this subject, however, a question arises, to which it may be proper to attend: The question is this: What is to become of those who lived before the coming of Christ, and of those who since His coming have never heard of Him, nor of His Gospel; and who consequently know nothing of His atonement, nor of salvation through Him?

To resolve this seeming difficulty let it be remembered, that though Jesus Christ did not appear in human nature till He was born of the Virgin Mary; nor suffer death on the cross, till the time of Pontius Pilate, the Roman governor of Judaea; yet, in a true sense, He assumed our nature when He was promised to Adam as the seed, one of the posterity of the woman Eve, and the bruiser of the serpent, Satan; the adversary and beguiler of our original parents. Then, in truth, the gospel, or glad tidings of salvation through the Mediator began; for then He was declared to be the Mediator of a new covenant between a just God and fallen man. This promise was made to Adam, before he had any descendants, all his posterity must, therefore, be included in it, and in the atonement which the Mediator, as sponsor or surety for man, undertook to make. For this reason, St. John, in his Revelation, speaks of him as the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world". And hence it is, that He is the propitiation not only for our sins, but for the sins of the whole world.

We may be unable to discern fully the reasons of God's procedure in many cases. Our capacities are limited, and unequal to the comprehension of His dispensations, who, being infinite in His nature, must "have His ways past finding out". For this reason there must of necessity be some mysteries in divine revelation; that is, some things which we cannot comprehend, but which we must receive on divine authority. If this be a fault, it is the fault of our nature; just such a fault as it is, that we are not angels; but our religion and its Author are clear of all censure. When a parent cautions a child against running into the fire, or water, or down a precipice; the child may be incapable of comprehending the reason of the prohibition; but if he slight the authority, and superior knowledge of his parent; he will, on making the trial, surely smart for his presumption.

Should it be asked, why God did not sooner create this world which we inhabit? every answer we could give would betray our ignorance. We know, indeed, what is intended by the question. Sooner, and later, with regard to us, have a precise meaning; but they are not applicable to God, with whom nothing is past or future, but everything present. The creation of the world is as much present with God now, as when the world was first made; and the atonement of Christ was as much present with God, when He became our Mediator, as when He suffered at Jerusalem. If, then, they who lived before Christ's personal appearance and suffering in human nature, were as much included in His mediation as they who lived since, no injustice was done them. Besides:

It appears from the short history which Moses hath given us, that God did make known to Adam the glad tidings of reconciliation with him through the Mediator, and the means by which he was to obtain the benefit of it. We find that Cain and Abel brought offerings to God. Abel's offering was an animal for sacrifice. But the offering of animals in sacrifice to God could not have arisen from suggestions of human reason. Modern philosophers tell us the practice is unreasonable and unnatural, and have generally condemned it. It is fruitless to dispute a point with men who arrogate all reason to themselves, and make their own understandings the measure of everything, not even excepting the operations and institutions of infinite power and wisdom. In this, however, we are agreed; that animal sacrifices are unnatural, and never could have obtained, on the principles either of natural reason or religion. To what origin, then, shall we ascribe them? The philosopher will say to superstition. But when he says so, he forgets that superstition is the child of reason, and consists in setting up invention of our own reason, and following dictates of our own hearts in the worship of God, as the means of rendering Him propitious to us, instead of abiding in His institutions. Had there been no true religion, there could have been none that is false. Had there been no positive institutions by divine authority in the worship of God, by which to conciliate His favor; superstitution could have had no ground to stand on. The abuse of sacrifices, the offering of them to the sun and moon, to Jupiter and Juno, and other fictitious deities, and the vain rites with which they were accompanied, were superstition—the contrivances of human reason. But sacrifices themselves must have been the institution of God; and intended, as types and figures, to point out the expiation and atonement of the great Mediator; and to direct men, by faith and hope, to look to, and rely upon Him for redemption from sin, and the wrath of God, by the propitiation of His blood, shadowed forth by the blood of the animal slain for sacrifice.

God, too, had His preachers of righteousness in the first ages of the world, as well as He hath now, to instruct and keep men in the true religion, and in the paths of holiness and virtue; and if men did abuse and debase the sacrifices and worship of God by their own superstition, paying that adoration to the creatures which was due only to the blessed Creator, it was because they were philosophers, and preferred the dictates of their own reason, and the suggestions of their own understanding, to the positive commands and institutions of God. If they disregarded the obligations of moral virtue, and indulged themselves in the gratification of the appetites of the body, and of the malignant passions of the mind, it only proves that human nature was then, what it is now, foolish and perverse: but it is no impeachment of the goodness and providence of God, nor of the reality and efficacy of His religious institutions. In the very worst state of human apostasy and licentiousness, God did not leave Himself without witnesses of "His eternal power and Godhead". "The heavens declared the power of God, and the firmament shewed His handiwork." The alternate returns of day and night, summer and winter, seedtime and harvest, rain and sunshine, all proclaimed a superior and almighty power. They proclaimed, too, that this power was good and gracious, giving them "fruitful seasons", and "filling their hearts with food and gladness."—To be concluded.—Selected.

The Great Commission

ALASKA.

Mr. John W. Wood, Secretary of our National Council, sends us here some news items from Allakaket, Alaska:

"Christmas at St. John's-in-the-Wilderness was a happy time. Most of the village people returned from their trapping to keep the feast. Their happiness was clouded by the death of a little blind girl and one of our old women. I think that their attitude toward death is more hopeful than most people outside.

"The people did not have very good luck in their trapping this year and the Christmas offering is not as good as last year. I send you the $66.25 for the general work of the Church.

"We have had a very warm winter, only a little time with fifty below.

"The white men who have been mining up the Alatna have been waiting for their plane to come in for several weeks, but no sign of it."

Since the letter containing the foregoing items was written by Miss Helen Lambert on January 4, she met with an accident through the exploding of a kerosene lamp, and was badly burned. Fortunately, the missing airplane must have turned up shortly after. A report from Fairbanks assures the Department of Missions that Miss Labert was brought there by airplane and was immediately cared for in St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Hospital and is doing well.

It may be worth noting with regard to that Christmas offering that if every communicant of the Church gave at the same rate as our two missionary women at Allakaket give on their salaries of $975 a year, the income for the missionary work of the Church would be well over $10,000,000 in 1929!

MISSION NEEDS.

Two needs from the overseas mission field: an operating table for the hospital at Zamboanga in the Philippines, and organs for several missions in Cuba. The operating table would cost $175, exclusive of transportation. The table which has long been in use there was made by native workmen.

Four little churches in Cuba lack organs. A small size costs about $150. Further information may be had from the Department of Missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

"BIRD OF PARADISE" CARRIES BISHOP.

Bishop Burleson, completing the Hawaiian visitation, which he has been making as Assessor to the Presiding Bishop, made an airplane journey on January 19 from Honolulu to the Island of Kauai, where he consecrated All Saints' Church at Kapea, and confirmed a class of eight. He made the flight in the Army plane "Bird of Paradise", the plane used by Maitland and his companions in their trans-Pacific flight. The Island of Kauuai is not easily accessible.

Restoration of Wakefield

This editorial from The New York Times we reprint here as an item of interest to all Americans.

"The replica of the house in which George Washington was born, which the generosity of Mr. Rockefeller seems to assure, will be a mansion. The Washingtons were landed gentry, and in their migration to Virginia at a time when Cromwell was making Northamptonshire warm for Stuart Royalists they probably managed to take some of the family fortune with them. When the first President was born his father was already a man of at least three estates.

". . . . . While his strain of gentility was conceded, a certain amount of necessitous hardship was inferred. But it is much more to his credit that, though he was of aristocratic birth, he sought adventure by flood, field and battle. Yet it was once considered imperative that schoolboys should believe every President to have begun in the quasi-log cabin stage. Jefferson was passed over lightly as a sort of literary person and therefore not ruined by inherited comforts.

"It now develops that the replica of Wakefield House will show one of those lovely old brick manor-houses, some of which in Virginia are today inhabited by rich owners from New York. Chatham, across the Rappahannock from Fredericksburg, is another such place as Wakefield was, and throughout the Tidewater the pleasant meads and rolling woods are agreeable settings for these charming Colonial houses. They represent the best mood of American architecture, and—as witness the great restoration movement at Williamsburg—modern good taste has seen fit to preserve them. In Virginia even the creeks and villages have the same names they had when George Washington knew them. In his childhood Wakefield House faced Pope's Creek, and Pope's Creek it is still. If a town was called Lone Tree in Virginia in 1700, it is not Sentinel Oak now. Regrettably, this proud and sensible interest in the past has not everywhere prevailed; and almost every day a newspaper somewhere records a legislative act or town ordinance changing a good old name to a silly new one.

"The older the nation grows, the more it appreciates the essential qualities of the inflexible man who was born at Wakefield House. And the more it applauds such acts as Mr. Rockefeller's to preserve all possible memorials of his extraordinarily useful life."

GRACE AND PEACE

Charles Curtis McIntire.

"Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

In this day of uncertainty, in regard to the Deity of our Lord, we are grateful for this assertion of the equality of the Son with the Father. From them issue these two provisions, grace and peace, for the sons of God.

Grace is love. It is love at white heat. It is spiritual enabling energy. It is God in action through His Son for our salvation. It is the undeserved favor of God bestowed upon us, not because of our attainments or our possessions, but because of his spontaneous desire to help us, according to the good pleasure of His will.

The consequence of grace in your heart is peace. You can't find peace if you are not experiencing grace. Peace on God's part is the complacency of reconciliation with which He regards His people. It is a state on which all peace rests. On man's part it is an experience. It is repose and serenity of soul. It is spiritual happiness. We must have our troubles; but beneath the surface is peace like a river bearing us forward undisturbed and with a poise that characterizes the heart of God.

Domestic difficulties dissolve and family felicity is fostered by praying for grace. The true mission of all social service endeavor is to bring the grace of Christ to bear on the lives of men and women. Industrial and commercial disputes find their amicable adjustment as men by grace call each other brethren. Missionaries full of grace and peace are the world's greatest agents for solving problems of international relations. America's outstanding need is preachers and Christians of this kind.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A PUZZLED PARSON AND OTHER PLEAS FOR REALITY: By Charles Fiske, Bishop of Central New York. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City, Price, $2.

Of course the Bishop is not at all puzzled. He knows what he thinks; and he knows how to express his thoughts, and he does that in a most incisive manner.

He does full justice to the various types of people to which he addresses himself. It is to be hoped that this book will be read by all those to whom religion and its expression are not realities. For instance, the mechanical preacher, and the man who conducts the service mechanically, and the man in the pew who merely comes as a kind of routine, and whose heart is not in the business—all these ought to be greatly helped by the reading of this book.

He deals fairly with the nuisances and pests of the Church, the various secretaries and "whoop-'em-up" men; and with those who endeavor to make the Church a society for the propagation of pet ideas and queer ideas. He is a slashing writer and a hitter from the shoulder, and it was needful that some one should do it.

The Bishop deals with "soul-saving suppers", with the Church's "unfailing amiability", the "Glory of the Christian Faith," and "Loyalty". It is refreshing to have him say: "After all, the only material out of which to make a clergyman is lay material!"

His discussion of Marriage and the New Home and Woman is very thorough; and it is full of practical ideas and understanding. In fact tht whole book is full of common sense and understanding. It is entertaining reading.

SPIRITUAL DIRECTION: By T. W. Pym. Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wis. Price, $2.

This book is symptomatic of the strange eclecticism that prevails in the religious world today. Most seem to have absorbed a bit here and there from various systems. The author realizes the need for more intimate contact between clergy and people in the matter of spiritual guidance. His remedy is a faintly modified confessional, to which is attached methods gathered from what purports to be newer psychological teachings.

While the book avoids compulsory confessional (he could hardly do less, as a loyal member of the Church of England), the old dangers are still there, with new ones added. The first difficulty about the confessional is that only a converted minister ought to deal with seekers. The author does not even sense that difficulty. In addition to the astigmatism suffered by all who are unconverted, we have the further danger from those who are deliberately wicked. Is it right to make customary a teaching that would send innocent people regularly for spiritual advice to these classes of ministers? Yet the advocates of the confessional never discriminate in practice. The consequence is that we have met men who said that recourse to confession had left them worse, rather than better. One man said that he had never been in the habit of lying before he went. It is better to leave such things a matter of individual ministration. No minister who is worth anything needs the artificial bolster of the confessional in his dealings with the needy.

The author's advice indicates that he has at times allowed the Christian to be obscured in the psychological. He leans to the old way of struggle, with the helps of prayer and other aids added, but he does not indicate that he fully understands the Christian way of surrender, and victory through Christ. The whole range of practical theology gleaned from Christ's atoning death and triumphant resurrection is passed over. These truths would render some of the books superfluous, and are required in order to make the rest workable.

A further danger that always besets those who try for a via media between contradictory views is present although again not fully recognized. That danger is that men who are out for the whole Medieval system will take his concessions as permission to go further, while those who understand New Testament truth will be repelled. For example, he opens the door to Mariolatry and suggests that we pray before a picture or a crucifix. These and kindred things have been tried and have been found wanting. They will not work any better in this age, even though bolstered up with a little starch stiffening borrowed from the new psychology. F. C.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart," Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. C. Lee Dudley, of Norfolk, Virginia:

> "Give therefore Thy servant an understanding heart, . . . that I may discern between good and bad."—1 Kings 3:9.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

ANGLO-CATHOLIC MONASTICISM.

Mr. Editor:

Anglo-Catholic Monasticism, doubtless sincerely, but how wisely, aiming at Greek Catholic monasticism, often in recent years we have seen actually become a part of Roman Catholic monasticism. Sometimes their monasteries, Benedictine or Franciscan in name, continued as such under subjection and conversion to the assumed domination of the Roman Bishop, now called Pope, as all ministers of the Christian Church once speedily were called "papa", "father".

In the opinion of recent writers in the columns of The Southern Churchman, this movement is a relapse, in some points at least, into pre-Reformation bondage—a sacrifice of pure primitive Protestant Christian belief.

It seems the writer should not omit to also add his protest—it comes from the pen of an Episcopalian, returned to the Church of Ignatius and Irenaeus and of Cyprian, his obscure name—Father Alberia Biddle, for twenty years in the perpetually silent ascetic cloister, priest and monk of the Trappist Order, nothing in any family sense, the last name unknown to any except in some necessary business signature, in very scant correspondence, in rare social relations.

The Anglo-Catholic monks, in so far as they would Hellenize, or become Greek Catholics, par excellence above their laity, would embrace doctrines and practices condemned in the Eastern Church before and after the Nicene Council as idolatrous, such as worship of images, invocation of saints. But in so far as the Anglo-Catholic monks would Romanize, they would in an excessive way become the avowed and recognized bulwarks of the Papacy, in its inquisitorial spirit, temporal claims as a kingdom. They would be ready if prudence permitted to send sacred expeditions for spiritual supremacy with an enforced state military, as their monastic theologians, from Gregory the Great, monk, to the iron ruler Hildebrand the Benedictine Clunyite to the Dominican Friar in his Summa, Thomas Aquinas, and the Jesuit Suarez and later the Redemptorist Liguori—be they hermits alone, or cenobites, monks, or friars, or members of a simple congregation, Oblates, Oratorians—in many cases as the Reformed Cistercian Order, or Trappists (to which once I submitted by a mistaken, erroneous theology); in many cases the Pope not only assuming to subject to his bishopric by an anti-christian power their apostolic freedom to renounce their vows at their own will, but also often changing solemn to simple, or vice versa, thus affecting vast money possessions and in history repeatedly, as in Mexico today, obliging civil governments to step in and free their subjects from religious bodies, untaxed, immune from courts, destructive to society. We indicate thus the vicious, not the virtuous, side.

Far better than to Hellenize, to Romanize, we beseech the Anglo-Catholic monk to Anglicize, rather Americanize, the Greek, the Roman monk. To seek the good of your fellow man, to do the will of God perfectly in the simplest walk of life, herein is perfection, "though I give my body to be burned and have not charity". But if the Anglo-Catholic monk thinks by a special call his perfection lies in laying by poverty all at the feet of the apostles—good, and obedience to superiors likewise, and by celibacy or single life, as St. Paul counsels to some only—very, very good.

But, oh! will any Western Churchman enlighten and persuade the corrupt communions of Asia and Europe by yielding the pure spiritual worship of the Protestant Church, our Episcopal, to the sensible, sensuous, superstitious one introduced in time especially to the Roman Catholic. Herein lies the essence of its un-christian departure from the truth; solidity in some chief teachings, but an ignoble substitution of something sensible to represent the presence of God—adoration finally as the Summa of Aquinas teaches of the wooden cross, the images of Christ, with the worship of "Latria" that is due to God alone.

The Synagogue in the time of our Lord had the same spirit, overlaid with Rabbinical traditions, the Roman Church with superstitious legends, the case of the Jews saying we will not have this man Moses, give us a golden calf to represent God—the adoration at first purely spiritual ends in an image.

How often as Librarian of the small monastic library have I read in a parchment volume, or a copy of the Jesuit, a Lapide, or heard or read aloud from the refectory dining pulpit from the Cistercian Menology to the silent monks at dinner, the incredible tale of the Lactation of St. Bernard. Such stories are not yet even removed from the Roman Breviary, although Protestant revelations have, as history shows, forced the Oratorian Baronius and the Jesuit Bellarmine to expurge a part of them from the daily prayer of all Roman priests. Will the Anglo-Catholic monk embrace such an infallible teachings from the Holy See of the Papacy, which for centuries gave out such fables as true worship? No, the sensual objects of worship degraded the spiritual.

St. Cyprian teaches the doctrine the Anglo-Catholic should follow with his brethren in the same communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church. St. Cyprian and with him a vast number of saints and martyrs, laymen, monks, abbots and bishops of the great African Church, said a religious consecrated to God in certain circumstances could be released from his state for marriage. He held the Rock of Peter was equally that of every Episcopal Church, of every minister of same, teaching the Faith of Peter—all clearly laid down in his Tractatus de Unitate—his life and teachings always against Stephen, the Pope of Rome at that time.

OF ONESIPHORUS.

(Note: The following letter was written to a friend who has sent it to us with the request that it be published in these columns.—(Ed. S. C.)

Dear Sir:

"The translation of 2 Tim. 1:18, in my judgment, would have to be like this: May the Lord grant him (now, and once for all) to have found (Burton shows how an aorist must at times have an English pluperfect to express it) mercy with the Lord as his friend (the preposition, para, always has friendliness in it) in view of that day.

The aorists prove to my mind that Onesiphorus was still living, and "that day" seems to indicate that he was perhaps facing martyrdom even as Paul was. Paul had absolute peace of mind 'looking towards' (eis) 'that day', and what he asks for Onesiphorus is that Onesiphorus shall prove to be as courageous and buoyant and invincible in meeting that ordeal as he expected to be himself. Therefore he was solicitous about 'the house of Onesiphorus', that the family might be upheld in the hour of anxiety, and perhaps bereavement.

Paul's trial had not come off in all likelihood, for the custom was to lead prisoners out to trial, and from trial, on being condemned, to execution. Probably the persistency of Onesiphorus in seeking Paul got him into trouble.

Turn to 4:16, 17: 'At my first answer'; evidently he, Paul, had had one trial, and was looking forward to another. Note the preposition para in paregeneto: 'At first defense no one took my part" (R. .): no one came to my side as a friend, but the Lord stood by me (pareste), again with the preposition para. With this in mind, revert once more to 1:18, para Kuriou en ekeine te 'emera. Nobody but the Lord was at Paul's side as friend at his first trial; he hoped that at least the Lord would be at Onesiphorus' side as a friend, when Onesiphorus' day came.

I can see nothing in the passage that can be tortured into the thought of praying for the dead. Paul is absorbed in the intensely interesting affairs of the moment. He is facing the exigencies of the hour."

SCRIPTURE UNION.

Mr. Editor:

I have open before me the Life of Bishop W. W. Cassels, First Bishop (Church of England) in Western China. A paragraph seems very worth these lines to repeat. It is from a letter to his children. Probably written from his home in Paoning, Szechwan, in which I have quite a few times gathered with the workers for the mid-week morning of special prayer. I think it was to the elder children away at school. He speaks of his own and Mrs. Cassels' early morning reading in "Daily Light", his quiet time in his study, Chinese Prayers, then breakfast. After that, he writes: "We have what we call 'Children's Prayers'. I ask Harold something about the Children's Scripture Union Portion which he has been reading to Linda before breakfast. He and Linda repeat the verse they have learned, we have a children's hymn and a short prayer."

I think how nice it would be if many children of The Southern Churchman family would join the Scripture Union and read the portion each morning from God's Word as Harold and Linda Cassels were doing when they were children out in far Western China. They would be reading too with lots of children, as well as grown-up people, in various places in the wide world. The Honorable Secretary for the American Division is the Rev. Russell T. Smith, 2614 West Montgomery Avenue, Philadelphia. Members' Yearly minimum subscription is ten cents with postage.

The other day in a Children's Bible Class, I was pointing out a verse as written by St. Paul to Timothy, and a little girl at my side immediately remarked that "we have been reading there", referring to our late S. U. portions, as she is a member. "We" from her childish lips sounded pleasant to older ears, as she really identified herself with a great multitude, young and old, who in many lands find daily help in the same blessed Word. And we rejoice for those who "from a child", know it as did the son of the mother whose name the Spirit records (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15).

Church Intelligence

Ministers' Attitude Towards Marriage.

In a national survey of marriage laws and the way in which they are administered, recently made by Mary E. Richmond and Fred S. Hall, staff members of the Russell Sage Foundation, the attitude of ministers and the Church generally is given considerable attention.

The Foundation's investigators state in the summary of their report released February 15, that they discovered widely contrasting attitudes toward marriage celebration among groups of clergymen. "Some," they say, "are fully aware of both the spiritual and social significance of this part of their ministry; some, devoutly sensitive to the spiritual aspects of marriage, seem to have little knowledge of the practical every-day aspects that have been emphasized in these pages; while still others can be accurately described as nothing better than 'marrying parsons', so little do they regard the wedding ceremony save as a source of revenue."

Miss Richmond has been known internationally in the field of social work, and Mr. Hall, who earlier cooperated with her in a study of child marriages, was the author in 1925 of a study of the Wisconsin law which requires physical examination prior to marriage.

The authors nave considered the record of all large denominations in regulating marriage and while a few of them have been found to give considerable attention to the constructive problems involved, the general criticism is made that there has been "little specific action as yet on the subject as a whole or on any aspect of it save divorce". It is also remarked that an examination of the courses of instruction given in one hundred and thirty-one Protestant Theological Seminaries fails to reveal any mention of well regulated courses on marriage.

On the other hand, some of the best constructive legislation on the subject is found to have had its origin in church bodies or ministerial associations. The law in Georgia requiring a five days' advance notice of intention to marry is pointed to as an instance in which churches took the lead in progresive legislation. The Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship held in England in 1924 is quoted extensively in the report with particular reference to its conclusion that "If the Church is to render her due service to society as a whole, more provision should be made by which members of the Church could find ways of giving counsel and help to persons outside the Church before and after marriage".

The report devotes two long chapters to the attitudes and standards of individual clergymen with reference to the marriage ceremony. It points out that many ministers content themselves with requiring a marriage license in legal form, whereas in most states the law permits and sometimes requires that they themselves ascertain whether the prospective bride and groom are duly qualified candidates. A number of glaring cases of laxity in this respect are cited. In one instance a clergyman, holding an important place in his community, officiated at the marriage of a girl of fourteen. He accepted her age as eighteen, although she was a member of his own Sunday School and lived with her parents just three doors from his parsonage. He did not consult her parents before the marriage, which was subsequently annulled.

A few cases of religious marriage ceremonies performed for girls as young as eleven, twelve and thirteen are given in the report, though in these cases culpability is shared by the parents who had actually arranged the marriages. Other cases are on record in which clergymen performed the marriage ceremony when one or both participants were obviously under the influence of liquor. The worst abuses arise, according to the report, in the cases of "marrying parsons". It is admitted that justices of the peace more frequently figure in what are termed "marriage market towns", but the marrying parson also has a large share in the cheapening and commercializing of marriage in these places.

The clerical commercialism reported includes such practices as offering cooperative license clerks a share of the marriage fee; maintaining a desk in the marriage license office and selling there marriage certificates designed for framing; establishing a room or residence very near the courthouse with conspicuous advertising signs, employing runners and personally soliciting patronage from strangers; dividing fees with taxicab drivers who bring candidates to be married; and helping young people to evade the marriage laws of their own states. It is pointed out that aside from the unfortunate atmosphere and the lack of solemnity which are likely to surround ceremonies conducted by "marrying parsons", many of the marriages are actually illegal or at least socially inadvisable. Numerous cases of age falsifications, bigamy and other illegal practices have been traced to marriage market towns; and in such places where special care should be taken to check the qualifications of prospective brides and grooms, conditions of the greatest laxity often prevail. In the opinion of the authors the situation requires serious consideration on the part of the various denominations and rigid efforts at control, together with a raising of standards all along the line until the general standard shall be that now adopted by the most progressive clergymen.

"The minister's true part," says the report, "in making marriage a greater success than it now is, demands closer study than we are competent to give it, but it is evident that the mere avoidance of commercial practices is not enough. In fact, a minister's failure to recognize the conspicuous social disqualifications of candidates who present themselves for marriage ceremony will come in time, we believe, to be regarded by the churches as unfitting a man for the ministry".

The investigators of the Foundation are warm in their praise of the high standards maintained by certain clergymen with whom they came into contact. They quote with approval the "Rule of Three" of a Protestant Episcopal minister which follows:

1. "Proof that the candidates have known each other for at least three months."
2. "The presence of witnesses personally acquainted with the bride and bridegroom."
3. "A certificate from the family physician showing the bridegroom to be physically fit."

Some ministers endeavor to marry only members of their congregation, and if they officiate for two people not known to them they require that these persons be vouched for by some one whose judgment they can trust. Blank forms are suggested by the authors—one for the bridegroom and one for the bride—upon which the ministers may set down the facts they ought to find out about candidates. Many of these items may relate to baptism, confirmation, communion, and type of service desired, but others relate to matters which involve the legality or wisdom of the proposed marriage. Separate interviews with each of the candidates are recommended in which further facts may be discovered and through which full meaning of the marriage ceremony will be duly impressed upon the prospective bride and groom.

A Presbyterian pastor is singled out for special commendation, and his statement is quoted as follows: "When I can get the confidence of the girls who belong to my church, I can very easily investigate their engagements and have conferences with them and their fiances and lead them out of difficulties. In many instances, when consulted, I have been able to prevent a marriage when the young man was of an unsavory character I have sent for him and frankly told him; or, I have sent for the girl's parents and sometimes the boy's parents and have thereby been able to convince the parties involved of the unwisdom of their proposed step and have saved them much sorrow and trouble."

This clergyman mentions his opportunities for helpful service to the members of his church. Some clergymen, feeling that religious ceremonies should be limited to church members, have proposed that the continental system be adopted by law in this country. By that system the only required ceremony is a civil one. Persons who wish may have a religious ceremony in addition, but the latter has no legal standing whatever. The authors believe that the probable effect of such a system, legally established in this country, would be unfortunate. They point out that at present "many persons who have lost active church connections turn, nevertheless, to the Church when certain great events occur in their lives. Marriage is one of these, and a conscientious minister of religion, through the opportunity he has for conference with such persons, is in a position to be of influence spiritually. Not only may this most important event be surrounded with fitting and uplifting conditions, but false steps may be avoided through his counsel. If, however, the alternative choice of a religious or a civil ceremony that now prevails in this country were done away with and the religious ceremony were left with no legal standing, many persons who now by preference are married by clergymen might be unwilling or unable to have both kinds of ceremony, and, therefore, would be married only by the obligatory civil forms. It does not seem wise thus to discourage a relationship which might be made of positive value in the after-lives of the people concerned."

The investigation as a whole seems to point out the need for greater attention by the Church to the solemnization of marriage, and for higher standards, adopted either voluntarily or through denominational regulation, on the part of individual clergymen.

Meeting of Church League for Industrial Democracy.

The Rev. J. Howard Melish, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, New York, was one of the speakers at the annual meeting of the Church League for Industrial Democracy, which was held at the Penn Athletic Club, Philadelphia, on Washington's Birthday. Dr. Melish has recently returned from abroad and spoke on the activities in the field of industry of groups in the Church of England. The other chief speaker was Mr. Gustav Geiges, President of the Full Fashioned Hosiery Workers Union, whose subject was "What the Church Can Do For the Worker". Miss Vida Scudder presided and a brief address was also given by Mr. Jos. Fletcher, assistant in the newly organized department of industrial relations of the National Council. The meeting, which was preceded by a luncheon at one o'clock, was open to the public.

Looking Towards Lambeth.

The following is a copy of a letter dated January 14, 1929, to Bishop Brent from the Archbishop of Canterbury, and is published here by special permission:

I write to you as Chairman of the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order and in reply to the letter which my predecessor received enclosing the Report of the Conference which met at Lausanne in August, 1927. I wish to inform you that that Report was brought before the National Assembly of the Church of England on July 6, 1928, and the following Resolution was passed:

"That the Archbishops of Canterbury and York be requested to appoint a Committee (including in its membership some of the delegates to the Conference) to consider the findings of the Conference on Faith and Order, to make them known throughout the Church of England, and to prepare Memoranda with a view to submitting them to the Lambeth Conference in 1930."

That motion was proposed by the Bishop of Gloucester and supported by the Bishop of Manchester and was carried unanimously.

In accordance with that Resolution a strong and influential Committee has been appointed, of which the Bishop of Gloucester is the Chairman, and that Committee has already begun to work at the double task of making known the Resolutions of the Lausanne Conference and of studying them with a view to the Lambeth Conference.

It is well known that this is a matter on which the Church of England could not give any decisive reply except after consultation with the Churches in Communion with it, and at the Lambeth Conference the problem of reunion and the proposals of the Lausanne Conference will be considered with the utmost care and attention. I would only add, in conclusion, that the Report was received with great sympathy by the Church Assembly, and that you may be sure that all the problems of reunion will be studied during the next eighteen months with the utmost care and sympathy in the Church of England.

Church Army In U. S. A.

Nine students entered Church Army Training Center on the Feast of the Epiphany. Five of these have had field experience with the Church Army prior to going to the Center.

The trainees will continue their studies and preparation until December next.

In cooperation with the National Commission on Evangelism and at the request of some of the clergy of the City of Baltimore—ten of the Society's Evangelists are conducting Missions in that city during the latter part of January and during February. The following parishes are on their list—Memorial, Messiah, All Saints, St. John's, Ascension and St. Thomas and Brunswick, Md.

Two men are at work in the Virginia mountains, one amongst isolated Episcopalians in Vermont, one in a North Carolina mill town and one in Eastern Oregon.

At a recent Conference on Evangelism at St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., the following minute was registered: "That the work of the Church Army be heartily endorsed. Those present felt that it should be part of their task to send men to be trained in this Army; and that use should be made of the Church Army men in missions . . ."

At the request of the New York Episcopal City Mission, Church Army is attempting a bit of Sunday night Evangelism in one of the Society's Bowery Centers.

Eau Claire Expresses Appreciation.

The Standing Committee of the Diocese of Eau Claire is desirous of expressing its appreciation of the prompt attention given by the Standing Committees of the other dioceses of the Church, to its request for consent to the consecration of the Rev. Dr. Wilson, Bishop-elect of Eau Claire.

The Committee on Canons of Eau Claire likewise would thank the several dioceses for the copies of their Constitutions and Canons which have been sent in at the request of the Committee. These have been of very great help in the organization of the new diocese.

Presiding Bishop to Visit Mid-West Synod.

Bishop Murray, the Presiding Bishop, has accepted the invitation of Bishop Gray, President of the Province of the Mid-West, to be the speaker at the mass meeting held in connection with the Synod which will meet in Indianapolis October 16 and 17, according to resolution unanimously passed at the last Synod. The various departments and the President and Council will meet on the preceding day, Tuesday, October 15. The Synod will convene on Wednesday morning, October 16, the mass meeting at which the Presiding Bishop will speak being set for that evening. Adjournment is planned for Thursday noon.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

Service for Brotherhood.

A Corporate Communion for men and boys in this diocese was held under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral on February 22, at 8 A. M. Bishop Freeman was the celebrant. A large number of men and boys was present at this service, which the Brotherhood hopes will become an annual event in the programs of future activities now being planned by the National President, Mr. H. Lawrence Choate, of this city. After the Communion service, the laymen attended a fellowship breakfast at Alban Towers, when Bishop Freeman spoke on "Personal Evangelism". The boys attending the service had breakfast at St. Alban's School for Boys and listened to an address by Dr. Sinclair Bowen, an active layman of the diocese.

Washington's Birthday Commemorated.

The annual service commemorating the birth of George Washington, conducted under the auspices of the Sons of the Revolution was held in Epiphany Church on Sunday, February 24, at 4 P. M.

The service was conducted by the Rt. Rev. Phillip Mercer Rhinelander, chaplain of the Sons of the Revolution in the District of Columbia, assisted by Dr. Thomas Edward Green, general chaplain of the General Society, Sons of the Revolution; Dr. Ze Barney Phillips, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, chaplain of the Senate of the United States, and Dr. G. Freeland Peter, canon of Washington Cathedral.

The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, Bishop of Virginia.

Canon Russell.

The Rev. J. Townsend Russell, D. D., Canon of Washington Cathedral, died at his residence, Beauvoir, on Washington Cathedral grounds, on Monday, February 18, after a short illness. Funeral services were held in Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, on Wednesday, February 20, at 11 A. M., with the Bishop and Dean of Washington, officiating.

Canon Russell was a graduate of Hobart College and pursued his theological studies at Becksley Theological Seminary at Gambier, Ohio. He served parishes in Warren, Pa., and Brooklyn, N. Y., where he also was Archdeacon, and at Palm Beach, Fla., where, during his term of office, the new church, Bethesda by the Sea, was built. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from George Washington University.

Noon-Day Lenten Services.

The preacher at the Noon-Day Lenten services at Epiphany Church during the week of February 25, was the Rev. Henry Lubeck, LL. D., D. C. L. The preacher for the following week will be the Rev. Fred B. Budlong, S. T. D., D. D., rector of Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn. These services are held from 12:30 to 12:55, thus enabling people to return to their offices in time after the service.

Bishop Murray Describes Haitien Trip.

The Maryland Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary had the privilege of listening to Bishop Murray give a brief sketch of his trip to Haiti, Wednesday afternoon, February 20, in the Diocesan House, Baltimore.

The Bishop outlined the present government of the Black Republic and then told what our Church had done and what was yet to be done. The Bishop said that Bishop Carson had three big problems in his Advance Work program —a Seminary for the native priests, a Girls' School and a Bishop's Residence.

Bishop Murray insists that "the last shall be first" and already has secured a goodly sum towards its erection.

The Cathedral at Port au Prince means a great deal not only to the natives but to the visitors and tourists. The one idea which should be conveyed to the natives is the permanency of our Church there and that is the greatest thing which the Cathedral will accomplish and then, when the Bishop's residence is erected, it will also mean to them that their Bishop is just as permanent as their Cathedral and they will feel that the Church is their own.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Diocese of Lexington Deputies to the Provincial Synod.

At the recent Diocesan Council, held in Christ Church, Lexington, the Rev. Charles Stuart Hale, acting Dean, host, the following deputies were elected to the next Provincial Synod: Rev. F. E. Cooley, Newport; Rev. Thomas L. Settle, Lexington; Rev. Robert J. Murphy, Versailles; Rev. T. S. Will, Ashland; Rev. Charles S. Hale, Lexington, and Rev. H. O. Boon, Paris. Lay deputies elected were—Mrs. J. J. Morris, Lexington; Mr. R. L. Coleman, Ashland; Mr. A. D. Cole, Maysville; Mr. J. A. Edge, Lexington; Mr. W. W. Pettis, Covington, and Mr. Henry Soaper, Danville.

New Diocesan Editor Appointed.

Mrs. Irene Clopton Waters has been appointed by the Standing Committee as Editor of the Diocesan News, awaiting the approval of the incoming Bishop, Dr. H. P. Almon Abbott, of Chicago. Mrs. Waters is the daughter of the Rev. J. J. Clopton, rector of St. John's, Dayton, Ky. She has been Bishop Burton's Secretary for the past three years.

New Parish House for Versailles.

A thoroughly modern Parish House is soon to be built in the Parish of St. John's, Versailles. Senator Johnson N. Camden, his daughter, Miss Tevis Camden, and the late Mrs. Camden planned the gift, which will probably now be erected as a memorial to Mrs. Camden. The rector of this flourishing parish is the Rev. Robert J. Murphy.

SPRINGFIELD.

Rt. Rev. John C. White, Bishop.

Rev. J. G. Wright.

The Diocese of Springfield is mourning the death of the President of its Standing Committee, the Rev. Joseph G. Wright, rector of Grace Church, Greenville. Mr. Wright was the oldest active clergyman in the diocese and has been rector at Greenville for forty-seven years. He attended a meeting of the Standing Committee of the diocese during January, and has been quite active in his parish and diocesan life until ten days before his death. The funeral was conducted by the Bishop on Quinquagesima Sunday.

Chairman for Drive.

Mrs. George Thomas Palmer has accepted the appointment of the Bishop to head the Committee of Women of the Diocese in the drive about to be started for securing Springfield's share of the $2,656,500, needed to build St. Luke's International Hospital in Tokyo. Mrs. Palmer is entering upon the task with an intelligent interest in the work and in the spirit of bringing it to a successful conclusion.

Bible Class.

Christ Church, Springfield, had its first session of the large rector's Bible Class on Quinquagesima Sunday.

Radio Church at Asheville.

A Radio Church called "The Twilight Hour of Peace", has been established at Asheville, N. C., Radio Station WWNC every Sunday afternoon at six o'clock. The service is for forty minutes and designed especially for the ill, depressed and shut-ins. The Rev. Clarence Stuart McClellan, Jr., rector of Calvary Episcopal Church, Fletcher, near Asheville, is the director and speak each Sunday in a "Quiet Talk", containing practical messages of cheer and good-will. The Rev. Dr. Leland Cook, of Asheville, is assisting the Rev. Mr. McClellan. Miss Blanche E. Loftain, a selected quartet and the leading soloists from Asheville and nearby churches are rendering the music. Mr. G. O. Shepherd, Station Director and Manager, is the announcer.

Radio Travel Talks

are being given each Sunday afternoon from Asheville Station WWNC at 5:30 o'clock by the Rev. Clarence Stuart McClellan, Jr., rector of nearby Calvary Episcopal Church at Fletcher. These talks last for one-half hour. They come from Rev. Mr. McClellan's recent experiences in Europe, Asia and Africa. He is now concluding his radio talks on "Egypt", and, during Lent and up until June 1, he will talk on "Palestine". Most favorable comments are being received at the Asheville Station from all parts of the nation regarding these Travel Talks and the Radio Church.

Memorial Windows Dedicated.

On Sunday morning, February 3, at eleven o'clock service, in St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa., five memorial stained glass windows were dedicated. The Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Alexander Mann, offered the dedication prayer, celebrated the Holy Communion, and preached the special sermon. He was assisted by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Dr. William Porkess. A special offering was taken, and devoted to St. Luke's International Hospital, Tokyo, Japan. It proved to be a very liberal one. These windows surround the Sanctuary, three above the Altar, one on the Epistle side, and the other on the Gospel. The theme represented is a sequential story—the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Presentation, Christ as the Light of Life, and lastly our Lord as the Bread of Life. Those memorialized, and the donors, are as follows: The late Rev. Joseph Speers, rector of the parish for thirteen years, given by parishioners and friends. Charles Garland, senior warden of the parish, covering a period of sixteen years, given by his wife, Mrs. Charles Garland. Laura Robinson Corrin, given by her husband, Mr. John B. Corrin, a former vestryman. Charles and Mary Alice Lamb, given by their son, Mr. Carl S. Lamb, now senior warden. John Porter and Sylvia Lloyd Hannan, given by their son, Mr. R. W. Hannan, now junior warden.

A Live Church.

The Annual Parish Meeting of Saint Andrew's Church, Jackson, for 1928 was perhaps the most largely attended and enthusiastic such meeting in its history. The Rector's Bible Class prepared a delightful oyster supper, to which the entire congregation was invited. This was the opportunity for the women of the parish to enjoy at least one church feast without any responsibility therefor, or any labor therein.

After the supper the parish meeting was called to order by the Rev. Walter B. Capers, D. D., rector of Saint An-

PARAPHRASE.
(From Isaiah 51 and 52.)

Gene Scott Wright.

Return, redeemed of the Lord,
And unto Zion singing come!
Eternal joy shall on you rest,
With gladness all your souls be blest,
And sorrow flee your home.

I, even I, will comfort you—
Forget not that your Maker lives.
Of no man shall you be afraid,
For sons of men as grass are made,
And God protection gives.

The Lord divides the roaring sea,
The earth's foundations planned—
The heavens stretched He in their place,
The while He hid man from His face
In the shadow of His hand.

Awake, Jerusalem, awake!
Thou hast the cup of trembling drained,
Down to the dregs—thy sons afar
And fainting lie—rebuked they are,
And none have Thee sustained.

But God will lift thee up once more,
That cup from thee remove;
Thy sons to thee He will restore—
They shall be His forevermore,
Supported by His love.

Awake, awake, O captive one,
And shake from thee the dust—
Loose from thy neck the slavish bands,
And cling to God's uplifting hands;
Forever in Him trust.

Return, redeemed of the Lord,
And unto Zion singing come!
His Son, His Son, so marred for thee,
Forever shall exalted be,
And now He calls thee home.

The Brotherhood.

One of the strangest and most interesting and most significant things about the earliest Christian history during the lifetime of Jesus and His immediate disciples was the way in which men and women of differing nations and of the most diverse types were brought together into a great fellowship in which mutual understanding and appreciation and love were very real and vital forces in every day experience. In one of the shortest and simplest of the New Testament books we have what must have seemed a most inexplicable picture to the people of that time of Paul the Pharisee, and Philemon the Gentile, and Onesimus the slave, insisting that the things which might have driven them apart were as nothing compared with the things which united them in a bond of understanding and love and the truest of good fellowship. "Behold, how these Christians love one another!" was the ejaculation forced from the lips of those who did not love them specially or were not greatly interested in them, but who were forced to see this thing about them was so outstanding and so full of meaning. No one can read these chapters of New Testament history without coming to the conclusion that the Christian spirit and the Christian principle of love are strong enough and vital enough and warm enough to bind together into a real unity the most diverse types of men.—Selected.

Our Marriage Customs.

Rev. Percy T. Fenn, D. D., New York.

Marrying, and giving in marriage, have been the experience of the human race from the beginning; and it will be so always.

But the various customs which accompany the average marriage, here and abroad, are not quite so antiquated. And they are full of interest. The ring, the veil, the wedding-gifts, the groomsman, the bridesmaids, the wedding cake, are mostly Roman; but some of these appurtenances of marriage antedate the Roman Empire.

The ring is said by some writers to be a relic of barbarism. It is supposed to date from the time when the wife was regarded simply as a piece of property in possession of the man. And the ring was a visible symbol of subjugation and slavery, signifying the band by which she was bound to her lord and master.

But although Tertullian speaks of the Roman husband "placing the pledge of the nuptial ring on one finger", it was not until the end of the sixth century that the Church adopted the wedding-the ring in these words: "Bless, O Lord, this ring which we bless in Thy Name, that she who wears it may abide in Thy peace, continue in Thy favor, live, go on, and grow old in Thy love, and may be increased with length of days; through Jesus Christ our Lord."

It was the ancient custom to place the ring on the thumb while saying, "In the Name of the Father", on the second finger while saying, "and of the Son", on the third finger while saying, "and of the Holy Ghost", and on the fourth at the "Amen".

Originally the ring was placed on the fourth finger of the right hand, but it was afterwards transferred to the left because the Bishops of the Church always wore their Episcopal ring on the right hand, and they wished to make this distinction. And an old rubric in the Sarum Office tells us that this finger is the ring finger because a vein runs from this finger to the heart. Those old rubric-makers probably knew more about theology than anatomy!

It sometimes happened that the groom was too poor to afford a ring for his bride, in which case—to meet such an emergency—the clergyman kept, and loaned, what was called a "lending-ring" for the temporary use of the bride. Sometimes this ring was carried off by the bride, and there is a story told of a careful priest who kept this ring in a drawer in the sanctuary of his church, and also tied it to hands of the drawer by a long piece of string, lest it should be taken away after having been used.

The modern symbolism of the ring—as having neither beginning nor ending—is that of constancy and eternity. It is supposed to speak, emphatically of permanence of the marriage bond.

In some instances, nowadays, there is what is called "the double ring ceremony". The wife gives a ring to her husband as well as the husband to the wife. But it always seem a cumbersome affair, and few of the clergy are disposed to encourage it as part of the marriage ceremony. It is certainly not provided for in the marriage service.

A clergyman in one of our big Western cities was confronted with this dilemma some time ago. He was asked to use the "double ring ceremony", and he didn't know how to do it. So he consulted with a neighboring parson. This parson is somewhat of a wag, and when he was asked the proper mode of procedure, he retorted: "Why, it is very simple. The groom puts his ring on the bride's finger, and the bride puts her ring into the groom's nose, and leads him round with it for the rest of his life."

Not only the ring was provided for impecunious grooms in the olden days, but Cardinal Gasquet tells us that some of the old parishes in England provided some of the ornaments of the bride. The Church wardens were required to provide the nuptial veil. In one parish the wardens possessed and guarded "one standing mazer to serve for brides at their wedding", and in another, a set of jewels was left in trust for the use of brides on their wedding day. Occasionally these singular possessions were loaned for a consideration, and the money used for parish expenses.

The marriage fee, which is supposed to form part of every ceremony—but is sometimes forgotten by the excited groom—is a survival of the far-distant time when a wife was bought for a sum of money. The fee is usually the special perquisite of the parson's wife, and to many a burdened helpmeet it comes as a little windfall.

The wearing of orange blossoms by the bride is a custom that originated with the Saracens, and was brought to the Western world by the Crusaders. It was used by the Saracens as an emblem of fruitfulness.

Men and the Kingdom.

The next great awakening in the Church must be among the laymen. There are signs that this awakening has already begun and that it is tending to express itself in three directions:

First. The men of the Church are greatly exercised in the realm of personal relations. This is no new thing, and in a sense has been a serious handicap for the Church throughout its history. It is so easy when we ourselves have come to certain conclusions with reference to personal conduct, self-righteously to endeavor to measure the conduct of all others by our own social yardstick. There has been no end of vituperation and hostile criticism of the conduct of others. The ministry has been particularly zealous in such personal denunciation. Right now we are in the midst of a campaign on a national scale of scandalous vilification.

However this tendency to function in the realm of personal morals, which has characterized the men of the Church and its ministry through all the Christian centuries, has real helpfulness inherent in it, provided it be undertaken on a truly personal basis. This means that one man should approach another as a brother and in tenderness and love privately endeavor to correct any moral delinquencies in his life and conduct. To undertake to effect personal reconstruction of moral conduct by public methods has never been highly productive of permanent results, either in reformation or in reclamation.

Second. The men of the Church are beginning, also, to function in the field of social relations. Men are beginning to feel that they are keepers of their brothermen and that they are responsible for Christian social conditions, whether these conditions obtain in the home, in the community life locally speaking, in industrial life, in political life, in the life of leisure and amusement, or in any other realm of human experience. There is no lack of evidence that the conscience of Christian men is being stirred in this day vehemently because of the wrongs and inequalities and injustices that infest our social order like an eating cancer. And these high-souled Christian laymen are determined to govern their social relations and the organizations that serve their social life in terms of the Christian gospel. We may truly rejoice in this determination. It promises great progress for the Kingdom.

In the third place, the men of the Church are adjusting themselves to the whole-hearted support of the enterprises of the Church on a budgetary basis. They are accustomed to giving every issue that arises in the conduct of their business its appropriate and proportionate support. They are not inclined to spend all of their capital on buildings and equipment, nor yet on overhead organization, not yet on an army of salesmen in the field, nor yet on raw materials. They know that every one of these items has a legitimate place in the conduct of a well-ordered enterprise, and they further know that no business can succeed which neglects any one of them.

These same men, when they have become truly concerned for the growth and progress of the Kingdom, may be depended upon to give due recognition on a budgetary basis to every enterprise of the Church and will not permit any item that is worthy of a place among the enterprises of the Church to suffer because of neglect or of inadequate support.

Here again there is no lack of evidence that the men of the Church are bestirring themselves in this direction. And so we find in practically all the denominations the beginnings of some kind of organization for the men of the Church, designed to enlist them enthusiastically in the effort to understand and to support all the enterprises of the denomination. Our Church in the South at the recent session of the Southern Christian Convention outlined a masterly program for the organization of the men of the Church for the conservation of their energy in the interests not only of the denomination, but also of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ.—Dr. W. A. Harper, in Herald of Gospel Liberty.

Reasons for Conduct.

"Don't you see that when you're naughty you worry Mother?" Mrs. Allen dropped wearily into a chair at the close of a rather troubled day and gave her son a reproving glance.

Billy put his arms around her neck and squeezed her tightly, but he said nothing.

"Are you going to promise to be good tomorrow so Mother won't be so tired?"

"Yes, Mother."

So Billy was undressed and tucked into bed with a goodnight kiss.

The next morning early, Mrs. Allen got a message that called her away from town for the day. Arrangements were made for Billy to stay with a relative. Billy was more obstreperous than he had been the day before; his mischief and stubbornness took him into many scrapes. The Auntie reported his conduct when Mother returned.

Mother took Billy aside and said, "You promised me that you would be good today."

"There wasn't anything to be good for, 'cause you went away," argued Billy.

A deplorable method of discipline, surely, yet regrettably common.

"Aren't you ashamed to have Mother see you pick a rose from the bush in the park?" I heard a mother say to her small daughter as they were strolling just ahead of me on one of the park trails.

Evidently the offense was not in doing wrong but in being caught. The child, thus reproved, could not help getting the idea that condemnation or disapproval come only from being seen doing the questionable thing. Why should such a little daughter hesitate to pull all the flowers she pleases if she ever finds herself in the park with Mother and park superintendent off duty?

"I'll tell Daddy that you slapped Sister," a neighbor called to her son who was playing in the sand pile with his baby sister, the latter at that minute crying loudly.

Now the chances are this small son will do his slapping hereafter when there is no one around who is apt to report to Father.

Such methods of training not only fail to establish right motives for conduct, but they actually create ideas of deception in the young mind. We must teach children to do right, not because doing wrong worries Mother, because the park superintendent might see that a rose has been picked, because Daddy will find out at night if Son has been naughty, but because right-doing brings satisfaction. We must set up righteous and fair ideals in the mind of the child. He will not play false to what is part of his own creed. He will be true to the decision of his own heart.—Edith L. Reid, in National Kindergarten.

DESERT PLACES.

There are desert places along the way
Where hunger and thirst and pain
Blot out the vision of all we have loved
And the heights we have hoped to gain.

There are empty years when the heart is cold
And the days are dull with care,
When we never dream of the victor's crown
But the cross that is always there.

Those empty years are the Master's years,
O child of the bitter cross,
The years He patiently teaches you
His measures of gain and loss.

Those desert places along the way
Are filled with altars of prayer,
With ladders set to the flaming sky
And angels of glory there,

Where the lamp of faith must light the way
Through the desert places dim
And turn our hearts from the sordid things
To the glories we share with Him.

—Frances M'Kinnon Morton.

MYSELF AND I.

One of me is at work today,
Chained to the office chair;
And the other self is out on the line
Where heroes do and dare.
Where heroes of faith and hope and love,
And not of spear and sword,
Struggle with sickness, despair and sin,
In the battle of the Lord.

The I that is here makes money;
And the money I make is me;
It is the price of the years of my life,
But my money makes me free;
For it, indeed, is the other self,
And I thrill in a world apart,
And the chains that bind to the office chair,
Are forged by the glow in my heart.

While carefully posting the ledgers here,
My hand strokes a fevered brow;
And the need of a fallen brother there,
Puts heart into here and now.
And the we of the North, the we of the South;
The we of the East and West;
The we that respond to the world wide call,
Are glory crowned—thrice blest.

The Right Motive in Prayer.

The Lord's exhortation to pray in secret is not an injunction against public praying. Otherwise the Bible would be contradictory. Secret prayer helps the soul. God hears us thus and rewards us. His condemnation of the Pharisees are not for praying in public, so much as for the motive, "to be seen of men". The Lord's teaching about giving is of the same import. We are not to give "to be seen of men", but with right motives it is right to let our examples help others to do their duty. Paul used the good giving of some churches to incite others to develop in the grace of giving. With deep humility a brother may pray in the presence of others. It is also true that thus they can give in the presence of others. If the "widow giving her mites" had given in absolute secrecy, where would have come in our Lord's beautiful commendation? Evidently others saw her gift besides our Lord.—Protestant Methodist.

DEI GRATIA.

Eugenie du Maurier Meredith.

Let nothing shake your faith
In truth and right. God rules.
Wrong-thinking is the wraith
That guides the acts of fools:

God made us all free-willed,
In thought, in word, and deed;
God made us conscience-filled,
To guard our every need:

Right thinking strengthens trust
In truth and all that's right;
God is in all things just;
His mercy crowns our light:

God cannot change His thought,
Lest all His laws be stirred;
With order He has fraught;
God will not change His word:

God planted a thought seed
That fills the whole wide world,
That every word and deed
Might be with truth uphurled.

For the Young Folks

FOR GOD.

I have a heart to give;
Lord, let it undivided be,
That for Thy glory I may live
And worship only Thee.

I have a life to lay
Upon the altar of Thy love;
Oh, may my soul from day to day
Thy power unending prove.

I have a temple pure,
An holy place that God hath made;
Oh, grant that aspiration sure
May find me unafraid.

I have a mind to reach
Beyond the highest heights of space.
Oh, may Thy voice my spirit teach
The wonders of Thy grace.

I have a treasure rare,
So generous is life to me;
Oh, give me love, dear Lord, to share
All that I have with thee.

I have a spirit bold
As willing as the wind, and free;
Oh, give courage, Lord, to hold
All that I am for thee.

The Indian at School.

"Mama," said little Belle one morning, "I do wish I didn't have to go to school today. Do I have to? I'm so afraid."

"Why, yes, of course you have to," replied her mother, taking down her bonnet and coat from a nail on the wall and helping her into them. "You have such a good teacher and she won't be here very long and I don't want you to miss any days you can help. You must be a brave little girl and always remember God will take care of you." Then she kissed her daughter and gave her her dinner pail.

Little Belle ran out and joined her brothers and sisters and some neighbor children who were wating for her in the yard.

As this pioneer mother watched the children trudge down the road her heart was heavy. She was almost as afraid of the Indians, who lived in the woods around, as the children were. But she had a brave heart and tried to hide her fear. This life in the unsettled West was certainly different from the beautiful farm home she had left in the East Even her nice furniture seemed to rebel at having to be used in a log house.

The children had but a short distance to go and were only a little while going to the school. It was a little one room log house with a big fireplace.

Instead of little chairs or seats like we have, the children sat on rude benches, made by nailing rough boards to logs which had been cut the right height. Several children sat side by side on these benches. The smaller children sat in front and the taller ones back of them.

About the middle of the forenoon the teacher gave the older children some lessons to study and heard the young ones say their "A-B-C's." Little Belle was saying her letters when the teacher happened to glance up. For a minute her face became deadly pale. A child watching her saw the change and turned around. Instantly he nudged the one next to him and he turned around. In no time at all, it seemed, all the children were looking around. The merry buzz had ceased and the room was deadly still. Little Belle felt cold all over, for there, his arms resting on the window sill stood a big Indian watching them.

The teacher quickly recovered her composure, and walking deliberately to the back of the room she invited the Indian in.

He was a big Indian, and with his face painted and feathers in his hair he certainly looked fierce to those helpless little children. Worst of all they did not know how many more might be hid outside.

But the teacher and all the children knew the best way to deal with an Indian was to be kind to him.

He gave a grunt of satisfaction.

"Right here is a vacant seat," she said, and little Belle found it hard work to keep from screaming as the teacher indicated the seat next to her. Small as she was, she knew she must show no fear before him, so she tried as hard as she could to sit still and watch her teacher.

Now this happened to be an unusually good teacher for those days. Glancing at the Indian she saw how tiny little Belle looked beside the big fellow. She saw something else, too. She saw the look of horror and fear in those little blue eyes, even though the little girl sat up straight and seemed to pay no attention to the visitor.

The teacher did not wish to let him know he worried them at all, so she said, "Maybe Big Brave like to look at pretty pictures in book. Belle, let Big Brave have your book, and you go over and sit by Jane and study from her book."

Little Belle handed the Indian her book. He took it with another grunt of satisfaction and began turning the pages to see the pictures.

The classes went on. The Indian was much interested though he did not show it.

After what seemed an age to teacher and puplis, the big Indian got up and made his way quitely out.

What a sigh of relief escaped the teacher as she saw him go away.

That night the children told their mother about it. "Belle was a brick," said Big Brother. "No one would ever think she was afraid."

Little Belle lived many years, but she never forgot the experience, nor did she ever forget the lesson that kindness wins; and many and dear were the friends she always had.—Selected.

The Help of a Kind Word.

The sure returns of a good, kind act are beautifully illustrated in the story of the Paris merchant, Julian Legrand. During a financial panic, when great firms were going under, he became alarmed for his own stability. He found that to carry him safely through the crisis it was necessary for him to have $100,000 in ready money. He tried in every way to borrow the sum, but absolutely failed, and was expecting any hour to meet disaster. At that juncture a fine-appearing man, a total stranger, called on him and quitely offered to let him have $100,000 for a year, on his personal note, and without interest.

The stranger explained that when he was a poor boy in school, shabbily dressed and timid this merchant was a member of the examining committee of visitors, and asked the questions of the boy's class. The lad blundered and stammered and expected that the children of rich and fortunate parents would have all the praise; but at the close the merchant singled out the poor boy, told him he had done very well, but could do better, that the way to honor was open to all, and that he could succeed if he would only push on. That little talk was the beginning of a prosperous career, and now he came to make some slight return for what had been the chief inspiration of his life.—Christian Sun.

MARCH.

Of all the months of all the year,
I like old March the best;
He's such a jolly gentleman—
He takes no time to rest.

He puffs and blows and takes my kite
And carries it up high,
Until it seems a tiny bird,
Far in the deep blue sky.

'Tis true he sometimes takes my hat,
And tosses it away;
But I don't care a fig for that,
'Tis only done in play.

What the Clock Knew

Paul, dear, will you take this hot soup to old Mrs. Barnes, please? She is ill again, you know, and has no one to make the things she ought to have."

"Oh, pshaw!" Paul stamped his feet. "I'm always carrying things over to that old lady. I want to build a house for my turtle. Why can't you take it this time?"

Paul's mother said nothing, but the smile left her eyes as she put on her coat and hat and went out with the soup.

After she had gone, Paul started to make the house for his turtle. Nothing went right and somehow he didn't seem to care as much about building it as he had. After several attempts, he curled up in the big chair before the old-fashioned stove in the kitchen, and felt very unhappy indeed.

The shining teakettle was singing merrily. Paul could see himself reflected in its fat sides. It was not a pleasant picture at all. The Paul in the teakettle was broader than he was long, and looked like a dwarf—an ugly one, too, with a frowning face. Suddenly the teakettle began to sing;

Did 'ia ev-er see
Such a n-augh-ty boy
He's papa's pride, and
He's ma-ma's joy.
But he wouldn't take
A pail of soup
To the poor old lady
Who has the croup!
S-h-a-m-e, S-h-a-m-e-, S-h-a-m-e,
Sh—Sh—Sh—.

Paul felt very uncomfortable and looked guiltily around to see if any one else had heard the teakettle's disgraceful song. Apparently the sink had, for one of the faucets replied:

Y-o-u said it, y-o-u said it.
Drip, drip, drip.

And the old clock on the wall added soberly:

Too-bad, so sad,
Tick, tick, tick.

Paul felt his face and ears growing red. He did wish the kitchen would attend to its own affairs, or talk about some one else for a change. But the teakettle continued:

Shouldn't you think
He'd like to go
On errands for those
Who love him so?
He's a sad-ly self-ish lit-tle boy!
S-h-a-m-e, S-h-a-m-e-, S-h-a-m-e,

The reflection of Paul in the kettle's fat side scowled and looked very angry.

But the hot-water faucet, not a bit frightened, piped up:

I've heard it said,
When he's a-bed
The fam-ly breathes
Quite freely.

The cold-water faucet answered:

Indeed-my dear
It's-very queer,
What makes-them-keep-him—really.

Paul, who was most unhappy, looked up at the old clock, hoping that it would say something to help him. It began:

'Tis love-you-know—

Paul, who was most unhappy, looked up, because just then some one kissed him lightly on the forehead:

"Why, Paul, you were sound asleep," said his mother.

"Oh, mother," he cried, jumping up. "I'm so sorry about that soup! Please forgive me."

"All right, dearie. You may set the table for dinner, just to show how sorry you are, if you like."

Paul did "like", and he made several trips to the stove while he was doing it, to look at the reflection in the old teakettle's fat sleek sides. The boy he saw there was smiling happily, and the hotwater faucet winked at the cold-water faucet, and whispered:

The clock—he knew
What love—can do,
Drip, drip, drip.

Spring on the Way.

It was in the early days of March and the snow lay thick and warm on the broad lap of earth. Far beneath the heavy white blanket and the surface of the ground there was a gentle little stirring about. No one would have dreamed that something was living and moving deep in the heart of Earth.

"Ho!" called Mother Earth, cheerily; "what means this bustle and rustle?"

"It is I!" piped a thin voice, as a white head thrust itself from a tiny black seed.

Then from all about other voices were raised.

"We are waking up, Mother Earth!" The sound came from a large white seed which had just the least bit of a break in its skin.

A striped gray and white seed burst wide open. "And we've had the finest sort of a nap!" cried a small body, peeping out.

"Do you know, my dears, that I am still covered with snow? I wonder if you wouldn't better cuddle down a little longer?" questioned Mother Earth.

"No! No! No! No!" came a chorous of replies in tiny voices. "We are tired lying in bed!"

"We are done sleeping!"

"It must be time to get up!"

"I can't stay in bed any longer!"

How eager all the seed folk were to be up and about!

You see they heard the springtime calling them; they felt the sunshine growing warmer and warmer each day, and in fancy they could hear the warm raindrops pattering over their heads.

The seed folk are never lazy—they never want to lie in bed when they know they should be up and doing the work which is theirs to do. Nobody can do it for them, and they do not want anybody to do their growing and blossoming. That is what God made them for; it is all they can do, and they love to do it with all their might!

"Very well, very well!" said Mother Earth. "It won't be so very long until the bluebirds will be calling for you, and the spring breezes teasing to play with you."

"O ho! O ho! Isn't that fine?" sang glad voices in the dark ground.

It did not seem dark to them, for they could see quite well and knew what to do next. After they had been given permission to get up, what a hustling and bustling there was! All the seed folk which had slept through the long winter were springing out of bed. And do you know what every one did the moment his feet touched the floor? He began to twist and squirm out oh his sleeping-jacket just as boys and girls do.

"I can't work in this warm coat," said one.

"My jacket is so stiff—I am going to slip out of it," cried another.

So every sleeping-jacket was throgn away and all the lively little seed chaps began to feel their way slowly upward, toward the light of the sun.

Mother Earth's great breast thrilled to the quite touch of her thousands of waking children. She smiled in her loving, thoughtful way.

"One thing is very sure," she remarked; "spring is on the way!—Daisy M. Moore, in Christian Guardian.

IN FAR JAPAN.

The boys and girls in far Japan
Live in a lovely land,
Their dress is queer, their talk I fear
You would not understand.

Small baby tied on sister's back
Goes out with her to play.
She tumbles down and hits his crown
Then loves the hurt away.

Now, boys and girls in every land
Though talk and dress and game
May differ, yet their little hearts
Are very much the same.

Through their good schools they're growing wise;
Their games will make them strong;
But without God they'll never know
The glad redemption song.

For they know not the love of God
Nor how our Saviour said:
"Let little children come to me:
My lambs you will have fed."

So, children, you who know so well
The love of God to man,
Should work and pray and send the news
To children in Japan.

Make these studies in the Care of God in its varied expression, by reading and comparing the marginal references found in the Bible opposite each verse. When time allows, read the complete Church Lesson, from which these portions (in plain type) are taken whenever they contained direct statements about the divine care. See pp. xiv and xv in the Book of Common Prayer.

Those inside say together:

;;Diddle, diddle dumpling, my son John
Went to bed with his stockings on.
One shoe off and one shoe on,
Diddle, diddle dumpling, my son John."

As they begin to say the rhyme, the one on the outside begins to hop around the circle.

At the word "off," the hopper must hop off the line into the circle, and at the word "on" he must hop on again with his other foot, and continue to hop on that foot until the rhyme is finished. If he suceeds, he may choose the one to take his place. If he fails, he must wait until all have tried before he may be chosen.

Some of the fun in this game comes from there being two "ons" in the rhyme. "My son John" must be careful not to pay any attention to the first one.

Make a circle large enough so that "my son John" will not become dizzy, or he might indeed have to go to bed.

Two children, or even one child by saying the rhyme for himself, can get a great deal of fun from this game.—Ex.

Courage.

Christian courage is one of the elements needed in church men and church women today. When wrong makes a flattering offer, we need courage to do right. When difficulties are many and the task seems quite hard, we need courage to press forward. When some who are expected to do well their part by our side show a waning of interest, we need enough courage to thoroughly equip our own hearts and to inject a good supply into our fellow workers. I am convinced that we need that quality of courage which will surprise those who see it in operation, and cause men and women of our day to declare that those who possess such courage have too been with personalities of these early Christians. I hear them as they pray, "Grant unto thy servants to speak Thy word with all boldness", and I read, "And when they had prayed, the place was shaken wherein they were gathered together". When these men had cheerfully made room for the presence and the work of the Holy Spirit, power was inseparably connected with their testimony.

When you and I make sufficient room for the presence and the work of the Holy Spirit in our lives, power will be strikingly in evidence in our testimony. When we stand before the class and teach, our pupils will want to be like the Christ whose presence they feel. When we sing hymns, anthems, quartettes, duets and solos, men and women will hear God speaking to their hearts. When we preach, people will weep over their sins, and noble men and women will reach out their hands for closer fellowship with God.

If we live up to our privileges, the stranger who visits in our church will inquire about the power of the Christian fellowship that he experiences, and we can reply "this is that" power of which Christ spoke. When a pupil speaks about the strength and the winsomeness of our teaching, we can explain "this is that" which Jesus promised. I give you now a conviction as deep as my heart has power to feel and as deep as my mind can discern. The matter to which our churches should give supreme concern is not more preaching but more power in the preaching we have; not more teaching but more of the Holy Spirit in our teaching; not greater improvement in our music, but more of the Holy Spirit in our singing; not more organization, but far more room for the power of the Spirit in our organization. And may we determine even now to make all the room for Him that He is willing to occupy, and then our testimony will be indeed the testimony of our Lord, and our influence will reach out to needy hearts everywhere.—Selected.

The Road to Jerusalem.

The character and circumstance with which God has endowed you may determine you to business, and the making of a fortune; to art, or science, or literature, or statesmanship; but whatever it is, a part opens out of it that leads to some Jerusalem.

The Jerusalem to which Christ so steadfastly set His face was a city in which the sacred and the secular met and mingled together. The temple on one hill nodded to the capitol on the other; the place of prayer stood in the shadow of the place of business; the altar of sacrifice was near the Academy of Learning. On His way to the cross He fed the hungry, healed the sick, took little children in His arms. He was not a recluse or a "religions". He walked the streets of Capernaum and talked with merchants in their offices, with farmers in their fields, and fishermen on the shore.—Selected.

"FROM GOD, FOR GOD, TO GOD"

A Definition of Life

By REV. KENSEY J. HAMMOND

"From God, for God, to God," is a definition of life. It includes in God which covers all three. He more than plans life for us. He is its Source, Object, and Final Purpose. We have been likened to "children playing with toys" while facing the great issues of life! Lent calls on us to drop the toys, even though they are harmless, and during forty days, ask: "Why am I here?" "What expects my great God of little me?" Recognize a Father's ownership in His child. Know His claim on your time and efforts. Depend on His grace to do His will. Oh! the pathos of the Lord's tears over Jerusalem ignorant of what belongs unto her peace"; of the Father's cry in Moses' day. 'Oh, that there were such an heart in them, that they would fear Me, and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children forever" (Deut. 2:29). Study Jesus Christ's Life story these few days from the Mount of Temptation to the Mount of Calvary. Welcome fellowship with Him now, which need never end hereafter. Lent is a season for prayer on your part, promoting this fellowship with God and man. Pray in His House. Pray in your homes. Pray for your family, friends, Bishop and Church. Pray for those you are trying to help toward God. Pray "for grace to feel your need of grace; for grace to receive it; and when given, for grace to use it." St. Paul said: "The life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me" (Gal. 2:20).

Lent is neither a local Institution nor a pious Anniversary. It brings opportunity and time for reviewing our Architect's life-plan for us. We find fellowship now in this business. By custom the demands of social life relax, and all expect these to do so. Our friends acknowledge the claim of Lenten opportunity. My valued friend, rector of Trinity, Wilmington, Delaware, is advising his congregation "that Lent is a period of rest from social turmoil over-crowding many months of every year:—a time for genuine religious exercise of a sort to help character and 'maintain good works'. It is a time when 'Jesus of Nazareth passeth by', anxious to touch our lives, ready with mercy, guidance, friendship in all our spiritual emergencies". As we inquire how accurately we are building, we can be sorry if we find cheap work. We can take out faulty pieces and put in perfect parts. We can ask the Architect about what we do not understand. We will find Him capable and sympathetic.

Meetings for worship and fellowship with Him are scheduled here at hours on days found most convenient in the past. Keep the schedule before you and days and hours free of engagement. Parents, bring your children on Tuesday afternoons. Are they not builders? Has our Architect no care for them? See that they know about Him. Welcome our visitors each Wednesday, and especially in Holy Week services. Reserve these dates as your "previous engagements". Know for yourself the happy experience of the Psalmist (77:13): "Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary!"

Religious reading becomes a help in guiding our Lenten thinking. The schedule enclosed in this Leaflet will guide your use of God's own Word in a brief daily portion I have carefully selected. Notice in how many ways God's care is manifested. We can find inspiration for devotion and service in the biographies of earnest Christians or in their writings. We can inform ourselves about our Church and her teachings and customs, that we may the better use Her privileges. I will be glad to loan such books to those who ask for them from my library: and to recommend inexpensive books on these subjects to those who wish to own and keep their own copies after reading them. "He that walketh with wise men will be wise" (Prov. 13:20).

"Evangelize or fossilize" is no new warning. The General Convention in October struck this keynote for all our Dioceses, and so for all our parishes. St. Mark's is one. Lent brings special opportunity. Friendship means influence, God-given, over individuals to be sought and won to Christ by example and tactful words. The fisherman's passion and hunter's sportsmanship may both be indulged for souls. The hearts of our friends become our hunting grounds. In how small a church that Christian lives who keeps his religion to himself. His horizon daily grows smaller. When the Master prepared His Feast, He sent forth His servants to call them that were bidden (Matt. 22:3). The servants obeyed. You practice in secular and social duties till you become experienced in each. Practice in speaking for Christ will bring experience, and success after prayerful effort. This Christian duty is ever-present, but the present is a good time to begin to call those the Master bids, even from "the highways".—St. Mark's Parish Leaflet.

"A wise man built his house upon a rock--- and the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock."

Like rock house foundations, the essential quality of rock for monuments is durability. Other important qualities are beauty, legibility of inscriptions and adaptability to design. Granite is the only stone that fills these requirements, and many granites do not possess all these qualities.

Winnsboro Granite

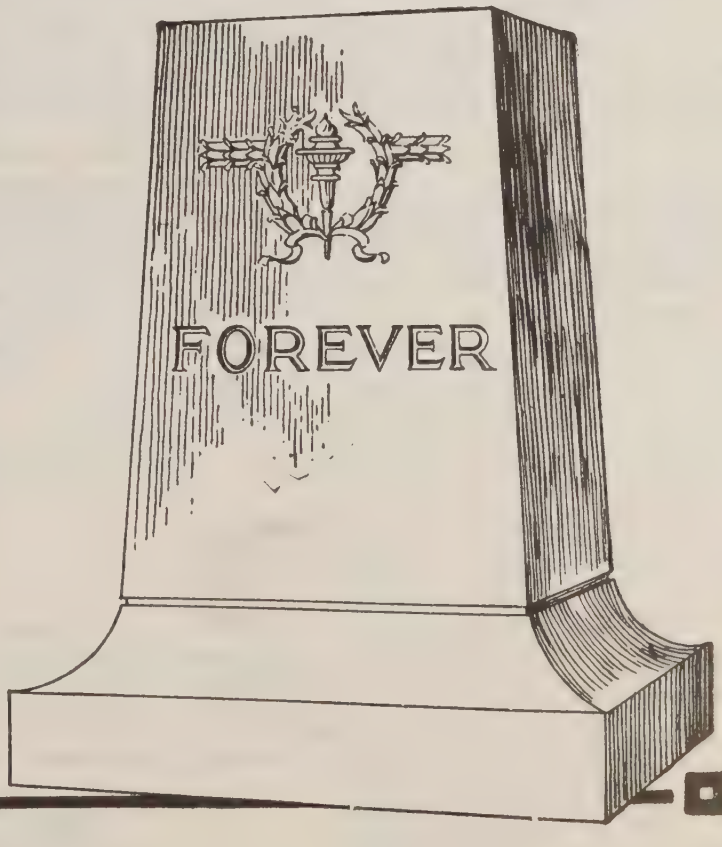
is a true granite, as pure a granite as is known. It possesses all of the above essential qualities for the ideal memorial, and it contains less deleterious ingredients—iron, lime, water—than other granites It is, therefore, the most durable.



Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument your purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B. H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below.

Deaths

MEADE: Entered into life eternal, on Sunday, February 3, 1929, at her home in Charlottesville, Va., MARY NELSON MEADE, daughter of Rev. R. K. Meade and Elisabeth Brown Meade.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

CHEW: On Monday, February 18, 1929, ELIZABETH CLAGGETT CHEW, daughter of the late Sophia Genevieve Claggett and the Rev. John H. Chew. Funeral services at St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church, Third and A Streets, Southeast, Washington, D. C., on Wednesday afternoon, February 20, at 2 o'clock. Interment private.

MRS. ELOISE MORGAN SHEPPARD.

Entered into rest, Monday, February 18, 1929, at the residence of her son in Wilmington, N. C., ELOISE CASTLEMAN MORGAN, the widow of the late George C. Shepherd, and the daughter of Colonel Benjamin and Martha Anne Castleman Morgan, of "Hill and Dale", near Berryville, Va., in the seventy-ninth year of her age. She is survived by the following children: Leslie Shepherd, of Dallas, Texas; George C. Shepherd, Jr., of Louisiana; Massie H. Shepherd, of Columbia, S. C.; Rice Shepherd, of Portsmouth, Ohio, and Ellis Shepherd, of Wilmington, N. C. One sister, Mrs. E. M. Van Deventer, of Berryville, Va. Funeral services were held in Grace Episcopal Church, Berryville, Thursday afternoon, February 21.

FRANCIS HENRY BRITTON.

After a few hours' illness, FRANCIS HENRY BRITTON, entered eternal life at the Hopewell Hospital early Wednesday morning, January 30, 1929, in the sixty-second year of his age.

At a meeting of the vestry of St. John's Church, City Point, the following resolutions were adopted:

First: That in the passing of Frank Britton, our Junior Warden, we have been deprived of a genial and an earnest coworker, and St. John's Church has lost a faithful member and officer. Reared in the Church, as were his fathers before him, he was one of her most devoted and loyal sons. Like the Psalmist of old, he was glad when they said unto him, "We will go into the House of the Lord". The congregation of St. John's will miss his cordial greetings at the church's door at every service, and Brandon and old Merchant's Hope Churches, his frequent pilgrimages to his former spiritual homes. His friends everywhere will miss him. Life was a joy to him, and he made it a joy to others by his smiles and good cheer and thoughtful acts of service.

Second: That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting, that they be published in The Southern Churchman, and in the Hopewell and Petersburg papers, and that a copy of them be sent to his bereaved widow, to whom we extend our deepest sympathy.

A. S. J. WHEELER, Registrar.

HENRY BURGOYNE MEAD.

HENRY BURGOYNE MEAD, oldest son of the late Edward C. and Emily Burgoyne Mead, of Keswick, Va., died at the home of his sister, Mrs. B. M. Jones, Asheville, N. C., on February 7, 1929, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. For many years he was a resident of Newark, N. J., where he was married in 1901 to Mrs. Catherine Chambers, of that city, who died several years ago. Mr. Mead leaves the following brothers and sisters: Mrs. F. R. Hewitt and Mrs. B. M. Jones, of Asheville, N. C.; Miss Mary Mead, of Roanoke; Rev. G. Otis Mead, of Alta Vista, Va.; William Z. Mead, of Baltimore, Md., and Ernest C. Mead of Richmond, Va. The funeral services were held at Grace Church, Cismont, Va., February 9, 1929, the Rev. Leslie Robinson, officiating.

drew's Church, and the Bishop of the Diocese, Bishop Bratton, led the devotions.

The reports of the organizations were presented and exhibited many evidences of material growth. The amount pledged by Saint Andrew's Parish to the Nation-Wide Campaign was $3,550 and the Treasurer's report showed $4,393.50 paid. Therefore, the parish overpaid its apportionment by $843.50.

Dr. Capers has been rector of Saint Andrew's Church for nine and a half years, during which time the number of communicants has more than doubled, and the parish's resources and gifts have more than trebled. The growth of the parish has made the work very exacting of the rector's time, and he has curtailed his extra parochial Lenten appointments. Last Lent Dr. Capers was one of the speakers at Saint Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, and has accepted similar appointments for this Lent.

Dr. Capers was special preacher at the

More than that, it is a sharp though constructive criticism of religious and educational systems. Dr. Raven is not at all satisfied with the nurture he got as a boy. Parents, teachers, and all who are concerned with the high task of introducing boys and girls to Jesus will find wholesome counsel here.

The GENERAL CHURCH PROGRAM

This is the title of a book published by the National Council of the Episcopal Church. It is not a catchy title. It is not calculated to aid book store sales. It is simply a label for a book that is packed with information that every Churchman needs.

In terse phrase, condensed style, compact form, it brings a vivid picture of what this Church is doing, and where, and how and what it all costs.

It will be read first, because it is intrinsically interesting and readable; then it will be studied because of its down-to-date facts about fields far and near; finally it will become a valued reference book, to be used for the answering of questions and disposing of difficulties as they arise from time to time.

At Washington a clergyman said: "It's the World Almanac of the Church." It is that, and more.

First issued at General Convention. Revised following the Convention. Figures throughout the book are those adopted officially by the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies.

Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, Bishop.

Editor.

The Rev. H. D. Bull has been appointed Editor and Manager of "The Diocese", the organ of the Diocese of South Carolina and all communications for the paper should be addressed to him at Georgetown, S. C.

Personal Notes

The Rev. H. M. Rutledge, of St. Mark's Church, Diocese of Erie, Erie, Pa., has accepted a call to St. Clement's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., to become effective the first Sunday after Easter. His new address will be 167 Hanover Street, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Miss Sallie K. Bowen, who has been the Matron of Leonard Hall, almost from its inception, has also resigned, and with her sister will make her home in Philadelphia after Easter. She has done a very good piece of work, and her resignation has caused much regret.

Dean and Mrs. E. G. N. Holmes, of Trinity Church, Carbondale, Pa., have been offered the position of Warden and Matron of Leonard Hall, Bethlehem, Pa., by the Bishop. The Dean has accepted the position and will take up his new work soon after Easter.

The Rev. Arthur T. Reasoner, who was Warden of Leonard Hall, Bethlehem, Pa., the Bishop School for Postulants, has resigned to take effect after Easter. Mr. Reasoner has not been in good health for some time, and will seek a good rest in Michigan before accepting any other work.

THE DUBOSE MEMORIAL CHURCH TRAINING SCHOOL

MONTEAGLE, TENNESSEE

Editor of The Southern Churchman:

I know you and your readers are interested in America, and wish to see our common country take a leading place among the nations of the world. You wish to abolish war and crime, which law has never been able to do. "Law can only stay the assassin's hand until civilization has done its work." Above all, you wish to see our Lord's prayer come true—"Thy Kingdom come on earth as it is in heaven." How can this be done? is the question uppermost in your mind. Only by producing religious leadership, especially for our rural population. The history of the world unquestionably shows the necessity of producing religious leaders.

The DuBose School is the only school of the kind in America, and is intended to train men especially for rural work—men who have already had experience in business and who need a special training. There is no place in our colleges and seminaries for men of this type, and our bishops all over America have recommended the work of the School, as shown by their sending men to us to be trained. We have always had more applicants than we could provide for, on account of our limited means. We have no indebtedness, but each year we have to limit our student body and refuse many applicants. Our friends have been good to us, but it does not seem quite fair for a few to carry such a burden, and we have been unable to see the justice in employing a professional agency to promote a campaign; it is too expensive, and we do not feel justified in putting a heavier burden on those who wish us well and are willing to help. So we are taking this means of securing the necessary amount to give the School the chance to serve the country and Church. This amount will not make the School luxurious—that would destroy the ideal of the School, but it will simply give us the bare necessities. All of our men are required to do manual labor on our farm, and all the caring-for of the buildings, so our expense is not as great as other schools and seminaries. All the men have to do mission work under the direction of the chaplain. We also have a good hospital.

How are we to do this work without your help, and how can we get you the information except by letter? Traveling is very expensive and requires a great deal of time, which might be otherwise used in training the men. Any amount you may feel disposed to give will be gratefully received, from one dollar up. To do this work the School must have $500,000.00.

Thanking you for any kindness you may show us, I remain,

Yours faithfully,

W. S. CLAIBORNE.

Checks can be sent to Rev. W. S. Claiborne, Monteagle, Tenn.

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 9, 1929. No. 10.

THE SOUL THAT GROWS

The Bible speaks out of the experience of yesterday to the needs of to-day, and the longings of to-morrow. And the reason for its perennial freshness is that the themes with which it deals, and the impulses it aims to kindle, are the same in every time in every clime. IT IS THE GREAT STOREHOUSE OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, THE INEXHAUSTIBLE RESERVOIR OF RELIGIOUS ASPIRATION. It is to the individual a progressive revelation, depending upon the growth of the man's soul; ALWAYS FOR THE SEED OF TRUTH THERE MUST BE THE SOIL OF FAITH AND LOVE. Commonly the truth is revealed, not in a flash, but in the friction through the years of opposing half-truths. WHEREVER THERE IS A DOUBLE ALLEGIANCE, PART FOR GOD AND PART FOR SELF, THE VISION OF TRUTH WILL BE BLURRED; WHEREVER THERE IS CHERISHED PREJUDICE, THERE WILL BE NARROWNESS OF VIEW AND FALSE EMPHASIS; WHERE BUT ONE PHASE OF TRUTH IS SEEN, THE SENSE OF PROPORTION WILL BE LOST. BUT WHERE THERE IS A DOCILE MIND, A HUMBLE SPIRIT, A SURRENDERED WILL, A LIFE RESPONSIVE TO THE LESSONS OF HISTORY, THERE WILL BE AN INCREASING GROWTH IN ALL THAT IS VITAL TO THE SOUL. The great word of the Master to the man who is seeking direction is this, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."—Montreal Star.

"Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

The New Africa in My Parish

How to Study Africa: Suggestions for Individual and Group Study and Parish Activities

"This booklet is the result of an experiment in self-education about Africa carried on by a typical group of adults. It is practical, suggestive, varied. One cannot read it without wishing to associate himself with such a group or to begin by himself to read and think about the problems confronting Africa and the relation of the Church to these problems. This book is invaluable as a help to the study of Africa, as well as an illustration of the various methods of adult education."—MARGARET I. MARSTON, Educational Secretary Woman's Auxiliary.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The Church's best ornament may be rags in the pews.

It is worth while going through a lot of dust to get one diamond.

Understood aright the laws of God are not restrictions, but protections.

"If you are a real lighthouse you do not need a whistle."

"Faith" appropriates the things that all the money in the world is impotent to purchase.—Rev. Wm. Porkess, D. D.

Man is not a candle that burns out, but a lamp that God refills.

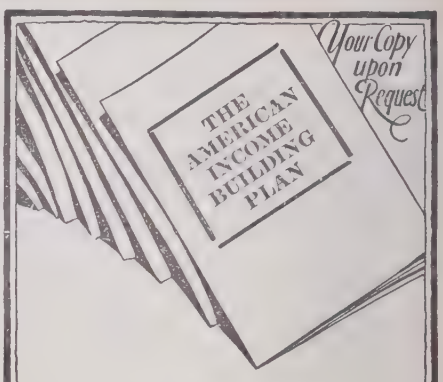
The Christian life must be either expressed or repressed.

"The foundation truth of Christianity is the infinite worth of man."

All human need appealed to Jesus and challenged Him to help. This is our call to service today also. What is the need of the world? Can we help? —Christian Sun.

God speaks—the sunflashes into light.
God smiles—and flowers the fields adorn.
God breathes—and fragrance fills the air.
God loves—and human souls are born.

The Christian life is made up of little things. As letters make words, and words chapters, and chapters books, so our lives are made up after all of small letters—litle acts, little sins overcome.



The only way to learn to do great things is to do small things well, patiently, loyally.—David Starr Jordan.

Evil always relaxes the fiber of character. It weakens and disintegrates wherever it touches. In the individual, in society, in the nation, wrongdoing is weakness, and righteousness is strength. This is a rule with no exceptions, and with no possible evasion. —The Presbyterian of the South.

The Apostle Paul in a certain place urges the use of singing as one of the inspiring helps in the spiritual life. He counsels his readers not to seek their stimulus through the body, but through the spirit, not by the quickening of the flesh, but by the exactation of the soul. —Selected.

"Nothing is easier than to complain, yet in almost every community are to be found some who have a conspicuous genius for complaining. We have heard of no one, however, who would take the prize for this over a woman whose pastor asked after her health, to which she replied dolefully, "I feel very well, but I always feel bad when I feel well because I know I am going to feel worse afterwards."

There is no surer way to help others than to pray for them. Such prayer must be real, personal, and constant. Most of our prayers are horribly selfish. We should be startled if we studied our prayers critically.—Floyd W. Tomkins.

LESSONS FOR LENT FROM THE CENSUS

Perhaps the most scathing denunciation ever expressed in a few words is the description in the Letters of Junius of a British politician as "infamous and contented". The next few years may tell whether the Protestant Episcopal Church in America shall deserve to be described as opulent, indolent, stagnant, decadent and content. It represents, probably, more material wealth and social and commercial power than any other religious body in the world and intellectual strength and equipment far beyond its numerical proportion of the total population. It lags woefully in spiritual influence and progress. Its proportion of membership to that of all religious bodies in the country is deplorably small and grows slowly or not at all. It is organized as the finest and freest of all democracies. Far too many of its members shirk shamefully the responsibilities and reject the privileges of democracy, leave the burdens, labor and honors of battle to the bishops, priests and deacons, force the Church to become a kind of autocracy in leadership and an ecclesiastical aristocracy. Most congregations are afflicted with members who by conduct and bearing appear to regard the Church as a very exclusive social club. In far too many parishes even wardens and vestrymen seem to consider that they have done their full duty when they have provided for operating costs and privately interchanged criticisms of the rector and the bishop, on whom they impose all the authority and work involved in effort to save human souls and extend the kingdom of God that His will be done on earth as in Heaven.

These unpleasant and unpleasantly indisputable truths make good material for Lenten meditations and self-searching among the laity. The forty days of fasting in the wilderness the season commemorates culminated in supreme and insidious temptation superbly repelled. Each day now brings its temptation to bow down and worship ourselves, to yield abjectly to our own shrinking from sacrifices of inclination, our selfish yearning for spiritual idleness and for neglect of distinct duty. We seek what we may hope to reach of the glory and ease of the world, shun continually memory and performance of the baptismal vow to fight manfully under Christ's banner.

Last week The Southern Churchman published figures of the membership of our Church in proportion to the population of continental United States from 1830 to 1890. These showed that from 1830 to 1840, ten years, the proportionate gain was 108, from one Episcopalian to each 416 population to one in 308. From 1840 to 1890, fifty years, the proportionate gain was 185. In those fifty years the Church crept along, gaining, in membership in proportion to population, less than four to the year. From 1890 to 1920 it was worse. In 1890 one person in every 123 inhabitants was an Episcopalian, nominal or actual. In 1920 one person in 93½ was an Episcopalian, the gain having averaged less than one to the year.

Official figures from Church sources, given in the annual of the Living Church, say the number of communicants increased from 1916 to 1928, 12 years, thus:

1928	1,241,828
1916	1,092,821
	149,007

That is increase of something more than 12,400 a year, less than one per cent. Statistics in detail for the other religious bodies, numbering more than 200, would be tedious. Those listed in the special United States census for 1926 show, summarized, that in the ten years from 1916 to 1926 the Protestant Christian bodies, other than Episcopalian, gained 37½ per cent, while the Episcopalians in twelve years gained 13½ per cent. This notwithstanding the fact that some of the minor Protestant bodies lost seriously, both in membership and number of churches. Among these was the Reformed Episcopal Church, now more than fifty years old, which shrank from 11,000 to 8,600 in members and from 74 churches to 69. Of the nine branches of the Presbyterian Church five, most of which are little known beyond their own ranks, show serious losses both in membership and number of church buildings. The three most important branches—the Presbyterian Church in the United States, Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the United Presbyterian Church of America—gained in the ten years from 1916 to 1926 372,332, from 2,144,600 to 2,516,644, a little over 17 per cent. The Cumberland Presbyterian Church and Colored Cumberland Presbyterians lost in the ten years 6,000 of their combined membership of 85,000 and the white branch lost 200 of its 1,313 churches, although the Colored branch, while losing over 2,000 members, gained 38 churches, reporting 78 in 1926. The sturdy little Associate Reformed, "Seceder", branch, gained over 5,000 members, 33 per cent, and ten churches, reporting 143 churches and 20,410 members.

The Baptists have 23 branches, some of them queerly named—"Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predestinarian Baptists," 679 members in 1916 and 304 in 1926; "Duck River and Kindred Association Baptists," 7,340 in 1916, a gain of 452; "General Six Principle Baptists," 456 members in 1916, and 293 in 1926. There are, also, "Free Will", "General", "Separate", "Seventh Day", "United" and "Old German Baptist Brethren". The three principal bodies are the Northern Convention, Southern Convention and Negro Baptists. The Northern branch has made little progress, having increased in the ten years from 1,244,705 to 1,289,966, about 45,000, practically a negligible percentage. The Colored Baptists have been likewise sluggish, their gain having brought their membership for 1926 to 3,196,623, but 258,000 ahead of 1916. The Southern Baptists have moved faster. They show, for 1926, membership of 3,524,378, an increase of 20 per cent.

In this connection, it is to be noted that the white Primitive, "Foot Washing", Baptists, most fundamental of Fundamentalists, gained in the ten years almost exactly 1,000, reporting in 1926 membership of 81,374, and that the Colored Primitives reported the greatest proportionate gain of any denomination or branch in the list, from 15,000 members in 1916 to 44,000 in 1926, nearly 200 per cent. They show corresponding increase in number of churches, from 336 to 925.

It is a distinct, unquestionable reproach to the white Americans of old Protestant American stock that the largest proportionate gains in membership of churches are in denominations composed of foreign born or immediate foreign descent and of Negroes. The great Methodist Episcopal Church, for instance, greatest of all Protestant denominations in numerical strength, reports growth in its white branches slow compared with that of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, nearly 200 per cent, and the Lutherans and Mennonites. These reports will be studied in detail in another article.

Regardless of what other Christian bodies in the country are doing, the question facing every Episcopalian this Lent is whether the Church is derelict or is doing its duty in helping to bring the kingdom of God, in leading the people hastening the purification and elevation of the citizenship of this great world dominating country, the reign on earth of peace and righteousness, fulfillment of the promise of universal good will and happiness and hope. The Church must go forward or sink backward to feebleness and decay. That is the law. Inertia is death. The one possible way to carry the Church onward is by the active zeal of individual members.

A clergyman of the Church whose work takes him in contact with many men and many kinds of men in all parts of this country, writes The Southern Churchman, under very recent date:

"It is my experience that lay people are more interested in Christianity today than ever before, but they are not enthusiastic about organized Christianity. They seem to see the weakness of organizations not only of the Church, but outside, and are chafing under it. One finds men willing to listen everywhere if they think you have anything to give them, and this is not confined to one class of people. I have never experienced men of large affairs so willing and anxious to talk with you as they are today, asking invariably very simple and practical questions. I do not find many laymen interested in controversy, especially like that of the New York type. So I am driven to the conclusion that Christian personality is the essential thing in making an appeal. The simple truth of the Church, backed by the Bible, is the approach. . . . . I have just been looking over the statistics of the Church in my home State and certainly they are not encouraging. With all the alibis we may present we have not answered the question why the Church has not made more progress in Virginia?"

The question is for the individual members of the Church to answer. It is a solemn question.

Suppose every member of the Church—every communicant—determined this Lent to select one person and strive by prayer, by patience and loving labor, careful example and instruction, to lead him, or her, to confirmation, to understanding of the teachings and absorption of the spirit of the Church, to realization of the sacrifice and life of the Saviour? From such determinations and sincere effort to succeed in them three results would be certain:

There would be such a revival in the soul of the Church and acceleration of its growth as never have been known.

Every rector would be thrilled with new sense of the glory of his calling and fired to greater and happier and more hopeful labor than ever before.

Every communicant striving to lead and lift a soul upward would experience an uplifting and cleansing and illumination of soul and heart brightening the most sombre life and surroundings, making this world and all its contacts beautiful, faith for the world to come sweet, calm, perfect.

Alfred B. Williams.

GOD hath also informed us, that He will require no more of men than the due improvement of the talents committed to them; that they who are left to the light of nature and conscience, and to the law of reason, shall be judged by the light of that conscience, and the law of that reasonable nature, under which His providence hath placed them. To His mercy we leave them; knowing that He is not severe to mark what is done amiss. He knoweth their ignorance, and weakness, and prejudices; and He will deal graciously with them for the sake of the great Intercessor, who is the propitiation for their sins as well as for ours.

Another question arises on this subject, respecting those who reject the mediation of Christ, when it is made known to them by the Gospel.. Men of this class are generally great advocates for natural religion, in opposition to the revelation of the Gospel. They seem to think they are left to their own liberty to choose either of them, as they shall think best; supposing they shall, if judged at all, be judged by that religion which they have chosen. But in truth, God hath left no man to this liberty, but requires all men to be of the true religion; that is, of the religion he shall direct, when it is made known to them. Reason and common sense must enable us to judge which is the true religion; but if we judge wrong, we do it at our own peril; for God requires and expects that we judge right. Interest, party prejudice, passion, appetite, love of the world, carelessness, must all be laid aside when this great business is before us. If they bias our judgment, we shall be in danger of a wrong determination; and if we determine wrong, we shall fall under the condemnation of God. The glad tidings of His Gospel have reached our ears, proclaiming atonement and pardon, and salvation through the Mediator, and calling us loudly to repentance and holiness, to faith and obedience. By it a future judgment is made known to us; and the standard by which that judgment is to proceed is declared to be the laws which the Gospel contains, so far as they have been promulgated. This Gospel is the law of our Master, the will of our Creator: If we reject it, we must abide the consequence; and the consequence will be the same punishment with theirs who would not have this man, Jesus Christ, to reign over them.

And, what mighty advantage shall we gain by rejecting the Gospel which makes known the propitiation of Christ, and retiring to the gloom of natural religion; an ideal religion much talked of, but not known; delineated by some; but having no original from which to draw, imagination guided the pencil and fancy ornamented the pictures with some strokes from divine revelation.

But suppose natural religion to be, as they who have painted her the fairest, have represented her. She knows of no Mediator, nor Intercessor. She knows of no propitiation for sin. She has no encouragement to repentance, because she has no promise to God on which to build her hopes of mercy; but leaves her votaries exposed, for every transgression, to His justice, who is "of purer eyes than to behold evil", and who will not let the wicked go unpunished. To the mercy of God there can be no appeal; for without atonement, the punishment, not the forgiveness of offenders, must support the authority of His government, and give efficacy to His laws. Unsinning obedience is therefore the only condition of the religion of nature. Where this condition is fulfilled, there is no need of atonement. Where it is not fulfilled, an atonement must be accepted, or condemnation must ensue.

But as bad as this pretended religion of nature is, which the advocates for human reason are so anxious to establish as their rule of life, apparently because under it they can live as they please, it is not so bad as having no religion at all. Should there be any such persons, who, "born like the wild ass's colt", wish to live like them, and like them to die and be no more; let them know that for this very thing "God will bring them into judgment". There is one in heaven "higher than they, higher than the highest, who regardeth" all their actions. "The Lord hath prepared His throne in the heavens, and His kingdom ruleth over all". His eyes are in every place, beholding the evil and the good." Neither darkness nor the grave can screen from His power. "He hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom He hath ordained," and whom, "He hath raised from the dead", who is now the Mediator between God and man, the propitiation for the sins of the world, and our Advocate in heaven. Then will "He bring to light the hidden things of darkness and make manifest the counsels of the hearts" of all men. Therefore He "commandeth all men everywhere to repent". "Consider this, ye that forget God, lest He tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver". For He will "pour out His wrath upon them that have not known Him, nor called upon His name". Repent, therefore, "while it is called today, lest you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin"; for "behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation". When this life is ended the time of retribution will come; and "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God". "Kiss the Son," therefore—pay your homage and adoration to Him who is Messiah, Christ, the Son of God, the Mediator, the Redeemer, the Saviour of men—"lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way: when His wrath is kindled but a little; blessed are all they who put their trust in Him".

Dreadful, also, is their state, who "hold the truth in unrighteousness; "who believe the mediation and atonement of Christ, and live wickedly. Heavy will be their condemnation, when God shall judge the world. If He spared not His own Son when He became our Substitute, but gave Him up to the bitterest sufferings; how shall the impenitent sinner escape, who would not be reclaimed by all that Christ hath done for him? To those who believe the Gospel, the kingdom of God is come, to deliver them from the kingdom and tyranny of satan. But if entering into this kingdom, they refuse to be governed by its laws, and still keep themselves in bondage to the adversary by doing His work; the judgment of God will be to them a consuming fire.

To those who believe the Gospel, and rejoice in the glad tidings of salvation through the propitiation of Christ; who strive to adorn the doctrine of their Lord and Saviour in all things, living in the constant exercise of penitence and faith, and in the observance of all the commandi and institutions of God, with an upright heart; I have only to observe, that it is by "patient continuance in well-doing"; by holding "fast their confidence" in their Redeemer, and "their rejoicing in the hope" of the glory of God, that they must enter into the heavenly rest of eternal life. Let them remember, that their High Priest, who is now in heaven making intercession for them, "was", in this world, "tempted as they are". He knows, therefore, how to pity and succor them in all temptations and adversities. In all their difficulties then, "let them come boldly unto the throne of grace, that they may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need".—Selected.

FOURTH SUNDAY IN LENT

Berkeley Minor

COLLECT.

Grant, we beseech Thee, Almighty God, that we, who for our evil deeds do worthily deserve to be punished, by the comfort of Thy grace may mercifully be relieved; through our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

THIS Sunday is often called "Refection" or "Refreshment" Sunday from the Gospel in which St. John describes the feeding of the five thousand with the "five barley loaves and two small fishes". This Sunday is also called Mid-Lent, because it is the Sunday nearest the middle of the forty-six days (including Sundays) that make up the season between Ash Wednesday and Easter Sunday. "It has little of the austere character of the other Sundays in Lent," says Bishop Coxe; "so in the collect we pray for refreshment."

We are seeking comfort from the great Comforter, of whom our Saviour said: "It is expedient for you that I go away; for, if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send Him unto you" (John 16:7). Of what priceless value is such a Comforter, if we gain by such an exchange?

And millions since have found our Saviour's words true; that this Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, guides them into all truth, all that we need in this eon (John 16:13), and gives them the peace of God, which passeth all understanding (Phil. 4:7), keeping their hearts and minds through Christ Jesus. In this petition of the collect for "the comfort of Thy grace", we should bear in mind that we may, and should, freely ask it in the small worries and cares, as well as the large griefs and troubles of life. Many of our small troubles are too trifling to be taken for comfort to our nearest and dearest ones of earth; but 'tis not so with God the Holy Ghost, "who sanctifieth us and all the people of God". He urges us to bring all our cares to Him, both great and small.

And best of all, though at times this seems hard, He will give us what we really need, and is best for us; not just what we think best, and ask for; as we are taught by the prayer of the Man, Christ Jesus, in the Garden: "Not my Will, but Thine be done" (Luke 22:42).

THE Epistle for the Fourth Sunday in Lent is Gal. 4:21-31. This Epistle teaches us, by an allegory the true relation of Christianity to Judaism. An allegory is a description of one thing under an image of another. One of the most celebrated allegories is Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress". Here the life of a Christian is described under the image of a traveller from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City. In the allegory of the Epistle the relation of the Jewish Church to the Christian Church is described under the image of the relation between Hager and her son, Ishmael, and Sarah and her son, Isaac. Hager, the bondwoman, and her son, Ishmael, typify the Jewish Church, the Jerusalem which then was, in the bondage of the law; Sarah, the freewoman, and her son, Isaac, typify the Church of Christ, the Jerusalem above, "the mother of us all" (the Christians), who are free from the bondage under which the Jews are burdened. St. Paul goes on to say in the Epistle: "We (Christians), brethren, are the children of promise, as Isaac was the child of promise to Abraham and Sarah". The earthly Canaan was promised to Abraham's descendants through Isaac and Jacob; and so to us Christians is promised the heavenly Canaan. All the Israelites of the generation of Moses and Aaron fell in the wilderness, except Caleb and Joshua, and on account of their unbelief in God's promises, failed to reach the earthly Canaan. Nothing can keep us from reaching the heavenly Canaan, Jerusalem above, but the same sin of unbelief. It is well to notice how clearly it is taught in the story of Israel that this sin of unbelief was the crowning sin above all others. The people had sinned often and much since they had left Egypt, less than two years before, and had been severely punished, yet had been allowed to go on toward Canaan; for their faith in God's promise had never wholly failed. There is the idolatry of the golden calf, a grievous sin, but they were not forbidden the Promised Land for that, though severely punished. But at Kadesh is the fatal fault committed: the people utterly cast aside God's promise, and rebelled against Moses and Aaron, saying: "Let us make a Captain, and let us return into Egypt" (Num. 14:4); and when Joshua and Caleb, the two faithful spies, rend their clothes and beg their brethren to press on, saying: "The Lord will bring us into this land, and give it us"; "all the congregations bade stone them with stones." Surely no sin is so offensive in God's sight as unbelief; for, as St. John says (1 John 5:10): "He that believeth not God, hath made Him a liar." We may refuse to believe a mere man, however wise and good, and without just offence on his part; for such a one may be mistaken; but our Father in heaven cannot be mistaken; so, if we refuse to believe Him, we make Him a liar, the most opprobrious term we could possibly use. It dethrones God, ranking Him with Satan, the father of lies.

If doubts arise in our hearts, we should pray most earnestly the prayer of the poor father of the lunatic son, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief" (Mark 9:24).

The Epistle concludes with the striking words: "So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free." . . . What constitutes this freedom, and this bondage is most clearly set forth by Jesus Himself in St. John 8: "Then said Jesus to those Jews, which had believed Him, If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. . . . Verily, verily, I say unto you, Every one that committeth sin is the bondservant of sin, and the bondservant abideth not in the house forever. If therefore the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

THE Gospel for this Fourth Sunday in Lent is St. John 6:1-14. It is the only miracle recorded by all four Evangelists, and for this reason probably has been twice taken by the Church as the Gospel for the Day. Our Gospel says: "The Passover, a feast of the Jews, was nigh," the third in our Lord's ministry (which He did not attend). This feast, gathering Jews from all parts of the world, accounts for the great multitude that followed Him there near Bethsaida. Jesus spent that day in healing and teaching. And it was evening, and the day far spent, when His disciples asked Him to send the multitude away to go to the villages, and buy themselves victuals; for there was nothing there for them to eat. Observe here how Jesus, as always, uses His miraculous power only so far as to supply what is necessary, what man cannot supply. He does not give these poor hungry people a luxurious banquet, as He could have done just as easily as feed them with barley bread and fish. That was not needed. These were plain people (for it was to such, the poor, that the Gospel was preached chiefly), used to such plain food; they were hungry, too, with good appetites for such simple food. Freedom from show and perfect simplicity mark all of our Lord's actions.

THE REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMISSION ON DIVORCE TO THE GENERAL CONVENTION, 1928

A Critical Examination by the Editorial Committee of the Sanctity of Marriage Association.

IT is neither an agreeable nor an easy task to criticise this report. But no matter how faithfully, according to their lights, the members have done their work, they cannot complain if it is subjected to close and honest scrutiny.

As few will take the trouble to read this confessedly "well-nigh overwhelming study", buried in the Journal of the Convention of 1928, it may help a little to understand its character by printing the headings which accompany the very varied list of subjects, as follows:

> Two Proposed Remedies; City versus Rural Conditions; Lack of Children; Lack of Firm Stand by Church; Financial Tension; Sex Tension; Emotional Life Fundamental; Divorce Primarily a Class Problem; Importance of Early Training; Good Advice to Adults Usually Futile; The Influence of Ideals; What Constitutes a Successful Marriage; The Work Done by the Director; Investigation by the Director; Questionnaire to the Clergy; Answers from our Own Clergy concerning Divorce among our own Church-going People; Divorce and Financial Conditions; Consultations with Clergy; Medical Certificates; Education for Marriage; Number of Divorces where Both Parties attend Church Regularly.
> Then follow "Reports from Other Denominations" (Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational, and Methodist), with comments thereon, largely the same as those in the preceding list, under the following additional heads:
>
> Number of Divorces in which both husband and wife were regular attendants; Number of Divorces in all five Communions when One Party only is Regular Attendant; The Family as the Chief Educational Institution; How Make Christ's Ideal Effective; Make Marriage Indissoluble; Allow Annulment; Careful Study of Canons Needed; Separation of Civil and Religious Ceremonies; Greater Freedom of Divorce; Responsibility of the Church for Character Training; Conclusion.
> Then follow five Appendices and a Bibliography.

1.—A Contrast to the Report of 1916.

The first thing that strikes one in this long report is the fact that no names are signed to it, as there were to the scholarly, constructive, and concise report of the Commission of Fifteen, made to the General Convention of 1916. That report, with only one dissident (strange to say a Bishop), recommended the omission of the false proviso of 1868, which, for the first time in the history of the Western Church, in the course of 1900 years, allows remarriage to the so-called "innocent" party.

A second marked contrast is seen in the fact that while the report for 1928 has no definite aim or programme, that for 1916 contained "A Statement of Principles" on the following subjects:

> 1. The Law of Marriage; 2. The Purpose of Marriage; 3. The Essence of Marriage; 4. Conditions of Marriage; and 5, A Summary of "Conclusions", on Federal Legislation, on the Roman Decree, Ne Temere, on Eugenics, Prohibited Degrees of Consanguinity, Provisions for Annulment, and on Admission to the Sacraments of persons who have entered upon marriage ignorantly, contrary to the laws of the Church.

The canon proposed by this Commission was adopted by the House of Deputies by a large majority in the clerical order (37 to 28 dioceses with 8 divided), but was lost in the lay order by a majority of only four dioceses (32 to 28, with 6 divided). (See Jl. of Gen. Conv. for 1916, Pp. 501-504, and 232.)

A third marked difference between the two reports is the length of each; that of 1928 containing no less than 26,000 words, while that of 1916 has only about 2,000. A fourth still more important contrast is seen in the different methods of treating the subject. That of 1916 looks at it from the Christian angle, God's design and Christ's "commandment". That of 1928 regards it entirely as a social and economic question: its "Cure dependent on Research and Diagnosis". The authors compare their "study" to "the work of the modern physician in the great triumphs of medicine in stamping out hookworm and yellow fever", and to that "of good engineers", and "all great corporations". They say, "Diagnosis and research represent the attitude of the modern mind", and then add, that it was in line with this that the resolution was offered. "To study the whole problem of divorce, its causes and conditions." But neither the language nor grammatical construction of this sentence corresponds with this interpretation (Pp. 10, 11).

2.—Conditions Are Not Causes.

This reversal of the order of the resolution was called to the Commission's attention by a committee of The Sanctity of Marriage Association, in the conference accorded to it in June, 1927. It was pointed out that "Conditions and Causes" cannot be construed as the equivalent of "the whole problem". Conditions are in perpetual flux in time and place. "Thou shalt not commit adultery" knows no change from age to age. It was in fact with immediate reference to the permanence of marriage that Christ said, "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass than for one tittle of the law to fall" (St. Luke 16:17, 18).

Another reason for objecting to this method of treatment is the fact that it is not with conditions alone that the "modern physician" has to deal, but with unchanging laws, the infraction of which by self-will or ignorance, is the prime cause of disease. Nor is it with conditions alone that the "good engineer" has to work, either in skyscraper or airplane, but with the unchanging laws of gravitation, and stress and strain in material. In morals as in physics "one tittle of the law cannot fall" without disaster. But the report shows no recognition of this fundamental principle in regard to marriage.

The authors of the report recognize indeed that in this respect the United States stands lower than any other nation in the world, while they naively attempt to minimize this disgrace by saying that the evil is not confined to America. They also overlook the instructive fact that even Japan stands higher than we do, as their own report shows. For non-Christian Japan is moving upward, while America is moving rapidly downward. In 1901 Japan had as many as 140 divorces to every 100,000 of population, but in 1923 had only 88, as the result of having adopted a more drastic national code in 1898. In 1901 we had only 79 divorces to 100,000 population, and in 1926 we had 154, or almost double (p. 13).

The report then proceeds to give what it calls "Causes of Divorce", though they are really only conditions of rapid increase, as follows:

> Hasty marriage, lack of uniform laws, apartment house life, lack of children, financial tension, sex tension, and "great changes in the ideal of family life". This is followed by "Three Questions of Primary Importance", which represent the nearest approach we find to any religious study of the question.
> These are: (1) The amount of divorce among parishioners, "When husband and wife are recognized as regular attendants at Church". (2) The extent to which clergymen were consulted in regard to marital difficulties. (3) The amount of training given for marriage.

3.—"A Scientific Diagnosis."

It was then to this scientific plan of diagnosis that the Commission set to work, and not to learn the mind of Christ. We need not wonder that they found the task "bristling with difficulties, well-nigh overwhelming". . . . "In fact (they say) there are those on the Commission who felt that the task was so great that they could hope to accomplish little." Nevertheless, they secured the services of a social worker with whose aid, at the cost of "not less than $5,000", they obtained information from our consuls abroad, and in the United States from Judges, social workers, educators, lawyers, psychiatrists, and social service commissions, by use of a questionnaire. As a subsidiary undertaking 100 lists of 17 questions were distributed among the students of one of the colleges of Michigan, to ascertain "what these students expected of Marriage!" Of these 100 lists "75 were returned complete", but we are not told what light these youths had to throw on the problem.

A questionnaire was also sent to a number of our own clergy, as well as to the ministers of the larger parishes of each of the following Churches—Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and Congregational, representing a cross section of the country. Here the chief stress seems to have been laid on the query as to the proportion of divorces where "both parties regularly attended church"; the result being that 612 parishes of our own Church, or 77 per cent out of a total of 787 had none, while the average of the same class in the four other Churches was 84 per cent.

This does not accord well with the claim frequently made that our skirts are cleaner than those of our neighbors. Here is something to give us pause as to the effect of our eminent respectability, excessive wealth, and fashion, combined with the much-lauded possession of only one little leak (really the biggest, because easiest, of all the 52 of our civil codes), in that great moral dam to which the Commission refers us, as if it were a work of human engineers, and not God's work "from the beginning of the creation".

But even if it should appear that this American Church reported better results among regular church-goers than other religious bodies, the question to ask is, What is the use of all this statistical inquiry? For what are here mistaken for causes, are not causes of the disease, but only symptoms, or else things which only help or hurt. To speak of them as causes is to use the language of determinism or fatalism, not of Christianity. "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," should be the language of every Christian, as it was that of St. Paul. And it is for Christians the Church is legislating. The cause, as every one knows, lies deep in the human heart; either sinful desires, or else ignorance of God's law, as clearly declared by Jesus Christ, who is recognized even by the unbelieving world as the greatest Moralist, Psychologist, and Lover of Men that the world has ever known. Yet the authority of this noblest of all teachers is never once directly appealed to in this report.

It is true that the authors quote the resolution of the House of Deputies of 1886 for the appointment of a Joint Commission, which reads:

> "Toward restoration of American civilization, decaying already at the root, by the promotion of stability in Church and State . . . in advancement of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ who is the Head over all things to His Body, which is the Church (it is resolved), that this House will not abandon the subject of Marriage and Divorce, until legislation upon it be effected in full accordance with the law of God as set forth in Nature, and revealed in the Word."

This oblique approval is the nearest we get throughout to any first principle of study as Christians, and not as mere sociologists. Instead, we find such expressions scattered all over the book as, "the ideal of marriage". This is not the language of the New Testament, nor of the resolution of 1886; nor is it that of 1925. For "the whole problem" can no more exclude Jesus Christ and His "commandments" concerning marriage and divorce, than it can exclude those concerning murder or robbery. To talk of them as ideals is to degrade His Gospel of good news and good commandments to good advice.

4.—Opinions and Statistics.

And what, let us ask, does this majority report give us in place of God's law and Christ's authority, for the solution of "the whole problem of divorce"? We have a motley collection of all sorts of opinions, mostly irrelevant, such as those held by "many people in modern society, and within this Church, that Christ did not lay down a definite law of marriage, but that, according to His custom (where is this told?), He held up an ideal". And then it is added, "They do not feel that in the Sermon on the Mount, for instance, He gave an absolute rule of life for marriage any more than for anger, lust, oaths, and forgiveness of one's enemies" (for all of which He certainly did give an absolute rule). "They sincerely believe that Christ's ideal of monogamy would be better upheld by allowing the more frequent dissolution of unhappy marriages with permission to remarry" (Pp. 55, 56).

Once more, with what seems like quasi approval, the report adds: "Those who take this position in favor of remarriage believe that society and the Church must recognize that the strict attitude of the Church is not only unfair and therefore unchristian, but they . . . insist upon the recognition of the widespread existence of illicit sexual relationships when divorce and remarriage are made difficult." Here again they quote, with apparent approval, the opinion of a London magistrate, Cecil Chapman, who writes: "In refusing to grant divorce except for adultery, it (the act of Parliament) actually encourages immorality, illegitimacy, and concubinage". For all of which he only points for proof to the 40,000 illegitimate children born in England and Wales in 1900 (p. 56).

But Mr. Chapman is very unfortunate (and the Commission fails to see this) in his statistics as giving a gross number, instead of a percentage of the total births. When we examine the statistics of illegitimacy of Europe in relation to the strictness or looseness of their divorce laws, we find a very different story.

> During the period 1901-1905, Austria, which has ten causes for absolute divorce ("the most complicated in Europe") had 141 illegitimate births to the thousand; Sweden, with seven causes by civil court, and five by royal prerogative, had 113; France with five causes had 88; Scotland with two causes had 64; Italy with no cause, had 56; England and Wales with one cause had 40; and Ireland with no cause, had only 22! (Enc. Brit. 11th. ed. vol. 14, Pp. 301-304; also in Divorce in America Under State and Church, Macmillan, 1925, Pp. 75, 76.) South Carolina and Canada would probably give a similar record to this last.

Here then we have the prevailing thought that characterizes this strange report of a Commission appointed to study this fundamental law of Christian and natural morality. This is also accentuated in the "Bibliography" at the end, where no less than seventeen authors, or sources, of "historical, statistical, legislative, ecclesiastical (?), and social characteristics of marriage and divorce" are given; not one of which appeals to the authority of Christ and the age-long witness of His Church. Such a method of "study" has been described in the language of the engineer as "unscrewing things generally". How is it, one must ask, that such modern scholars and students of history as Liddon, Watkins, Gore, Luckock, Lacey, and Dollinger, who have given the question thorough study and research are not even once named? And this in a Christian Commission! Surely this is a most extraordinary course to be adopted by men appointed by the great Council of this American branch of Christ's Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church.—To be continued.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart"—Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. E. A. Robertson, of Ridgeland, S. C.:

> "But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."—2 Corinthians 3:18.

WE BELIEVE THAT THOU SHALT COME

By Kenneth Mackenzie

X.

DWELLING for a moment upon the conclusion of the last article, we are moved to comment upon the fact that there seems to be a special class of believers to whom the coming of the Lord will be not only welcome, but for which they are thereby well fitted. There are those "who look (or wait) for Him" (Heb. 9:29). As we we have noted, there is a class who "love His appearing" (1 Tim. 4:8). He admonished His own and through them ourselves, to beware lest that day come upon us unaware (Luke 21:34-36). His frequently uttered command "Watch", has no superficial challenge. He would not have placed such emphasis upon preparedness had there been no need. And the apostolic injunctions are not the less urgent. We have no ground for discussing the fact that if He did not come in the apostolic times, there is therefore no call for watchfulness now. It was "after a long time" that the Lord should come to reckon with His servants (Matt. 25:19).

Logically, therefore, if there are some who look for His advent in response to His appeal; and some who do not care at all as to whether that event shall ever come to pass, reason demands that there can be no translation of the living saints which does not imply that there will be some who will miss the honor. The little tract, "The Missing Ones", published some time since in The Southern Churchman, affords a rational picture of the possible conviction. Holding this in reserve for a fuller treatment, we do well at present to dwell upon the necessity of the coming of the Lord to complete His world-wide plan of redemption. Many of us have the erroneous conception that Death ends all.

Which is not to say that the pessimistic world axiom is meant. But these good people who thus conclude, think that it will be enough to die and "go to heaven". Hence, the indifference to the appeal which we have already noted. But it does not end all; it is but the preliminary chapter of the great book of purpose which our Lord has written in the hearts of His children all through the ages. St. Paul has his urgent warning as to this. He does not believe that to die is the consummation of all hope. His exposition of the problem in 2 Cor. 4:17-5:10 is a complete commentary on the subject. He here contrasts the "moment" of our affliction with the "eternal weight of glory". Then leading onward, that we may not look at the things seen but unseen, he enters into a dissertation concerning the tabernacle in which we are to be glorified at the resurrection. And we note the particular emphasis he places upon the need of the resurrection (or the translation) in his protest that we shall not be satisfied to be "unclothed" but confidently look for our being "Clothed upon that mortality might be swallowed up of life".

In other words, blessed as it is to be "absent from the body and present with the Lord", we limit our complete redemption if we fail to apprehend the full consummation when our Lord comes again. Let us be appraised that as the human body was the vehicle through which sin entered, so must God in His infinite purpose bring back the body to its original estate. St. Peter calls this era the "times of restoration" (Acts 3:19-21 R. V.). A restoration is synonymous with redemption; the one the bringing back of an order which has been disrupted, the other the recovering of a possession which has been temporarily lost.

We are on the verge of a remarkably confirmatory evidence of the truth of this assumption. In Germany, a process has been devised which is capable of causing rays of light to emit from the human body. We devoutly believe that this was the original estate of the first man. And we have but to study the body of the second Man, the Lord from heaven, to understand this. As He was without sin, He was distinctly differentiated from us all. Unquestionably, the transfiguration was a demonstration of the truth. For we have ground for assuming that what was opened to the eyes of the chosen three, for that brief moment, was the perpetual estate of the Man of Sorrows. Angels saw it; demons shuddered as they beheld it and uttered their protesting cry, "What have we to do with Thee?" So the transfiguration was not an outward investiture of light, but the shining through the interstices of the flesh of an ever-present radiance. It would seem that as St. John refers to the transfiguration as the unveiling of His glory and the term of His earth life a tabernacling, there might be ground for assuming that the shekinah of the Old Testament which had departed from the temple, was incarnated in Himself.

Now, as the result of the redemption accomplished by the Cross, the glory He had possessed was to be exchanged for the glory which He had left behind (John (17:5). And He expressly affirms that His glory is to be shared with His own, "and the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them" (John 17:22-24). This is indeed the assurance of St. John (1 John 3:2).

"We shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

Devout contemplation has the authority, therefore, to picture the redeemed body of the believer as embracing qualities akin to those expressed by the Son of God in His resurrection glory. There may be symbolism in the portraiture supplied by the writer of the book of the Revelation (Rev. 1:16, 17). Yet the pictorial must have its basis in an actual fact. If the appearance of the "angel of the Lord" (Matt. 28:2-4) was of such overpowering splendor, certainly the sovereign Lord upon whom he waited could not be less so, but superlatively more. And we also know that the resurrected body of our Lord took no necessary cognizance of the laws of nature. To have recorded this without a historical foundation would have been utterly superfluous and confusing on the part of the writers of the gospels. Therefore, we note that body now raised from the dead as transcending the material by passing through walls and closed doors! traversing space with a more than ordinary measure of locomotion; being visible or unseen at will; while not requiring subsistence, capable of partaking of food (Luke 24:43; John 21:13). And certainly no one can doubt that the ascension, if at all accepted as a historical fact, embraces the features we have noted.

St. Paul clearly unifies us with His Lord and ours in the resplendent destiny which the New Testament invests our coming King. For in Phil. 3:21, he affirms

"He shall transfigure this body of our humiliation".

Thank God, it is not a vile body after it has become resident with the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19). And this, be appraised is stated in connection with our looking for the Saviour. Daniel anticipates this glorious estate by his perspective, "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that win many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. 12:3). So also St. Paul again in Col. 3:4, "When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory". And our Lord surmounts these assurances with His own crown of prophecy (Matt. 13:43),

"Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father".

We may be well assured that this cluster of prophecies could not well have come into existence, so fully confirming each other and in varying periods of the sacred record had there been no historical basis for their utterance. And the reason for our noting it is obvious.

First, to revise our concept that to get out of this world and leave behind us this despised body is the consummation of hope. By so reasoning, we defile what God has sanctified. There is a destiny for our physical frame, fondly apprehended by our Lord Jesus, cherished by attending angels and received with meekness and trust by believing saints.

Second, equally true is it that our resurrection bodies are not designed for heaven only. The forty days our Lord spent upon earth are a portraiture of that coming age when He shall reign with His chosen ones. If we cherish the song of the redeemed (Rev. 5:9, 10), "Thou art worthy . . . and hast made us kings and priests unto God", we must not fail to note the conclusion, "and we shall reign on the earth". This poor enslaved world in its physical yearnings is said by St. Paul to groan (Rom. 8:19-23). As the earth was the scene of the alienation of man from his good and loving Creator; as the body of man has suffered by the degradation of sin, so in the finished work of redemption, "the manifestation of the sons of God" will be keyed to the program of the earth's liberation.

Finally, as this is predicated of us in our final destiny, we may well heed St. Peter's warning, "What manner of persons ought ye to be"? (2 Peter 3:11). For our Lord has anticipated this realm of our exaltation by the significant announcement (Matt. 5:14):

"Ye are the light of the world."

Conceding that there might be a metaphysical understanding of this saying, may there not be a more than ethical meaning? What and if the light in His human body shining forth on the Mount of Transfiguration may be a token of the indwelling light which comes to us in our new birth? This may appall us; but be certified that the Holy Spirit is the custodian and inspirer of the saints. Light is our qualification for service and culture; and if it be darkness how great is the darkness by very contrast (Matt. 6:22, 23). He is the light of the world and we company with Him in that light (John 8:12; 12:46; 1 John 1:7). And St. Paul strikes the note in his affirmation, "Ye are light in the Lord", "Whatsoever doth make manifest is light" (Eph. 5:8, 13). And we are called to the "inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. 1:13); for "He hath translated us from the power of darkness into the kingdom of the Son of his love".

We may wonder if as angels behold us as the children of the light, they may discern in us varying degrees of outshining unseen by man; if at times our very thoughts may obscure the light and the darkness our Lord apprehends is found to cloud the luminous indwelling we have received. May this not be appropriated by us as an incentive to attitudes of mind, habits of life, spiritual moods. Surely, with such a destiny as awaits us, we may not regard as an idle dream this possible preparation for that august day when "He shall come to be glorified in the saints".

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

EZRA.

EZRA was a priest, a scribe of the law of the God of heaven, who had set his heart to seek the law of the Lord, to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgment (Ezra 7:10, 21).

He is doubtless the scribe who was inspired by the Holy Spirit to write the books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra and Esther.

Subject.

The Holy Spirit tells us of two things in this short book of ten chapters, first, restoration of the Temple, and second, restoration of Temple worship.

I. Chs. 1-6. Restoration of the Temple. The House of God, so ruthlessly destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, was rebuilt after seventy years by the command of Cyrus (2 Chron. 36:14-23; Ezra 1; Isa. 44:28).

The House of God was destroyed because of the sin of Israel, but sovereign grace restored it that Israel might be restored to the place of fellowship with Jehovah.

2. Chs. 7-10. Restoration of Temple worship. That Israel might enjoy the blessings of God and be made a blessing in a life of fellowship with Him, Temple worship was restored.

Purpose.

This book of Ezra was written to teach us how the Lord restores His people to fellowship, when they have been chastened because of their sins (Heb. 12).

1. Chs. 1-6. The restoration of the Temple as the place of worship, tells us typically of the Spirit's work in begetting a heart attitude which gives the Lord first place in our lives, which exalts Him as Lord (1 Peter 3:15 R. V.).

2. Chs. 7-10. The restoration of Temple worship pictures to us the blessing enjoyed by living in conscious fellowship with the Lord a life of service for others (1 John 1:7; 3:16).

THE SECRET OF A QUIET MIND: By Rev. John S. Bunting. Cloth. Pp. 127. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York City. Price, $1.25.

Not often may a reviewer indulge the time or disposition to read every page of the book at hand. This volume, taken on a railway trip, so fascinated the reader by its opening paragraphs, that interest was challenged to the very close.

The book derives its title from the first chapter and suggests the manifest lack, in our madly rushing life, of quietness and consequent response to the potency of spiritual calm. In this treatment we learn what tempestuous Elijah had to acquire; that God is not in the fire of our consuming desire, not in the noise of our hurricane activities, nor in the convulsions of our busy world. Watching and waiting is He, that the "voice of gentle stillness" may reveal Him to us. In this and in every chapter, our author first discloses our needs; then opens to us a vista of our possible supply; and then unfolds the method by which our quickened hopes may become vitally real.

When one begins the chapter, "The Charm of Prayer", he instinctively draws a breath and asks, "With whom is prayer a charm?" How sodden we seem to be in our prayer-formalism. True, we say prayers, not unlike the distinterested peasants we have seen in village churches abroad, who, while counting their beads and mumbling their Ave Marias, have busy eyes scanning the chance visitors and their attire. Let us be honest with ourselves. Many of us do not find in prayer a charm. We endure the prayer-periods of our daily round, if we really pray at all, relieved perhaps when the conclusion is reached. No man can open such a sacred avenue of access to God who has not trod that way. And thus Dr. Bunting wins us to himself. He means what he writes; for he has found it true. And he wants us to share with him this priceless boon. When he puts the perspective before us and we behold the truly essential quality of prayer, we shall invest the long known and loved, "Sweet Hour of Prayer" with a new significance.

There lies before the reader a world of thought in the chapters, "The Hiddenness of God", "Right and Wrong Thinking About God", "The Mystery of God's Love", "Getting and Keeping the Mind of Christ", "Our Hidden Springs of Life". And in all these, there is no trace of that subtle element which so often creeps into the studies of personal religion, the mysticism of psychology. The writer shows us that is is not in ourselves, but in Him that the sources of spiritual power lie, and that by a full and glad surrender to Him, our loving, waiting Lord becomes the open door to all spiritual possibilities.

We cannot too highly praise this book. It may well be a help to Lenten culture. It will surely lead to a glorious spiritual Easter. And those of us who find it treasurable will see that our friends possess it too.

IF I HAD ONLY ONE SERMON TO PREACH: Edited by Sir James Marchant. Harper and Brothers. Price, $2.50.

Here are twenty sermons representing what twenty outstanding English preachers feel to be their best. This should furnish a fairly representative view of the spiritual direction people are receiving today. A good number of them center about the Cross. Our main criticism would be that there is more argument than proclamation. They are apologists rather than prophets. This reviewer always asks, "What would be the effect upon a group of needy, empty men?" Our candid opinion is that they would go away from too many of these sermons unsatisfied. There is not in them enough of the fire of the Spirit to convict a man living in sin. There are few if any words about the fulness of the Spirit. We evidently need such renewed dedication to God as shall result in the lighting of the fires of grace that burned under Wesley and Whitefield.

IN JUSTICE TO ST. STEPHEN'S

Mr. Editor:

I have just read, in The Southern Churchman of February 23, a severe indictment of St. Stephen's College, Annandale, and of its honored President, the Rev. Dr. Bernard I. Bell.

I have been a reader of, and a contributor to, your paper for many years, and I know you want to be scrupulously fair, else I should not send this protest.

I have been here at the College since last September, holding no official position, but simply resting from a breakdown after nearly thirty-eight years of overwork. In these six months I have mingled freely with the professors and students, have had the inestimable pleasure of listening to some of Dr. Bell's wonderfully constructive and inspiring sermons, and I am able to assert, without any fear of contradiction, that there is no ground, whatever, for your correspondent's criticism.

We have here a splendid set of young men, whose lives are as clean as the lives of young men anywhere, and who are morally, and religiously alert seven days in the week.

There are criticisms of the power-that-be, everywhere, and I have heard some here, of course. But I want to assure you, my dear Mr. Editor, that St. Stephen's College is a College of which the Church may be justly proud, and that there is nothing taught, or done here, that could disturb or destroy the faith of the boys.

Dr. Bell needs no apologist; his achievements here are almost phenomenal. But in the interest of justice, and fair-play I am compelled to give my testimony to what I see, and what I know, lest the College should be harmed by your correspondent's accusation.

As I have listened to Dr. Bell's earnest and scholarly sermons, calling his hearers to newness of life, and pureness of living, I have often wondered how any young man could resist them.

Dr. Bell may be radical; but his allegiance to the truth, as this Church has received it, is unswerving. I wish to God one-half of our clergy were as steadfast as he!

Last week he preached to large congregations at Trinity Church, and St. James' Church, New York City, and wherever he ministers, or preaches, he stimulates, elevates, and ennobles. Percy T. Fenn.

AN ANECDOTE OF LEE.

Mr. Editor:

I have been greatly interested in the oration of the Hon. John W. Daniel on General Lee, which you have been publishing. I am reminded of an incident narrated to me by General Gonzales.

The General was from the far South and was spending the summer of 1880 in Warrenton, Va. I was occupied across from the hotel where he was staying, and I would frequently go over and enjoy his interesting conversation. One afternoon, when there was no one else present, the old gentleman began to talk of General Lee. He spoke particularly of his thoughtfulness of others, and then narrated this incident.

It was during the Peninsula Campaign. The weather was exceedingly warm, and all, whose duties did not require exposure to the sun, sought the shelter of their tents. General Lee, with his staff and several other officers, made a tour of inspection of the picket lines. This consumed some time, as it was about seven miles to the point of the Peninsula; and when in the late afternoon, when the heat was greatest and General Gonzales was in his tent trying to be comfortable, he heard the voice of General Lee calling, "General; General Gonzales".

When he looked out there sat General Lee upon Traveler, and in his hand he held a very large stalk of sugar cane.

"General Gonzales," he said, "I thought of you when I saw this cane growing, and I knew you would be glad of a reminder of your Southern home, so I cut it for you."

General Gonzales spoke of his gratification that General Lee should have thought of him at all, but especially when he was engaged in such important matters, but his feelings were inexpressible when, upon conversing with one of the other members of the inspecting party he was told that when they were at the extreme point of the picket line General Lee had dismounted and gone into the cane patch and had cut the stalk of cane after carefully selecting the tallest, and had declined the offer of several of his orderlies to carry it and had brought it all the way himself, and no one knew what he was going to do with it until he stopped in front of General Gonzales' tent and called him out.

What a wonderful, thoughtful, loving heart he had!

EARTHQUAKE.

Mr. Editor:

The editorial on Smith College was an earthquake.

It is most refreshing to see how you and your brother (not brother but cousin—Ed.) hammer the fads and fancies of the day in the Church. It fills me with intense satisfaction to see a Church paper standing up so boldly for the truth as this Church has received it. I do enjoy your terrific thrusts at their folly. The seminaries of the Church are the real trouble. They are teaching the most deadly falsehoods and the young men cannot but accept some of it—nay, all of it—at times and when they get out—what can they preach about? Nothing. There is no way to tell how much good you have done in this short time with The Southern Churchman. I am thundering and smashing into the "Bulls and the Bears" every day in Wall Street. I already have six fine fellows who want to study for the ministry—one a fine young Jew. Anything I can do for you —any time—let me know. I never fail to speak a word for the paper wherever I may go. Amen. A friend of mine in Philadelphia took the editorial on Smith College to one of the graduates from there and got a subscription at once.

Kindest regards and best wishes, St. Mark 10:27.

DAMASCUS BLADE.

Mr. Editor:

Thank you for your letter. Find enclosed $1 for The Southern Churchman the next six months. May you live long to wield like Valiant-for-Truth your Damascus blade against the parasites which are sucking the life-blood out of the Church. As the Scriptures say, They have forgotten how to blush; for their consciences are seared with a hot iron. "Bible Believer".

SECOND-HAND INFORMATION.

Mr. Editor:

I wish to register in your correspondence columns my disagreement with Mr. Ellis' criticism of the Rev. Samuel Shoemaker. Mr. Ellis is evidently writing from second-hand information only.

He brings out an old story about a tough who later came to sing in his choir. Choir singing is no evidence of a changed heart. I have heard of men who sang in the choir when drunk. Mr. Ellis places great faith in the General Confession, as I do, in its proper place, but it is not a cure-all. I heard of a clergyman who was asked to deal with a drunk in the inquiry room of one of our rescue missions. The good brother took him in the room and had him say the General Confession and then said Absolution over him. They later had to get a simple Christian present to pray with the man and lead him to Christ. The clergyman was one who, no doubt, would have rejoiced Mr. Ellis' heart through his regularity, nevertheless as a personal worker he was a flat failure.

Mr. Ellis makes a sweeping statement about every clergyman having had similar experience in leading men to Christ. I confess that has not been my observation. I have met a number of ministers who were doing nothing of the kind; some would like to have done so, but did not know how, while others had no intention of doing anything of the kind. His methods may do for a generation that has gotten our Church known as possessing "religion in its mildest form", but hardly represents the ideals of those who are working and praying for the spread of the Crusade for Evangelism.

Mr. Shoemaker's work is producing miraculous results. From us of the clergy who are doing so much less than he, he should expect and receive, not our criticism, or even a sort of condescending, patronizing approval worse than criticism, but our heartfelt prayers and encouragement. He is very evidently enjoying the blessing of God, are the servants more difficult to please than their Master?

Church Intelligence

For Boys' Work in the Church.

A new and completely re-written Handbook has been issued by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for the use of its Junior Department Chapters. It provides definite programs for Boys' Work in the Church covering a wide range of activity, suggestions for private devotions and preparation for the Holy Communion, suggestive Scripture readings, and Recreational Programs for boys. In connection with the Handbook, the Brotherhood is preparing programs of instruction in Christian living and Churchmanship for boys, to be furnished to leaders of boys' groups using the Handbook.

The price of the new Handbook is twenty-five cents per copy; a sample copy will be sent free of charge to any rector upon request of the National Headquarters of the Brotherhood, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia.

Building Fund for Sewanee Growing.

The sum of $66,000 has been subscribed to the Sewanee Expansion Fund by Churchmen and citizens of Memphis, Tenn., in response to an appeal made to that city during February. The matter was in charge of a local committee of laymen, assisted by the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell, Director of the Sewanee Expansion Fund.

With this addition, the Expansion Fund now totals $532,000. The full amount needed is $2,000,000, the bulk of which is for buildings to relieve the congested living conditions among the students, to make possible the admission of applicants who are now turned away for lack of accommodations, and to bring the University's equipment up to date generally.

Construction has now begun on a gymnasium and swimming pool for the Sewanee Military Academy; and the general improvement of the dormitory and grounds has been authorized. When these are completed the University will have one of the best equipped preparatory schools in the South.

Within a few months construction will begin on one of the much-needed living halls for the College. Vice-Chancellor Finney expects to have it ready for occupancy by the end of this year.

At the recent Diocesan Convention, Dr. Finney was chosen as head of the Columbia Institute for Girls—"the Mussolini of the Institute"—as Bishop Maxon said in putting the motion. It is a Church School located at Columbia, Tenn.

Conference On Negro Work.

A Conference of Southern Bishops on Negro Work was held in All Saints' Parish House, Atlanta, Ga., February 26-27.

The Bishop of Georgia was elected Chairman of the Conference. The Coadjutor-Bishop of North Carolina was elected Secretary.

The eighteen bishops of the Church, representing nearly all Southern dioceses, which are aided in the conduct of Negro work by the National Church, after a prolonged discussion, adopted a resolution favoring missionary jurisdictions for work among Negroes with separate Negro Episcopate. The vote stood affirmative 11, negative 7, a result which in itself suggests the wide variance of opinion which was developed. The resolution avoids all detail, but was amplified in two particulars in the findings.

The first of these suggests that "a Missionary Racial Jurisdiction be created to be composed of the Negro clergy and the congregations in some group of contiguous dioceses that may be willing for its creation within their borders".

A second finding instructed the Secretary to forward a copy of the minutes of the meetings "To the President of the Conference of Colored Church Workers". By this friendly gesture, the Bishops of the South invite the opinions of the leaders among Negro communicants.

The Conference named has met for a number of years with national cooperation and is the outstanding organized group of the race at work within the Church.

While this action is far from definitive, it brings to the fore a question which has claimed the attention not only of Negro leadership, but of Bishops having to do with this problem and from time to time of the General Convention itself. The question of recognition of Negro Churchmen as a separate racial group entitled to self determination under a Negro Episcopate, is recognized to be fraught with great difficulty. It has behind it, however, a growing insistence upon the part of Negro Churchmen and wins support of the Bishops because of a very general recognition that the situation now prevailing is unsatisfactory.

The Conference carefully considered the present methods in the education of Negro Postulants and Candidates for Holy Orders. As a result, the Bishops of Mississippi and East Carolina and the Bishop Coadjutor of Southern Virginia were appointed to make a study of the whole subject of Theological education among the Negroes and report at the Conference of Bishops to be held in Atlantic City next September.

Various phases of the discussions resulted in these incidental recommendations.

1. The Conference urges a more generous consideration of work by the National Council.

2. It urges the Dioceses in which the work is being done to secure more general and adequate support.

3. It urges the Negroes themselves to feel a greater sense of responsibility for self-support.

4. The Conference approves the suggestion that some method of correlating and justifying the askings of the aided Southern Dioceses for Negro work be found and suggests a further meeting of the Bishops for that purpose.

The Conference considered in some details upon a basis of reports made by the Bishops the state of Negro work throughout the South. The greatest impression was made by the Bishop of Mississippi, who described opportunities on the one hand and limitations on the other, in connection with this work in a State which teems with Negro people.

The Conference unanimously adopted first a resolution and then a finding which calls upon the Bishop of Mississippi to overcome a combination of conservatism and modesty which have kept him from asking adequate aid. The Bishop is fairly instructed to make such request and the National Council is urged to accord favorable action.

The Conference considered the work of the American Church Institute for Negroes. Commendation was general, the Bishop of Atlanta paying a very hearty tribute to the work and influence of Fort Valley School, located in his diocese.

The Conference was held in response to suggestions made in connection with the report of the Committee on Evaluation. At the same time a resolution referred from the National Council to Bishops having mountain work within their jurisdictions was considered by this smaller group following the adjournment of the Conference on Negro Work.

The Conference recommended to the National Council that a survey of this work be undertaken at some early date, so that adequate facts be available before any action be taken.

The following Bishops were present:

The Bishop of Georgia, the Bishop of Atlanta, the Bishop of Mississippi, the Bishop of Virginia, the Bishop of Southern Virginia, the Bishop-Coadjutor of Mississippi, the Bishop-Coadjutor of Southern Florida, the Bishop of East Carolina, the Bishop of Western North Carolina, the Bishop of North Carolina, the Bishop of Florida, the Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee, the Bishop of Upper South Carolina, the Bishop of West Texas, the Bishop-Coadjutor of North Carolina, the Bishop of South Carolina, the Bishop of Southwestern Virginia.

The Rev. Carroll M. Davis, D. D., the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs and Dr. John W. Wood were also present, representing the National Council.

Sixty-Six More Buildings.

The Church Building Fund has closed another year of effective service for the Church, and is preparing to send to the clergy a detailed story of its work, its aims and hopes, in attractive booklet form.

Its resources represented in its $800,000 Fund, fully invested in building loans, while inadequate to meet all the applications received, have yet had full employment.

The annual turn-over of the Fund has made possible the making of twenty-five loans in the sum of $145,340, with which five churches, five rectories, fourteen parish houses, and two combination church and parish houses—in all twenty-six buildings—have been completed for the equipment of our parishes and missions.

From the income derived from these loans thirty-nine gifts totalling $31,400 have also finished for the use of parishes and missions fourteen churches, eleven rectories, eleven parish houses, and three combination church and parish houses—in all thirty-nine buildings.

One grant of $1,000 has also been made for the completion of a church.

To have extended and strengthened the Church's material fabric with these sixty-six buildings in the course of one year is the normal service of the Commission (a building every five days) for the past few years since its capital became fully invested in Church Loans.

The future service of the Commission can be increased only by the growth of the Fund through the offerings, gifts and legacies, of our Church people. It remains for them to fix the fuller service of the Commission.

Pennsylvania Fourth Time Disappointed.

The Very Rev. William Scarlett, LL. D., dean of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, Mo., has declined the office of Bishop Coadjutor of Pennsylvania to which he was elected by a special convention on January 22.

Dean Scarlett is the fourth man elected and the fourth to decline this office within the year. Dr. Sherrill, of Boston; Bishop Crosby, of Wyoming, and Dr. Bowie, of New York, were the previous choices of the diocese.

The Rev. Edward M. Jefferys, D. D., Chairman of the Notification Committee, received the following letter:

"Dear Dr. Jefferys:

"It is with profound regret that after long consideration I have been unable to see my way clear to accept the invitation with which the diocese has honored me.

"I realize keenly the seriousness to the diocese of another declination, and this has weighed heavily in my decision. I am further embarrassed by the current misapprehension that I had agreed in advance to regard the election as a 'draft'. I did intimate in a private letter that there was in my mind at the time the probability of acceptance, but with a reservation which it is now for me to exercise in the light of the situation as it presents itself, always with every desire in any event to subordinate myself to the service of the Cause and to be governed by a fair and intelligent consideration of the interests of the diocese as I read them.

"When I came to face frankly and fully the whole problem, as one can only after election, to analyze and understand the many factors involved, and to balance the absorbing, highly important and exacting duties of the office over against my own qualifications for that particular task, I was gradually and reluctantly forced to the conclusion that I personally could best serve the Kingdom of God in some other way. I would be eager to make any personal sacrifice provided I were convinced it would work out in the long run for the good of the diocese. But that it would so result in this instance I am not persuaded. Having arrived at this conclusion there is but one thing to do. It would not be fair therefore to hesitate longer in giving my decision.

"I am distressed to find myself compelled to make this decision, and I do so only after being certain in my own mind that duty points this way. And especially am I grieved that I must disappoint Bishop Garland who has been throughout so very considerate and cordial to me.

"I offer my apologies for the delay, and ask you to ascribe it to the doubt and struggle that have attended me in making up my mind.

"With the expression of my deepest appreciation of your confidence, and my great regret that I could not come to a different conclusion, I am

"Faithfully yours,

"William Scarlett".

Archdeacon Russell Receives Harmon Award.

Over 1,200 people, many of them out-of-town, crowded the beautiful auditorium of St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville, Va., Tuesday night, February 12, to do honor to Archdeacon Russell, on the occasion of the presentation to him of the Harmon Gold Medal. Visitors were present from many of the Virginia towns and cities, as well as from places as far away as Pittsburgh, Pa. On the platform were Dr. Charles L. Palmer, Master of Ceremonies; Hons. B. A. Lewis and E. P. Buford, present and former attorneys for the Commonwealth; Mayor Wesson, Division Superintendent Chambliss; Sheriff Turnbull; County Clerk Elmore; R. S. Moseley, Commissioner of Revenue; Archdeacon Russell; the speaker of the occasion, Mr. John Stewart Bryan, publisher of the Richmond News Leader, and other speakers, the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D. D., Richmond, an alumnus; the Rev. Scott Wood, D. D., Pittsburgh, Pa., a former vice-principal of the school, and Mr. Benjamin Hicks. In the audience were scores of the town's business, professional and social leaders, both men and women.

Beginning his eloquent tribute to Archdeacon Russell, with the statement: "The people who give him medals honor themselves," Mr. Bryan said in part.

"Archdeacon Russell has been finding his life in his work, achieving his destiny thereby and weaving for himself an imperishable garment of immortality, that to quote a Persian sage, 'Work is love made manifest' and that 'all the things I see around here, are the works of Archdeacon Russell made manifest." After paying tribute to the effective social, religious, educational and regenerative work of Archdeacon Russell, Mr. Bryan declared in closing that it was exceedingly fitting and proper that in his mature years Archdeacon Russell should be receiving the most treasured things in life—"Love, Obedience, Honor and Troops of Friends"—from those whom he has served so faithfully and with such splendid zeal and singular consecration.

Mr. Lewis and Mr. Buford referred to revolutionary effects of Archdeacon Russell's life upon the Colored people of the county in making good citizens and useful members of society, and in promoting good relations between the races. County Clerk Elmore read a long list of congratulatory telegrams and letters. Other speakers were Benjamin Hicks, who told how Archdeacon Russell had helped the people through the organization of the Farmers' Conference and other uplift agencies to adopt better farm methods, buy land, build better homes and help in building better schools for their children. Rev. Dr. Wood spoke of the religious features of Archdeacon Russell's work. Mr. H. L. Giles and Miss Geneva Byrd represented respectively the faculty and student appreciaion of his work. Perhaps the most arresting testimony concerning Archdeacon Russell's work was that of Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D. D., an alumnus of the school. He came to St. Paul's an illiterate adult. He was met at the entrance by Archdeacon Russell's son, who thinking he was the teacher his father was expecting, told him to see him as "Papa wants to see you". Dr. Taylor had to tell him he was not the teacher, but a student. He worked his way through school to graduation, entered the theological school, graduated and was ordained deacon. He is now a priest in the Church, a doctor of divinity, has presented seven hundred persons for Confirmation; built several churches, etc. It was of this man that the late Bishop Greer said: "If St. Paul's had done nothing more than educate Taylor, it would have been richly repaid for every dollar spent for its support."

The Harmon Award is given by a Foundation established by the late William E. Harmon for distinguished service by persons of any race in the fields of industry, education, science, religion, invention and fine arts. To qualify for a Harmon Award the achievement must be national in character and scope and be comparable with similar efforts in any field. Two awards are given, a Gold Medal and an honorarium of $400; a Bronze Medal and an honorarium of $100. Archdeacon Russell received the gold medal and $400. Twelve Negroes were honored.

Archdeacon Russell was given beautiful and expensive floral tributes by the Citizens' Committee of Lawrenceville, composed of white citizens, the "Officers' Corps" of the School; the Faculty; Parent Teachers' Association, and his own children. The climax of the meeting came when Archdeacon Russell, in responding to the speeches of the evening read a telegram from a friend of the school, who desires her name to be unknown for the present, pledging $50,000 for the building and equipment of a Domestic Science Building for the girls of St. Paul's, to be erected in memory of her mother.

The Committee on Appreciation and Arrangements was composed of white citizens of the county and community.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Diocesan Council to Meet in Richmond.

The meeting of the Council of the Diocese of Virginia has been changed from Orange to Richmond for this coming May, in order that the centennial of the Diocesan Missionary Society may be celebrated in connection with the meeting of the Council. As the main exercises in connection with the centennial are to be held at St. John's and St. Paul's Churches, Dr. Tucker suggested to the Bishop that St. Paul's would be glad to be the host to the Diocesan Council.

Accordingly the vestry, at its last meeting, extended to the Bishop an official invitation in the name of the rector and vestry, and this invitation has been duly accepted.

Dr. Tucker Appointed.

The Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, has been named by Governor Byrd as one of the four gubernatorial appointees to serve with five other commissioners previously named by the Senate and the House, to report to the next session of the General Assembly on the advisability of establishing a liberal arts college for undergraduate women at one of the State Teachers' Colleges.

The Romance of a Mountain Mission.

This is the story that has come down from the grandmother of a grandmother at one of our Mountain Missions. It was told to one of our mountain workers by one of the women in the neighborhood.

It seems that she was told by her grandmother the story of her grandmother's first coming to the mountains and founding a family which has since grown into a community.

This first grandmother was born and brought up in England and was named Elizabeth Fair. She belonged to a family of wealth and good position and had every thing that she could wish for that money could buy. She, however, fell in love with a sea captain named Nathaniel Carter. Her family strongly disapproved of the match and she was kept almost as a prisoner to prevent her communicating with her lover. The story goes that out in the beautiful flower garden of her home she was "armed" up and down the paths and also was "armed" to and from church on Sundays.

These preventive measures were, however, of no avail, for she succeeded one night in letting herself down from her bed room window, either by a rope or by tying the sheets together. She then ran away with the young sea captain and they were married and crossed the ocean to Virginia, presumably on his ship. He then took her up into the mountains, perhaps to prevent her family from tracing her, and there they made their home.

At first she was very much frightened at the wildness of the forest and the story goes that she screamed or felt like screaming when she got there.

As the years passed she became the mother of eleven children, and the worker has told me that almost every family in that community now bears the name of Carter.

It is an interesting fact that the Church should have found and cared for, after so many years, the descendants of Elizabeth Fair, who had been brought up in the Church of England.

Our readers may like to know the name of the Mission and the Missionary. It is St. Andrew's Mission, Ada, and the Missionary is the Rev. Wm. B. Everett,. his postoffice, Marshall, Va. The story was told me by his sister, Miss Everett and she got it from a great, great granddaughter of Elizabeth Fair. —F. W. N., in Our Mountain Work.

Richmond Scouts to Attend World Jamboree.

The most significant event in Richmond scouting will be the participation of a number of Richmond Scouts in the World Jamboree to be held in England this summer. Representative Scouts from all parts of the world will gather together for ten days in competition on all departments of scoutcraft, and a number of Richmond Scouts will join Scouts from other parts of America to take part in this great event.

Mr. Childrey Scott, Scoutmaster of St. Paul's, has been selected to command the Scouts going from Richmond.

The team which is to represent America will be selected from all over the country, but the trip is open to all Scouts who have been registered more than a year, and to certain others under special conditions. The party, led by Mr. Scott, will sail about July 30. They will go to Liverpool and participate in the ten-day camping program, after which the party will take a short trip through England, closing with two days in Paris, returning to this country about August 30. On account of the special rates which the steamship companies will make for the Scouts, the whole trip can be made at a cost of $350 to each boy. It is expected that about twenty boys will make the trip.

Washington Memorial Chapel.

The sixth annual Virginia State Sunday Service will be held in the Washington Memorial Chapel, Valley Forge, Pa., on March 10, at 3:15 o'clock. This service will be the more notable because it will be a part of the celebration of the One Hundred and Fifty-first Anniversary of Valley Forge, as Washington and his Army occupied Valley Forge December 19, 1777, and left Valley Forge, June 19, 1778.

The Virginia State Panel in the Roof of the Republic was given by a great-granddaughter of Edmund Randolph. The Virginia Bay in the Cloister of the Colonies was given by Mr. George C Thomas. The Virginia Bell in the "Star-Spangled Banner National Peace Chime" was given by Mr. Frederic W. Scott of Richmond. The Virginia State Flag was given by Mr. Jacquelin P. Taylor of Richmond. The Church hopes that the people of Virginia will now establish memorial choristerships in memory of its heroes and patriots, its distinguished citizens. In this patriotic work New Jersey has the first place.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Inauguration Visitors Attend Services.

The preacher at the noon-day Lenten services at Epiphany Church, during Inauguration Week was the Rev. Fred B. Budlong, S. T. D., D. D., rector of Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn. The preacher for these services during the week following will be the Rev. G. Freeland Peter, D. D., Canon of Washington Cathedral.

Sunday, March 3, in all the churches showed a marked increase in the congregation, due to the many hundreds of visitors in Washington for the inauguration. Visitors to Washington Cathedral also came in large numbers and were shown the three chapels now completed and other features of unusual interest at the Cathedral.

Bible Class of 1,000.

The Adults' Bible Class, conducted by Dr. Phillips at Epiphany Church, is held on Friday evenings at eight o'clock and is being largely attended. Dr. Phillips has taken for his subject during Lent, "The Lord's Prayer". This is the third year of the existence of this Bible Class, which has numbered in its membership every year approximately one thousand people.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, D. D., Suffragan
Rt. Rev. E. T. Demby, D. D., Suffragan.

Bishop Winchester Better.

The health of the Rt. Rev. James R. Winchester, Bishop of the Diocese, has greatly improved in the last few weeks. On February 7 the Bishop invited the Executive Council of the Diocese to meet in his apartments, and he took part in its sessions. The people of the diocese will be happy to have him again visit the parishes.

During the illness of the Bishop, the Bishop-Suffragan has been most faithful in attending to the affairs of the diocese.

Cornerstone Laid.

The cornerstone of the Parish House of Christ Church, Little Rock, was laid recently. The rector, Rev. W. P. Witsell, had arranged an inspiring program. It will quickly be brought to completion. Then Christ Church will be perfectly equipped, so far as its plant is concerned, to take advantage of its wonderful opportunities.

Y. P. S. L.

The Young People's Service League held its annual convention in Christ Church, Little Rock, recently. The young folks of the diocese seem to have taken on new life. One new chapter with thirty-five members was admitted to membership from St. Paul's, Newport.

Three-Hour Service.

St. John's, Camden, has arranged for its Annual Good Friday service of Three Hours. Ministers of the four other churches in Camden will make the addresses on the Words from the Cross.

R. R. C.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Meeting of Executive Council.

At the quarterly meeting of the Executive Council of the Diocese of Georgia, held in Christ Church, Savannah, February 22, the report of the executive secretary of the Field Department showed that only $23,358.46 had been pledged in the last Every Member Canvass on a total program of $29,240. This has necessitated the Bishop of the Diocese pledging to the National Council only $10,896 on a quota of $12,000. This is the first time the Diocese of Georgia has not pledged its full budget quota since the "pay as you go" policy was inaugurated by the General Convention. The Treasurer's report showed that the full budget quota was paid to the National Council in 1928. An effort is to be made to remedy the situation by letters from the Bishop to delinquent parishes and missions calling their attention to the deficiency and to the embarrassment to the diocese, asking that something be done to raise the amount of their pledges.

The other departments reported as follows to the Council:

The Department of Missions reported a contribution of $950 given by four branches of the Woman's Auxiliary of Savannah as a memorial to the late Mrs. W. L. Wilson, for rebuilding the Church in Pineora, which was burned a year ago. It seems expedient to the Bishop to use the money to enlarge and improve the present church building in Pooler, rather than to rebuild at Pineora where there are only two or three communicants.

The Department of Christian Social Service reported that at the recent conference of the State Department of Public Welfare held in Savannah, Dean Lathrop, executive secretary of the Department of Social Service of the National Council, made a telling address on the subject, "The Church and Social Relations". The vice-chairman of the Department, the Rev. Harry S. Cobey ,of Albany, who was elected a member of the executive committee of the State Department of Public Welfare, stated that this department which is only five years old, has been nationally recognized in state affairs. HOME.

When I go home I shall be very tired
Of struggling for the things that I desired:
But I shall be content to end my quest
Gaining the best things, peace and love and rest.

When I go home I shall be travel-stained,
For winds have beaten me, and storms have rained,
And earth has clung to me by vale and hill,
But He will take me in and love me still.

When I go home how sorry I shall be
Not to have brought more gifts along with me,
Yet though I be a sinner worn and poor,
He will not turn me from my Father's door.

When I go home it will be morning
And I shall hear my own dear people sing,
And see His lighted face; and take my place
Among them, in that sweet time of grace.

When I go home—oh, will it not be heaven
To be accepted, loved, forgiven?
Weariness and sighing are for those who roam:
I shall have found my rest when I go home.

Mid-Lent.

In point-of-time we are now on the second half of Lent.

What does the quantity of Lenten days, already passed, mean to us?

Has there been any large investment of seriousness?

Have we read our Bible, and said our Prayers, with greater care?

Have we exercised our minds with more magnanimity of thought regarding others?

Have we seen, in a clearer light, our personal sins in their naked ugliness?

Have we listened less to the voice of relaxation?

Have we frequented our Church with an awakened keenness to worship?

Have we tried to say the right word to any impressionable soul?

Have we really surrendered ourselves to Christ?

When at the Services of the Church, have we carefully listened, and then faced the issue involved with a determined decisiveness?

Have we given up anything, that we really liked, for Christ's sake?

Have we taken our Communions as often as we could?

Have we read any devotional book?

Have we settled any of the things of the soul, so long neglected in our lives?

Have we cultivated tenderness for the sick and for the sorrowing?

Have we sensed any more deeply the real meaning of death?

Have we learned better to trust and rest in Christ?

Have we advanced in willingness to use that proportion of our money for God, that convinces us as being Christian?

Have we rendered any definite Christian service, either through assignment or of our own selecting?

Have we established more noticeably in our homes Christian leadership, coupled with magnetism of personality?

Have we endeavored to perform our daily duties in a happier spirit, and a more marked zeal?

Are we eager in making such use of Lent's second half, that Easter Day shall mark our greatest personal achievement—in soul advance, in record of sincere worship, in quality of service rendered, and in a genuine financial Thank Offering to God for the Church?—Rev. Wm. Porkess, D. D., in "Parish Bulletin".

For The Southern Churchman.

Our Marriage Customs.

Part II.

Rev. Percy T. Fenn, D. D.

From the Hindoos we get the custom of throwing rice at the bridal pair. Rice, in India, is one of the staples of life, and when it is thrown after or upon the newly-married couple, it is emblematic of life and fruitfulness.

The old shoe which is fastened to the carriage carries us back to the days when it was customary to deliver a shoe as a testimony in transferring a piece of property. When one man sold another a piece of land, he plucked off his shoe, and handed it to the purchaser, and thus completed the transaction. Some writers speak of the shoe as transferring the discipline of the bride from the parents to the husband.

The origin of wedding gifts seems to be found in the ancient custom of bestowing presents upon the parents and relatives of the coveted bride. If the gifts proved acceptable, and were made in sufficient quantity, the daughter was given up.

Frequently the gifts were inadequate, and unavailing, and then the groom was forced to abduct, and carry her off. To do this he was compelled to enlist the services of some trusted friend, and this friend, in course of time, became known as the "best man". Here we have the origin of the "best man".

His office was to assist the groom in getting the girl, and it is his office today to look after a number of little details connected with the wedding.

The bridal veil is a diminutive form of the ancient veil which was always worn by Roman and Grecian brides, and which completely enveloped them.

The wedding-cake has come down to us from the old Roman Confarreation, which was a form of marriage, during which the couple ate a cake made of salt, water, and flour. In this respect we have certainly improved upon the taste of our ancestors.

The bridesmaids were the special friends of the bride, whose duty it was to arrange many of the details of the wedding. The senior bridesmaid was required to attend the bride some days before the ceremony, supervise the making of the bridal-wreath, the decoration of the tables for the wedding-breakfast, and to dress the bride for the wedding.

The publishing of the "Banns" is another ancient custom. This means the proclamation of the fact of the impending wedding, in the parish church, on three successive Sundays before the wedding-day, in order to guard against clandestine, or unlawful unions. This is still done in England, and in many other countries.

And it used to be considered decidedly improper for any bride to listen to her own "Banns".

Cuthbert Bede tells us that "A Worcestershire woman was asked why she did not attend Church on the three Sundays on which her "Banns" of marriage were proclaimed. She replied that she would never dream of doing so unlucky a thing; and on being questioned as to the kind of ill-luck that would have been expected to have followed upon her attendance at church, she said that all the offsprings of such a marriage would be born deaf and dumb; and that she knew a young woman who would persist in going to church to hear her "Banns" "asked out", and whose six children were, in consequence, all deaf and dumb."

We might add that Mary, Queen of Scots, was married with three rings, the middle one a diamond.

Many of the old customs connected with the espousal and betrothal of the bride and groom have fallen into disuse, and, perhaps, the religious significance of the marriage ceremony has become more or less obscured. But one thing is certain, and that is there was greater permanence to the marriage relationship in those olden days than there is today; and it might be better for the future of our homes, and of our nation, if we were to return to those ancient customs, and if we were to hallow them as our fathers did.

The Shepherd Boy.

Doris Nevin*.

"Any boy who runs away may not return."

These words, printed in large letters on a signboard stared at boys every time they went near the gate. None of them seemed to care about the sign, however. They remembered only too well the days after the war when they had been left with no homes and no food until the Americans came and took over that big old house and then when it was cleaned and scrubbed asked all the boys who had been living just anywhere to come and live there.

That was weeks ago, but even yet at dinner bits of bread now and then found their way to a boy's pocket, because he just couldn't be perfectly sure that there would be a dinner the next day. So even though it was a big, cold house and they called it an orphanage, nobody ran away—that is, nobody but Hagop.

Hagop had been pretty ragged and dirty when he came up to the orphanage gate. That was true of all the boys, but Hagop was different from the rest because he had a very shiny button sewed on the front of his shirt and he carried a shepherd's flute.

The Americans never learned much about the home in which Hagop had lived or about his family. All that he cared to talk about was his flock of sheep. They had been his friends, his playmates, everything. He had piped cheerily to them as they wandered over the plains in the summer and when the nights grew cold he snuggled up to them for warmth. Summer and winter he had tended and cared for them. Then something had happened to all the sheep and no one wanted a shepherd boy, so he tucked his flute in his blouse and wandered. He felt that somewhere there must be a flock that needed him, but he could not find one. Finally he was found and brought to us cold, hungry and discouraged.

But if you have roamed the open country it is hard to be shut up in a house with only a yard. So, when the novelty of a bath, clean clothes and a meal every day had worn off, Hagop found life uninteresting.

He did not understand playing with children and would not enter into their games, but would go off by himself and play his flute. The call of the old free life was strong. He would follow me to the gate and look the plains over wistfully down the poplar bordered road that threaded its way through the plains to Ararat. He missed his sheep.

If children in orphanage clothes were ever found in the bazaars or on the street without a written permission from their teacher, they had to be taken to the office and explain what they had been doing, I was not surprised to see Hagop brought in one day, twisting his cap and looking very much ashamed.

"Hagop, why did you run away," I asked sternly. "Don't you remember how hungry you were when you came here? Don't you remember that you were not able to find any sheep?"

"Yes'm," replied Hagop, but as he spoke I knew he was longing for the open country and the sheep.

Winter was on us—Mt. Ararat was snow-covered to its base. Reports came in from outlying villages telling of the need for food, for no crops had been raised since the war. Hagop was only ten and small for his age. If he left us, how would he live through the winter? The silver button caught my eye and inspiration came.

"For an American button, will you stay two months, Hagop?"

The boy hesitated. He longed to be free, but there was cold and hunger. He twisted his one shining button. How the other boys had admired it! It would be great to have two! Then I began to wonder where I could find in the heart of Armenia the other button I had promised him. Americans away out in Armenia did not care to part with their buttons to keep boys in orphanages, especially when a boy did not have sense enough to know when he was well off.

Well, I got the button and Hagop boasted so of the two decorations, on his shirt that the other boys tried to snatch it away. It had been well sewed on, however, and although the boys came away with some black eyes, the button held fast.

"Are you happy, Hagop?" I asked one day.

"Yes," he said, "I am happy. They say there (pointing to the South), I may find sheep, but of course, I shall stay until the American button has been earned."

"He must stay here until winter is over," I thought. "In the spring he can wander, but not in this cold." So came a second inspiration.

"For a British button, would you stay two more months. He looked down the road and considered. He had been told that sheep were scarce. He was getting used to orphanages. Everybody had noticed him because of his two buttons. What would happen if he had a third one?"

"Yes, for a British button," he answered.

Perhaps it would have been easier to find the sheep that Hagop needed for his happiness than to get that third button, but nothing is impossible. With his third button, he really seemed happy. He entered heartily into the games with the other boys. Like all collectors, his "Collection" was the first consideration.

"Sheep are very scarce in this country now," I would say to him. "If you stay here and study and work for a few years till people have enough seed for planting their farms, then there will be plenty of sheep and you will be big enough to take care of a large flock. Men will then be looking for a strong shepherd such as you will be."

Hagop turned away and said nothing. He seldom played his flute and we supposed he had settled down to live and work like the other boys of the orphanage.

Then the snow began to melt. The base of Mt. Ararat showed patches of brown. One day I made my way through rivers of mud to the orphanage.

Hagop had gone. A letter laboriously written had been left on my desk. It read:

"It is lambing season where I'm going. I don't know, but somewhere a shepherd will be needed.—Hagop."

Holding down the paper were his British and his American buttons.

His Prayer Answered.

He asked for strength that he might achieve; he was made weak that he might obey.

He asked for health that he might do greater things; he was given infirmity that he might do better things.

He asked for riches that he might be happy; he was given poverty that he might be wise.

He asked for power that he might have the praise of men; he was given weakness that he might feel the need of God.

He asked for all things that he might enjoy life; he was given life that he might enjoy all things.

He received nothing he asked for, all that he hoped for. His prayer is answered. He is most blessed.—Selected.

Junior's Party.

"I'm giving a party for Junior," Mrs. Jordan said to her neighbor. "Won't you come over for the program?"

"The program?"

"Well, I've asked each child to do some little stunt—sing, dance, recite or play the piano. I couldn't stand the usual games. I'm too nervous."

The neighbor, having healthy, lively children of her own, did drop in, for she was interested to see the result of substituting formality for natural play.

The children were seated in little chairs as if they were in kindergarten, but their attitude was decidedly different. They wriggled and twisted, or they sat tense and uncomfortable.

"Mother, please may we have a relay race?" begged Junior.

"No, Junior, we are going to have the program."

"After that, Mother?"

"No, I told you we would have no running games."

"Mrs. Jordan, may we play Hurdy Gurdy?" asked a little guest. "That isn't running."

"Mercy no, John. Some one might get hurt."

"We don't get hurt at school."

"Well, you might here. I can't take the responsibility."

The neighbor noticed that each child was interested only in his part of the program. When the others did their stunts he was indifferent and sometimes he was plainly bored. But all were well behaved. No one moved from his chair. It was so quiet a little girl went to sleep.

"Are we going to have ice cream?" asked an inquisitive guest as they sat down to the table for refreshments.

"Yes," Mrs. Jordan told them, "and the child who does not talk gets a second helping."

Mrs. Jordan beamed with satisfaction at the result of her bribe. "Notice how quiet they are," she whispered to her neighbor; "why at Jackie's party they all talked at once."

The hush lasted until the children had said their formal good-byes and departed. Even then, Junior sat quiet in his chair seemingly uninterested in his gifts. The neighbor stopped to chat with him, for she saw what his mother did not—saw that Junior considered his party a flat failure. Something had been wrong, and he knew what it was.

It almost seemed to the neighbor as if Mrs. Jordan had planned this party with the idea of saving her furniture, rugs and nerves instead of giving pleasure to her little son and his friends.

It is one thing to restrain children from unsocial conduct and quite another to repress their natural inclinations. It is not necessary that children should shout or be rough in order for them to have a good time, but to repress normal activity and desire is bound to dim their pleasure and, if continued, to bring disastrous results.—Anna M. Brady, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

SHEPHERDS.

I have found strange wisdom in shepherds
Who feed their flocks on a high place,
For there in the long nights, slow dawns and lone evenings,
They see One move apace

Who is the Shepherd of all the world's shepherds,
He of the stabbed heart, scarred brow, hands, feet,
And hear His call echoing over the hilltops,
Compelling, clear and sweet.

They see sheep hurrying from low plains and stark deserts,
Soiled, stumbling, falling up the difficult hill,
And watch Him feed them in greenest pastures
By waters cool and still.

Indeed and there is deep wisdom in shepherds
Who feed their flocks on a high place,
For there in the long nights, slow dawns and lone evenings
They meet God face to face.

SONG FOR CHRISTIAN LABORERS.

Dear Master of our days and years,
How filled with toil Thy life!
Meek Carpenter of Nazareth,
Rebuke our fret and strife.

Renew in us a loving mind,
Reconsecrate our work:
Oh, make our tasks a sacred call,
May we not waste or shirk.

Take from our hearts the greed of gold,
Lend us Thy calm content:
May all our days, from morn to night,
In gratitude be spent.

Winning the Race.

Jimmie had been coddled during his long illness, for every one had acted as though his slightest wish must be granted, and the result was a very selfish boy. This naturally distressed his mother, Mrs. Reimer.

"Jimmie, dear," she said as she overheard him refuse to lend his skates to a less fortunate playfellow, Bill, "if you had no skates or your skates were being repaired, would you not desire Bill to lend you his?" "I suppose so, mother, but then you see I do not need to borrow, for I have everything," and he gave her a big hug which made Mrs. Reimer breathless.

"That is just it, sonny, you should place yourself in the position of others. Just think of their side, and you will be more generous."

Mrs. Reimer was grieved; and as Jim genuinely loved his mother, he said: "Of course, if you want me to lend them I will, mother, but I really need more practice for the race."

"That's fine," said his mother, though she would have preferred to have him lend the skates, because he wanted to rather than for her sake, "take them over now, will you, and on your way back call for your father; he said he would come home for lunch."

Not very cheerfully Jim started off, and on the way he met Bill. "Say, Bill, what is wrong with your skates?"

"Most everything. Dad is fixing them, but he says they will not last very long. I hope they will last throughout race. Of course, I know you are the best skater around here, but you never can tell. You might have an off day, and I'd have a chance to win."

"Well," sighed Jim, for he really did not want to part with the skates, "I've changed my mind. You can use my skates this afternoon, but be sure to bring them back, for I want to do a little practicing myself."

"Gee, you're a peach! Thanks a lot, Jim. I haven't skated for so long a time that I was afraid I'd be rusty and squeak when I moved."

Bill's face glowed with such happiness that Jim went away with just a little glow transplanted to the region of his heart.

"I am the best skater, you know, dad, and I'm sure I'll win the silver skates. Won't you be proud of me?" Jim had called for his father and they were on the way home.

"Proud!" Mr. Reimer's voice shook as he recalled the days when he and his wife anxiously feared that their son might always remain an invalid. "Son, you win that race and you'll get the sweater set you've been speaking about." He gave Jim a playful cuff.

"I'll do it, you'll see. Be there at ten to cheer."

The day of the race was just the finest for the purpose, tingling but not bitterly cold. A large crowd had come to view even the minor events.

At last the big race was started. At the sound of the pistol they were off. Jim, Bill and eight others of ages between ten and thirteen. At first they seemed to be evenly matched, but gradually Jim and Bill drew away. First one seemed to be ahead, but before one could really decide the other had passed. Suddenly Bill wobbled. It took just a second to make the necessary adjustment, but during that time Jim forged ahead; and even though Bill put forth every effort, he could not regain what he had lost. It seemed that Jim would surely win when just before the finishing line, for no visible reason, he stopped to make an adjustment, a slight one, for as soon as Bill had passed he was up and finished second.

After the race Jim received condolences and Bill congratulations, which they both took in good sportsman-like manner.

"Too bad, son," said Mr. Reimer, glancing keenly at Jim's face, "if it weren't for that accident, you would have won the sweater set. Now, I guess it will have to wait a year."

"I guess so, dad," but Jim did not look very doleful; in fact, he smiled, for Bill had just passed with his skates and had told Jim that this time the better skater did not win, but really deserved to.

That evening Mr. Reimer entered the house carrying a large package.

"For me?" inquired Jim, and then seeing the contents. "Why, dad, you said I'd have to wait. I didn't win the race—but this sure is a spiffy set."

"Like it? I'm glad. Who said you didn't win the race? My son, you won a much finer one. Make a clean breast of it to your dad. Why did you pretend that something was wrong with your skates?"

"Pretend? Oh, only," and Jim stopped embarrassed. "Well, my skates are good, and Bill's are a wreck. The prize meant a lot to him. I kept thinking all the time of what mother had said, and gee, dad, don't tell any one, but it's funny. I really—don't laugh—felt more elated when I lost this race than when I won the race two years ago. Did you see Bill's face?"—Christian Advocate.

How Helen Was a Missionary.

One day at Sunday School Helen heard that little girls could be missionaries. She came home full of her new idea, and was scarcely able to talk of anything but the fact that her teacher, Miss Rose, had asked each child to be a missionary that week. This is what they were to do—they were each to find some little boy or girl who did not go to Sunday School and invite them to go.

"I want to ask somebody, but I don't know anybody that doesn't go," said Helen, when she told her mother about it.

"How about Mona?" asked her mother.

Helen looked up in surprise. "I suppose she hasn't any clothes that would do to wear to Sunday School," she said.

"Perhaps one thing for the missionary to do would be to help her get some of the right kind of clothes," said her mother; and Helen's face brightened as she cried, "Oh, may I give her some of mine?"

The next morning, as soon as Mona's mother came, Helen ran out to ask if Mona could go with her to Sunday School. The tired looking mother looked very much surprised, and then her eyes filled with tears. "I didn't suppose anybody wanted her to come," she said. "But if you do, she shall go just as soon as I can buy her something fit to wear."

"But I want her to go next Sunday!" cried Helen. "She can have my new plaid dress, if you will only let her go."

Then Helen's mother came and they talked it all over together, and at last Mona's mother promised to let Helen do as she wished.

Helen's eyes shone with happiness as she took Mona up to Miss Rose on Sunday whispering joyfully: "I brought one! I brought one! and I think it's so nice to be a missionary that I'm going to be one."—Louise M. Oglevee, The Brethren Evangelist.

Two Little Girls and a Doll.

One little girl was the daughter of an Apache Indian chief. The other little girl was the daughter of a United States Army officer. The doll had rosy cheeks, blue eyes and had traveled in a box all the way from "back East".

It all happened years ago, when the United States Government was trying to allot certain lands to the Indians. Some of the Apaches were not satisfied with their share, so they made ready for war and gathered in every direction to fight the white man.

"The Apaches are gathering for war," was the message sent to the Government. Immediately large numbers of soldiers were ordered to the nearest fort to keep constant watch on the Indians.

The first Apache captured by the soldiers was very small. She was a little girl, who strayed too far from her wigwam and could not find her way back. The Government soldiers found her, tired and frightened, and took her on to their own fort. They tried to show her that they wanted to be friends, but their strange white faces terrified her, and she cried and cried. One soldier after another tried to comfort her, but the more they tried the louder she wailed. The commanding officer did not know what to do next. He shook his head in despair. Then he said to his men, "Wait a minute; I have an idea".

He called his little daughter. "Here's a little girl who has come to visit you," he said, as he led the little lost Apache toward her. She walked shyly up to the little Indian girl, hugging in her arms her new doll, which had come in the box from her friends in the East. As soon as the little Indian saw the doll she forgot to cry any more, and held out both her arms for it.

At first it seemed there would be another war. The little girls were like their fathers. Both wanted the same doll, as their fathers wanted the same land.

"Won't you let your little friend play with your doll a while?" asked the army officer coaxingly.

Then he waited until his daughter politely handed her doll to the daughter of the Apache chief. After that they were friends. They sat down together, they ate together, and then went to sleep together. When the little Apache awoke, some of the soldiers took her back to her father's wigwam, marching under a flag of truce. She was delighted to be back home and ran around showing all her friends the doll which the little "pale-face" had given her.

Bright and early the next day an Indian came to the fort to return the doll.

"Did you understand that was a present from my little girl to your little girl?" asked the officer in command. "You are to keep it."

Back in the wigwam the little Apache held up her arms eagerly as the doll was returned to her.

At the fort the soldiers waited for the attack of the Indians. Everything was very still, and soon the message came that the various bands of Apaches were breaking up and going in peace to the land which the Government had set apart for them. The soldiers could not understand.

"Seems like the red men aren't going to fight us after all. What do you suppose has happened?

"Do you suppose it could be the doll that has charmed 'em?"

The soldiers laughed, but this was exactly what had happened. The Apache Chief was so pleased with the doll and the kindness of the white man to his little daughter, that he declared the war off.—Mrs. E. C. Cronk.

FLOWERS.

Maude Mumma.

Flowers sent from Heaven above,
Come to tell us of His love;
Of the life beyond the grave
And His wondrous power to save.

Brightest gems from gardens fair,
Tell of Jesus' tender care;
Can you look on blooms like these,
And not wish His heart to please?

How Far Have You Sailed?

The stocking just wouldn't go on right, although Allan tugged and tugged. Sometimes it twisted round and round so that it seemed like the stripes on a barber's pole. And the leg of his union suit would bunch up under it, so that it looked like a knobby Christmas stocking.

"Brother," said Allan, as he jerked it off for the third time, "I'm not going to try any more. I'll just call for mother."

He started toward the door, but something stopped him on the way. It was the little ship which he had made to look as nearly like the ship in which Columbus sailed as he possibly could.

"Columbus kept on and on and on,"

he thought. "He didn't stop even when his sailors wanted to throw him into the sea and when there was no land in sight after weeks and weeks. If he could do that, I guess I can keep on trying until I learn to dress myself. If I stopped at a stocking, it would be just the same as if Columbus had turned his ships around when he was half-way across."

Back Allan went and picked up the stocking. As he worked he repeated some lines from a poem he had learned:

"What shall I say, brave adm'r'l, say,
If we sight naught but seas at dawn?"
"Why, you shall say, at break of day, Sail on! sail on! sail on, and on!"

And this time the stocking went on straight and smooth.

How far have you sailed in the things you are trying to do?—Martina Gardner Owen.

Must.

There is a word in our language which every fellow has to get acquainted with sooner or later, and that is "must". It is a word which ties us up and makes us do what we don't want to do, or prevents us from doing what we want to do. It is a hard and unbending word, but the world would be a pretty difficult place to live in if we didn't have it. "Must" is the backbone of all the discipline of life. We must eat. We must drink. We must sleep. We must respect the property of our neighbors.

Everybody struggles against "must" because it is natural for everybody to do what he wants to do, but nobody can beat it. That is the thing to realize. All your life you will be encountering this word, and the sooner you get it into your head that the "musts" have to be regarded, the happier you are going to be.—Exchange.

A PRETTY GIRL.

Why, yes, her face is freckled,
And maybe, too, her nose
Is sort of round and puggy,
Her mouth too big—but Rose
Is just the name that fits her
"Like paper on the wall!"
She's always sweet and smiling,
She never thinks at all
About herself, her wishes!
It's always other folks
She's trying to make happy.
She knows just how to coax
The smiles to troubled faces.
She's darling, so you see
The reason why we girls think Rose
Is pretty as can be!

The Wrong Button.

"Dear me," said little Janet, "I buttoned just one button wrong, and it makes all the rest go wrong," and she tugged and fretted as if the poor button was at fault for her trouble.

"Patience, patience, my dear," said mamma. "The next time look out for the first wrong button, then you'll keep all the rest right. And," added mamma, "look out for the first wrong deed of any kind; another and another is sure to follow."

Janet remembered how one day, not so long ago, she had struck the baby, Alice. That was the first wrong deed. Then she had denied having done it. That was another. Then she was unhappy and cross all day because she told a lie. What a long list of buttons fastened wrong just because one was wrong.—Picture World.

How Dutch Windmills 'Talk"

Holland possesses over ten thousand windmills, dotted all over the country, and forming most striking features of the landscape. To most observers they all look very much alike, but the "set" of the sails, when the arms are at rest, is capable of considerable variation, and the resourceful millers take advantage of these different settings in order to convey interesting items of news to the countryside. Using a well-understood code of signals, they actually make their windmills "talk."

The idea is extremely ancient; it is even said that semaphore signaling started from this source.

When there is a wedding in a Dutch miller's family he sets the sails at a certain angle, and often decks the arms with flags and streamers so that all neighbours within eye-range can learn of the happy event.

Other variations of angle proclaim the birth of a baby boy or girl, a request for the services of the millwright, and a dozen other little messages. If the miller sets his mill-sails in the form of a cross there is sadness in the family, for this position denotes a death. During the Great War sundry others signals were passed on with incredible swiftness by means of the "talking mills."

CHILD'S EVENING PRAYER.

Father, in Thy presence kneeling,
Lovingly I pray to Thee.
Through the long day Thou hast kept me:
May the night from harm be free.

Many gifts Thy love hath given,
Many joys the day hath brought.
Praise and love I offer to Thee;
Help me serve Thee as I ought.

Pardon each bad word and action,
Cleanse my heart from every sin,
Make me ever more like Jesus,
Make His Spirit dwell within.

Bless my parents, friends and loved ones,
Send Thy love to every heart,
May all men and nations serve Thee,
Nevermore from Thee depart.

OTHER-WORLD THINGS.

F. B. Stone.

At night when all the lights are out,
My thoughts begin to roam,
Unhindered by surrounding things,
Familiar sights of home.

In reaching upward for new light
The door is left ajar,
And in there steal some precious thoughts
Come from a world afar.

A silent voice speaks to my soul,
Than self it seems more near,
And in the dark it stays with me
And I its message hear.

I write them down, these precious words,
For you some day to read,
And long before they get to you
Myself their message heed.

For first of all they are for me,
And may be then for you,
As I cannot withhold the words,
Because I know they're true.

They lift me up from little things,
To where the larger grow,
Instead of things my eyes see here,
They other-world things show.

And for a little space I live
Where heavenly currents flow,
That bring to me upon the earth
The truths that angels know.

And for awhile I live above
Myself, things of today,
And glimpse the things that will endure
Forever and for aye.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

reported that Mr. Thomas B. Mimms, Director of Division of Adult Delinquency, will speak at the Diocesan Convention to be held in Augusta in April on "Jails".

The Department of Religious Education announced that the annual convention of the Joint-Diocesan Young People's Service League of Georgia and Atlanta will be held in Savannah in May and that the plans are nearly completed for conducting the fifth annual camp for young people on St. Simon's Island, Ga. Nine hundred and thirty-nine persons were cared for in the Christmas boxes of the Church Schools of the diocese valued at $400, and sent to Liberia; Virgin Isles; Leper Colony, Canal Zone; Seaman's Institute, Mobile, and in the diocese. The Department was granted an hour for conference at the Diocesan Convention.

The Publicity Department presented a plan for organizing publicity committees in parishes and missions to make definite use of the printed work, and received the endorsement of the Council for putting it into effect.

A proposed budget with a reduction of $1,550 was presented by the Finance Department and was adopted. A clergyman of the diocese will be sent to the Rural Conference in Vicksburg, Miss., in June, provision for his expenses being made by the Finance Department.

The Bishop reported receiving a recommendation from the Diocese of Atlanta that there be five representatives from each diocese on the board of trustees of the Fort Valley High and Industrial School, which is now a joint project of the two dioceses. The Bishop also stated one of the secretaries of the Field Department of the National Council will speak on the second evening of the Diocesan Convention. The meeting of the Council closed with expressions of regret to the Rev. W. A. Jonnard, a member of the Council, who will leave in April for his new charge in Manhattan, Kan.

E. D. J.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop

Here and There in the Diocese.

Bishop Larned preached at the second of the Brooklyn "Hill Zone" united Lenten services, which was held in the Church of the Incarnation.

Bishop Stires is emphasizing the call to evangelism in many places in the diocese, and the daily papers, in their reports of his addresses, give further publicity to his messages. Headlines, however, are not always felicitous: "Proselytism Urged by Bishop Stires," says the New York Times; and the Brooklyn Eagle, "Seek Converts, is Stires' Plea to P. E. Laymen".

The new St. John's Chapel, Dunton, in the Parish of Grace Church, Jamaica, was used for the first time on Sunday last, the Rev. Henry Mesier, vicar, celebrating Holy Communion. After the evening service the same day, there was a reception for members of the congregation and their friends in the community.

The Rev. Alban Richey, Jr., rector of Holderness School, New Hampshire, has recently made several addresses in this diocese on behalf of the Church School idea. His view of the matter is broad and his presentation convincing. He addressed the congregations of St. Mary's and of St. Paul's (Flatbush), Brooklyn, and he was the speaker at a meeting of the Church Club of the Diocese.

The report of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education regarding the birthday thank-offering, Christmas-box work and the Little Helpers' offering for 1928 has been published. The birthday thank-offering resulted in a gift of $1,821.38 from fifty-seven schools, for Hooker School, Mexico City. Christmas boxes were sent by seventy-five schools, and 2,608 children were thus provided for. The Little Helpers in twenty-three schools gave $404.85, which was equally divided between St. Agnes' Hospital, Raleigh, N. C., and Japanese kindergartens.

Noon-day services, 12:05 to 12:35, are being held daily except Saturday in Grace Church, Jamaica. The church is well located for the purpose, in the business district of this old town, and the present effort, made quietly and without advertising, shows that there are some people eager for spiritual refreshment in the midst of busy days.

A meeting of the Priests' Fellowship of the Diocese of Long Island was held at St. James' Church, Brooklyn, on February 25. After the service of Holy Communion there was a discussion of the future policy of the Fellowship and certain definite conclusions were reached. The Rev. R. D. Pope was re-elected President; the Rev. W. J. Gardner, D. D., was elected Vice-President; the Rev. W. J. de Forest, Secretary, and the Rev. G. D. Viets, Treasurer. Twenty-two were present.

The Rev. H. H. Chapman, of Anvik, Alaska, son of the well-known missionary, the Rev. John W. Chapman, who has spent all his ministry there, talked to a group of leaders of the Church School Service Program at the Diocesan House recently.

THE MISSION HOME.

St. Andrew's Mountain Mission

PIEDMONT PARISH, MARSHALL, VA.
Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Rector.
A STATEMENT.

About two years ago we began making special appeal for funds with which to purchase a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00, which will be due early in April, and we wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of edbt. Who will help?

The late Bishop Brown, on two occasions, said, that he considered the work being done at St. Andrew's one of the very best social service works anywhere in the diocese.

The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, endorses th's appeal.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $..... , to be paid in cash or istalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

of Austin Y. P. S. L., told of the National Young People's Conference at Sewanee. Bishop Quin in his talk on "Where Do We Go From Here"? told us what had happened to boys and girls who had been members of the Service League in 1921-1923, what they were doing and whether or not they were still active in Church work. He said a number of boys and girls were studying for life work and a goodly per cent were teaching in the Church School, Counsellors of the Y. P. S. L. and otherwise active in the work of the Church.

The Rev. Charles Warner, of Washington, D. C., the Council speaker; Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, also of Washington, and the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, National Student Secretary, were our guests at the banquet.

The opening service in St. Paul's Church followed the banquet. The Rev. C. Leslie Glenn preached on "Friendship With Christ", carrying out the theme of the Council "World Friendship".

Saturday morning began with a Corporate Communion. The business session of the Council followed; a discussion on "Going Forward in 1929" was

What's become of the "Superfluous Woman?"

THESE were the women that the census taker used to put down as "Females without Occupation." You know. Women with grown-up families. And the familiar ailing relatives that had to be supported by some other member of the family.

What's become of these so-called "superfluous women?" Health has everything to do with it. Just talk to women who've been successful along their own particular lines. They'll all tell you they take Nujol regularly.

"I learned that good habit from our school doctor," you'll be told. "She advised all the girls to take it, especially whenever we had to cut down on our regular exercise. You know how headachy and dull you're apt to feel. Well, you'd be surprised to see what a difference it makes if you take some Nujol for a few days beforehand."

No harm trying. For Nujol can't possibly upset you, even when you're below par. It contains absolutely no medicine or drugs. Perfected by the Nujol

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden. D. D., Bishop

St. Mary's, Magdalena, An Appeal.

This is the twenty-fourth year of the work of the Rev. Hunter Lewis, in New Mexico. In 1905 he had one mission—St. James, Wesilla Park, a college work. Since then the work has grown to fifteen missions, embracing almost all of three counties, a distance of one hundred and seventy-five miles.

St. Mary's, Magdalena, the most northern of this group of missions, must be repaired and painted, inside and out; also a chimney created. It will cost $200. Friends have given twenty-five dollars, the Bishop has promised fifty dollars, and we, twelve communicants and five little children, members, must do the rest.

That is what they are doing, from samples of woolens donated: they are making one hundred and twenty-five squares for a quilt. This is almost completed. This is what the missionary is going to do: Put on each square the surname of each person donating a dollar. This is done by chain-stitching, at which he is an adept.

This is the appeal; what I am asking you to do, send me one dollar with your permission to put your surname on a square. If you would prefer not putting your surname, let me put "Lewis" on it. It is easier to write my surname than another's. "I love to work; please keep me busy." Then St. Mary's may be put in shape by Easter The quilt will go to keep warm the little orphans of the Albuquerque Home.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thos. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop.

Bishop Darst conducted a mission the first week in Lent in Emmanuel Church, Cumberland Md., the Rev. H. F. Kloman, rector.

Careful Firemen.

Captain Hurworth of the Church Army, in charge of the East Carolina Van, returned to the diocese after spending several months in Maryland. His itinerary for two months, beginning March 3, will take him to Holy Trinity, Hertford; Good Shepherd, Wilmington; St. Phillip's, Southport; Trinity, Chocowinity; Zion, Jessama; and St. John's Winton.

Careful Fireman.

St. Mary's Church, Kinston, caught fire from a defective flue soon after the early service on the Second Sunday in Lent. The careful firemen saved the altar and the window above the altar. The rest of the building, including the organ and the handsome carpet were damaged to the extent of $20,000. The vestry met on that day and decided on immediate restoration. S. G.

Personal Notes

Rev. H. Allen Griffith is supplying at Takoma Park Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., pending the call and acceptance of a new rector. The rectorship was made vacant by the resignation of the Rev. M. Young, who is traveling in the Holy Land.

ORDINATIONS.

Charles James Gunnell was ordained deacon by Bishop McElwain on Friday in Ember Week, February 22, 1929, in the Oratory of Seabury Divinity School. Rev. Dr. F. L. Palmer presented the candidate, and Rev. Dr. F. F. Kramer preached the sermon.

The Rev. Mr. Gunnell will continue his studies at Seabury Divinity School for this academic year, and he will also do missionary work under the direction of the Archdeacon.

The Rev. John B. Pennell, of Pasco, Wash., was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop E. M. Cross at the February meeting of the Convocation of Spokane. The Rev. A. L. Bramhall presented the candidate. Bishop F. W. Faber, D. D., preached the sermon. The Rev. Mr. Pennell will continue his work at Pasco and Kannewick, where he has been stationed heretofore.

Mr. Battle McLester was ordered Deacon by the Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee, on the Second Sunday after Epiphany, January 20, 1929, in St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Oliver J. Hart, D. D., who also preached the sermon. The Litany was read by the Rev. Lyle J. Kilvington, and the Epistle by the Rev. Arthur G. Wilson. The Rev. James R. Sharp served as chaplain to the Bishop and read the Preface to the Ordinal, and the Rev. James R. Helms dead the Call to the Ministry.

The Rev. Mr. McLester, who was formerly a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will minister to the congregation of Grace Memorial Church, Chattanooga, under the direction of the rector of St. Paul's Church.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Henry S. Streeter, retired minister in the Diocese of Northern Indiana, died at Elkhart, Ind., on Monday, February 11, from heart trouble.

A requiem was said for him at St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Mishawaka at 7:30 Thursday morning. Burial services were conducted in St. John's, Bristol, at 2:30 P. M., by Bishop Gray, assisted by the Rev. W. J. Lockton, rector, and the Very Rev. Lewis C. Rogers and the Rev. E. E. Smith.

Man Needs the Church.

The Church is the one institution in this world which is definitely, specifically and divinely charged with the mission of bringing cold waters to thirsty souls of earth: the good news of God's love, God's providence, God's redemption; the good news of Christ's incarnation, of His blameless and beneficent life, of His revelation of His Father, of His sacrifice of Himself as He taught and loved the world, of the proof of His power in the fact of His resurrection, and of the promise of eternal life for His disciples; the good news of the enlightening of human souls by the Holy Spirit, of the forgiveness of sin, of the purifying of heart and life, and of the preparation here for a glorious life of triumphant service hereafter. Language fails as we try to describe, and imagination halts as we try to conceive, the greatness and beneficence of the ministry of the church to our human souls, in this age and in every age, in this land and in every land where the gospel is preached. Man needs the church and will ever need the church as long as human hearts know sin and sorrow and yearning.—Dr. O. C. Wal-

THE CHILD OF LONG AGO.

For the sake of one small Child of long ago
I shall go down dark alleyways—and dim—
To find the children there and give the gifts
I could not bring to Him.

And for His sake I shall go seeking those Who have forgotten stars may shine for them,
To tell them of one everlasting star:
The Star of Bethlehem.

For the sake of one small Child I shall be kind.
He was so kind through life to those who came
To seek Him in the throng—to touch His hand,
Or call Him by His name.

And for that Child's dear sake I shall be glad.
And I shall place a candle, slim and white,
Upon my sill that it may light the way
For those who walk at night.

And if I mark where others bear a load
And lend a hand until the burden lifts,
Perhaps—as He accepted gold and myrrh—
He will accept my gifts.

—Grace Crowell in Holland's.

Ebb-Tide, Sir!

Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson.

We were coming down the Rappahannock River, one of the most beautiful tributaries of the Chesapeake Bay, and I was sitting in the pilot-house as the guest of the captain of the vessel. As we neared one of the numerous landings that dot the winding river on either side, the quartermaster blew the whistle for the landing. Standing on the look-out, the pilot called out, "Ebb-tide, Sir!" Responding, the captain rang up the engineer and the boat turned in midstream and we tied up at the wharf with the stern of the vessel pointing downstream.

When the whistle has blown for my last landing on earth, my Pilot will say to me, "Ebb-tide, Sir!" and my bark will turn in the stream of life and I shall go to my rest in the reverse position through life.

I shall not be afraid of the new undertaking: I shall not shudder at the change. My Pilot is watching the course of my life: He knows the river that many dread: He will care for me and guide me into the harbor of the blest.

HE Who Sacrificed Commands "Cleanse The Lepers"

Is there a Christian who does not approach the Easter season with a hart full of joy that the Saviour who offered Himself as our sacrifice arose to live with us forever? Thus He gave everlasting life to His command, "Cleanse the Lepers."

Living with her leper father and mother, what would have been her fate?

The Mission to Lepers maintains 20 homes where children, like this little Filipino girl, are rescued from leprosy contagion and educated for useful Christian lives.

$40 gives complete care to a leper patient for one year.

$30 gives this care to an untainted child (Leprosy is not hereditary.)

$10 provides two years' medical treatment for a leper in one of our clinics. Incipient cases can be cured in this period.

$2 provides four pairs of sandals to protect mutilated feet.

The American Mission To Lepers, Inc.
156 Fifth Avenue, New York

Two million lepers—homeless' hopeless, outcasts—are living lives of misery and menacing healthful communities.

The American Mission to Lepers, representing all the Foreign Boards by co-operation, aids lepers and their children in 103 colonies in 20 countries. Receiving new life in the Gospel while skilled medical men give them new life physically, they truly experience the power of the resurrection.

Its Four Objectives Are:

1. To preach the Gospel to the Lepers.
2. To relieve their pitiable suffering.
3. To supply their simple wants.
4. To free the world from Leprosy.

Will you help us make the joy of Easter felt in the lives of those whom the Risen Christ commended to our care?

FLEMING H. REVELL, Treasurer,
156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Enclosed you will find $_____, as my response to Christ's command to "Cleanse the Lepers."

LETTER FROM GENERAL LEE TO LORD ACTON

(Republished by request).

This letter, written while General Lee was president of Washington College, is unique, since its author was extremely cautious and reticent among his own people on the subject which he here discussed freely with his foreign correspondent. It will be found in Lord Acton Correspondence I, 302-305.

Lexington, Vir., 15 Dec. 1866.

Sir,—although your letter of the 4th ulto. has been before me some days unanswered, I hope you will not attribute it to a want of interest, but to my inability to keep pace with my correspondence. As a citizen of the South, I feel deeply indebted to you for the sympathy you have evinced in its cause, and am conscious that I owe your kind consideration of myself to my connection with it. The influence of current opinion in Europe upon the current politics of America must always be salutary; and the importance of the questions now at issue in the United States, involving not only constitutional government in this country, but the progress of universal liberty and civilization, invests your proposition with peculiar value, and will add to the obligation which every true American must owe you for your efforts to guide that opinion aright. Amid the conflicting statements and sentiments in both countries, it will be no easy task to discover the truth, or to relieve it from the mass of prejudice and passion, with which it has been covered by party spirit. I am conscious of the compliment conveyed in your request for my opinion as to the light in which American politics should be viewed, and had I the ability, I have not the time to enter upon a discussion, which was commenced by the founders of the constitution and has been continued to the present day. I can only say that while I have considered the preservation of the constitutional power of the General Government to be the foundation of our peace and safety at home and abroad, I YET BELIEVE THAT THE MAINTENANCE OF THE RIGHTS AND AUTHORITY RESERVED TO THE STATE AND TO THE PEOPLE NOT ONLY ESSENTIAL TO THE ADJUSTMENT AND BALANCE OF THE GENERAL SYSTEM, BUT THE SAFEGUARD TO THE CONTINUANCE OF A FREE GOVERNMENT. I CONSIDER IT AS THE CHIEF SOURCE OF STABILITY TO OUR POLITICAL SYSTEM, WHEREAS THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATES INTO ONE VAST REPUBLIC, SURE TO BE AGGRESSIVE ABROAD AND DESPOTIC AT HOME, WILL BE THE CERTAIN PERCURSOR OF THAT RUIN WHICH HAS OVERWHELMED ALL THOSE THAT HAVE PRECEDED IT.

I need not refer one so well acquainted as you are with American history to the State papers of Washington and Jefferson, the representatives of the federal and democratic parties, denouncing consolidation and centralization of power, as tending to the subversion of State Government and to despotism. The New England States, whose citizens are the fiercest opponents of the Southern states, did not always avow the opinions they now advocate. Upon the purchase of Louisiana by Jefferson, they virtually asserted the right of secession through their prominent men; and in the convention which assembled at Hartford in 1814, they threatened the disruption of the Union unless the war should be discontinued. The assertion of this right has been repeatedly made by their politicians when their party was weak, and Massachusetts, the leading state in hostility to the South, declares in the preamble to her constitution, that the people of that commonwealth "have the sole exclusive right of governing themselves as a free sovereign and independent state, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled." Such has been in substance the language of other governments, and such the doctrine advocated by the leading men of the country for the last seventy years. Judge Chase, the present Chief Justice of the United States, as late as 1850, is reported to have stated in the Senate, of which he was a member, that he "knew of no remedy in case of the refusal of a state to perform its stipulations," thereby acknowledging the sovereignty and independence of state action. But I will not wary you with the unprofitable discussion. Unprofitable because the judgment of reason has been displaced by the arbitrament of war, waged for the purpose as avowed of maintaining the union of states. If, therefore, the result of the war is to be considered as having decided that the union of the states is inviolable and perpetual under the constitution, it naturally follows that it is as incompetent for the general government to impair its integrity by the exclusion of a state, as for the states to do so by secession; and that the existence and right of a state by the constitution are as indestructible as the union itself. The legitimate consequence then must be the perfect equality of rights of all the states; the exclusive right of each to regulate its internal affairs under rules established by the constitution, and THE RIGHT OF EACH STATE TO PRESCRIBE FOR ITSELF THE QUALIFICATIONS OF SUFFRAGE. The South has contended only for the supremacy of the constitution, and the just administration of the laws made in pursuance of it. VIRGINIA TO THE LAST MADE GREAT EFFORTS TO SAVE THE UNION, and urged harmony and compromise. Senator Douglas, in his remarks upon the compromise bill recommended by the committee of thirteen in 1861, stated that every member from the South, including Messrs. Toombs and Davis, expressed their willingness to accept the proposition of Senator Crittenden from Kentucky, as a final settlement of the controversy. if sustained by the republican party, and THE ONLY DIFFICULTY IN THE WAY OF AN AMICABLE ADJUSTMENT WAS WITH THE REPUBLICAN PARTY. WHO THEN IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE WAR? Although the South would have preferred any honorable compromise to the fratricidal war which has taken place, she now accepts in good faith its constitutional results, and receives without reserve the amendment which has already been made to the constitution for the extinction of slavery. That is an event that has been long sought, though in a different way, and by none has it been more earnestly desired than by the citizens of Virginia. In other respects I trust that the constitution may undergo no change, but that it may be handed down to succeeding generations in the form we received it from our forefathers. The desire I feel that the Southern states should possess the good opinion of one whom I esteem as highly as yourself, has caused me to extend my remarks further than I intended, and I fear it has led me to exhaust your patience. If what I have said should serve to give any information as regards American politics, and enable you to enlighten public opinion as to the true interest of this distracted country, I hope you will pardon its prolixity.

In regard to your inquiry as to my being engaged in preparing a narrative of the campaigns in Virginia, I regret to state that I progress slowly in the collection of the necessary documents for its completion. I particularly feel the loss of the official returns showing the small numbers with which the battles were fought. I have not seen the work of the Prussian officer you mention and therefore cannot speak of his accuracy in this respect—with sentiments of great respect, I remain your obt. Servant,

R. E. LEE.

DOMINUS FIRMAMENTUM ISIN 1835

Vol. 94. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 16, 1929. No. 11.

THE FINAL ISSUE

The final issue in respect to Christianity is—whether the Bible is the fully inspired, inerrant, infallible Word of God. If it be, then all question as to miracle and doctrine is definitely and dynamically settled; and there is nothing for the Christian to do but sail quietly and restfully on the waveless sea of faith.

If you reject it as such, then you are in the troubled waters of reason, perpetual guess, the black darkness of torturing doubt and the unrest of soul for which there is no cure.

It is to be remembered beyond all question that faith is not a matter of evidential conviction, but the pure, unqualified gift of God. If happily you have it, you may, and you will, realize the truth of the Scripture statement that there is "peace in believing."—I. M. Haldeman, D. D.

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

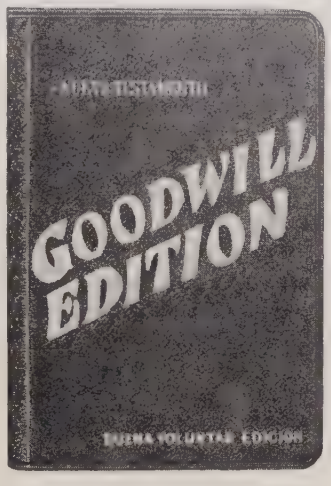
A MILLION "GOODWILL" TESTAMENTS for LATIN AMERICA

"I WANT TO HAVE SOME TESTAMENTS AT WORK FOR ME IN SOUTH AMERICA"

Writes a lawyer in Washington, D. C. He says:



"I want to have some Testaments at work for me in South America, and enclose check toward the campaign for a million copies. It is a great joy to me to know I have some Testaments doing their blessed work in China."

The Opportunity of a Lifetime

We want the readers of The Southern Churchman to share in the joy and blessing of giving God's Word to the people of Latin America who have been so long without it.

Like the lawyer in Washington, you will surely wish to send Testaments to "work for you" in the hearts of boys and girls, farmers and merchants, prisoners and policemen, students and officials, soldiers and sailors, Indians, and all the various classes in these lands.

The Testaments are neat, well bound books, printed chiefly in Spanish and Portuguese. The cost of producing a Testament and placing it in the hands of a person in Latin America is only 25 cents a copy.

President Hoover's Good Will Tour has been a providential preparation for our campaign to distribute carefully and prayerfully a million "Goodwill Testaments" among the people of Latin America. It is surely the opportunity of a lifetime for the members of The Southern Churchman to share in sending this special "Goodwill Edition" at this moment.

The Testaments you send to "work for you" in Latin America may lead one or many to decision for Christ. A missionary to Brazil said: "In every case the person who read the Book was led to Christ."

What Others Are Saying and Doing

My Heart Has Been Burdened.—"I am profoundly interested in your great and glorious work, and shall earnestly pray for its triumphant success. My heart has been burdened for just such a movement, and I wish I could send you a much larger contribution."—A Boston minister who sends a check for $25.00.

A Great Work.—"Am so delighted that you have undertaken a campaign for Latin America. It is a great work, and God has promised that His Word shall not return unto Him void."—The writer enclosed a check for $200.00.

Nothing Gives Me Such Joy.—"Nothing gives me such joy as to be a helper in giving people God's Word. It means more and more to me each day, and I am realizing more each day just what the Word can do. It surely is quick and powerful."

25 cents pays the cost of producing and distributing one Testament

$2.50	will send	10 Testaments
$5.00	will send	20 Testaments
$25.00	will send	100 Testaments
$250.00	will send	1,000 Testaments
$1,000.00	will send	4,000 Testaments

How Many Will You Send?

Never-ending praise unto Him for this Blessed Word."

More Than Glad to Give.—"I am more than glad to give to this cause. Latin America has been on my heart for several years, and I will continue praying."

Will Enlist Prayer.—"We are in sympathy with your work, and will pray in the home, and enlist Bible classes and prayer-meetings to pray."

The Holy Spirit May Speak.—"I am enclosing $5.00 toward Million Testaments Campaign, praying the Holy Spirit may speak to every one who sends God's precious Word."

Delightful and Untaught People.—"My heart rebounded with joy at the prospect of giving the Gospel, through the Word itself, to these delightful and untaught people."

A Missal Calendar Given to Each Donor

An Annual Bible Reading Calendar, giving a most helpful plan of reading the Bible through in a year, will be sent free of cost to each one who makes a donation for sending the Testaments to Latin America.

The Calendar is a work of art, and will be a beautiful ornament for your Bible. The Calendar is lithographed in colors and gold, after the style of the missals of the middle ages that were used in illuminating Bible and other manuscripts.

When sending your own donation or that of your church, or society, or class, let us know how many Calendars to send so that one may be given to each donor.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Every man's heart is either a sepulchre or an altar.—Dr. F. N. Parker.

Christianity is the only religion that can go anywhere and succeed.—Robert Speer.

We cannot say
What lips are praising us today.
We cannot tell
Whose prayers ask God to guard us well.
But kindness lives
Beyond the memory of him who gives.
—Exchange.

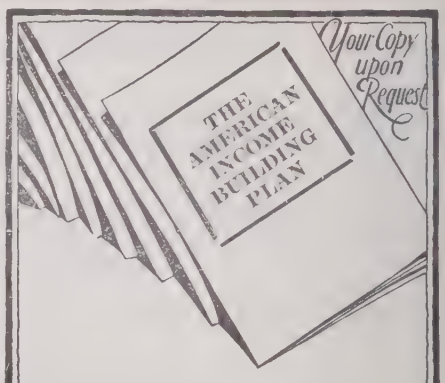
We may, at times, have our hearts wounded, but if we are really following Christ they will never be embittered.—Dr. Wm. Porkess.

"Everything that liberates the spirit without a corresponding growth in self-mastery is pernicious."

Christ's joy would be incomplete if we were not with Him in the Father's House. It would diminish our gladness, our anticipation of supreme bliss, if we did not know that our presence with Him would heighten His own happiness. —R. W. Dale, D. D.

I gave up all for Christ, and what have I found? I found everything in Him.—John Calvin.

God gives us always strength enough and sense enough for what He wants us to do.—Ruskin.



"Ask God to give thee skill
In comfort's art,
That thou mayst consecrated be
And set apart
Unto a life of sympathy,
For heavy is the weight of ill
In every heart;
And comforters are needed much
Of Christlike touch."

Calm Soul of all things, makes it mine
To feel amid the city's jar,
That there abides a peace of Thine
Man did not make and can not mar.
The will to neither strive nor cry,
The power to feel with others give;
Calm, calm me more, nor let me die
Before I have begun to live.
—Matthew Arnold.

Helpless and sad, O Christ, we come to Thee!
Thou for our sake wast to the desert led,
Unharmed didst cross temptations' stormy sea,
That we, Thy children, might be comforted.
—R. H. Baynes.

It is easy to have a few virtues in a high degree of perfection; the difficult thing is to have all virtues in their due proportion and harmony.—Selected.

If we measure our ability to work for God by our own ability to do it, we must not be surprised if God takes us at our word and the results are small; but if we are trustful enough to believe that it is God and not we, by whom the work is done, we shall surely find that the blessing to be according to His power, out of all proportion to our strength.—Braithwaite.

TIDEWATER TALES

A book into which is gathered the folklore, traditions and history of Tidewater Virginia. Written in a delightful informal style by Prof. William C. Garnett.

The President of a College in South Carolina writes: "I have never read a work of this kind the style of which I have found more attractive, simple and yet elegant, interesting but never monotonous."

A prominent representative of a Publishing Co. writes: "This book will be read by our children and children's children. I could read 'A Fox Hunt 'Fo de War' every week."

A prominent attorney in Washington writes: " . . the charming description of the old homes, the history and traditions, and the true-to-ilfe stories in local color, combined to delight me."

A professor in one of the Virginia Universities writes: "You have put posterity in your debt by presenting so skilfully to them characters that have passed to the beyond."

LESSONS FOR THE LAITY FROM THE CENSUS

All who try to think learn that of the many mysteries among which we live man is the most intricate and complicated as he is the most interesting and, in this life, most important. He is a living trinity, the spiritual, mental and physical elements distinctly separate, with differing functions and yet the three inextricably united, but often at war among themselves, tied together by a system of nerves which may be seen and traced under the scalpel and which we may feel and, in some ways, understand and by influences and reactions we can not analyze or comprehend. Through centuries the most earnest and laborious students, the most intense and intent philosophers and explorers, have sought to know man, the creature of a few score years here, of so many pounds and ounces of fluid, solids and chemical constituents, destined, inevitably to become presently part of the dust of the earth. Each of our bodies is a universe, containing more living things than the human population of the world, each of the countless billions doing, or trying to do, its good or evil for us between the hour or day of its birth and death, frequently, or constantly battling within us for our betterment or destruction.

As the body is the habitation of these swarming multitudes of friends and foes, the mind, even the most neglected, is an illimitable storehouse of memories, impressions, hopes, fears, purposes, accumulated from the beginning of our consciousness. As the body may be used wisely and carefully or maltreated and ruined, so each mind may be widened or narrowed, purified or polluted, directed to high and beautiful thought and intent or debased to the meanest, vilest, worst or most trivial of uses. Within each soul is possibility of the tranquil happiness of Heaven, or the seething horrors and tortures of Hell. Milton, most profound of philosophers, seeing further into the invisible, perhaps, because his eyes were sealed against the visible, told vast truth, which all of us must accept, in his familiar two lines:

"The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven."

Mind on soul, soul on mind, body on both, both on body, make conflict and confusion baffling our perception, defying our understanding. The mind may yield to lusts gross and debased as any that beset the body. Ambition for admiration or attention lead many to immoralities and indecencies vile as any unrestrained physical appetite. Impulse to sin and uncleanliness drag down and befoul the celestial divinity that is our heritage from our Creator and Father. Within us and all about us Mammon wages against God warfare fierce and tremendous as that of the hosts of darkness and the hosts of light pictured for us in "Paradise Lost" or of Apollyon against Christian in Pilgrim's Progress. Armageddon is repeated daily everywhere, with all its awful terrors on one side and glorious promises of victory and triumph on the other.

Our own experiences and the experience of the long line of those who have lived and died and conquered or gone down before us tell us that through all the bewildering complexities of our being and lives there is just one plain, straight path, one sure guidance and dependence. The path is thorny sometimes, but healing love soothes and sweetens the sharpest stings, the radiance from beyond makes beautiful the steepest and roughest ways. Broad is the road to doubts and wandering and darkness, vain gropings, leading to gulfs of spiritual chaos and exaltations of destructive poison.

Determination to strive to direct and lead at least one soul to this upward, safe path, and faithful, patient, loving allegiance to the determination and prayer from the heart for help will be beautiful and fitting observance of this Lenten season. Overcoming our own reluctance and indolence and indifference to work and praying anxiously and earnestly for the cleansing and lifting of a brother man or sister woman is real consecration to the service of the Christ who died for us, real gratitude for His sacrifice for us. A few weeks ago we were thrilled by the fine courage and magnificent generosity of American sailors who challenged death in the furious tumult of storm and wave on the open sea to save helpless strangers from a disabled ship. Many of us telling ourselves that with like opportunity we could have been valorous as these rescuers are daunted by fear of resentments or rebuffs or suspicion or ridicule from going to the spiritual aid of our own friends or neighbors, or even members of our families, within whom may be raging tempests and combats of which no sign nor sound is seen or heard.

Consider the figures from census and official reports of the Church. See from them how slow our growth, how little we do compared with what we could and should be doing, how urgent the need for new, constant, intense effort by clergy and laity and loyal, eager cooperation of laity with clergy. Realize the truth that seeking ardently to purify and guide upward we ourselves are purified, gather more of divinity and its strength and glory, lift the spiritual part of ourselves; in teaching are taught, by laboring to inspire penitence, righteousness and faith, win them for ourselves. Arousing and developing the spiritual lives of others, we acquire new vitality for our own spiritual lives, approach ever nearer triumph over all troubles of life and terrors of death and to feeling to the depths of our hearts the eternal benediction.

Multiplied energy in evangelistic work, public and private, is demanded not only by the situation in the Church, the service of God and spiritual resurrection for ourselves, but by the conditions in our country. Forces seeking destruction of religion and government and civilization are busy. Growing material prosperity brings additional temptation and opportunity for crime and lawlessness and disregard of religion. Every wicked or neglectful man or woman becoming a sincere Christian becomes a good and useful citizen, an additional safeguard for our own land and for the welfare of humanity.

This year has been dedicated by the General Convention of the Church to a great and memorable forward movement. This Lent should give the first long, strong onward steps and each of our members has distinct, direct, solemn responsibility to help. The figures show us the harvest is ripe. Surely it is time for the laity to arouse and go bravely to the greatest of all labor, to the help of the Lord against the mighty, to volunteer quickly and with true intent, as did the gallant sailors whose splendid deed thrilled us, to join with the clergy, hearten them in the many discouragements they encounter, go on with them, in equal devotion, with mutual allegiance to God and Saviour, marching as loving comrades, loyal soldiers of the Cross, to deathless and ever-expanding achievement.

Alfred B. Williams.

THE REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMISSION ON DIVORCE TO THE GENERAL CONVENTION, 1928

A Critical Examination by the Editorial Committee of the Sanctity of Marriage Association.

(Concluded from last issue.)

5.—The Case Before the Court.

Let us now look at the evidence for and against divorce, with the assumed right of remarriage, as it would be adjudged by any civil court of justice (for that, and not the right of judicial separation, a mensa et thoro, without remarriage, is the only "problem"). Can the lawyers on the Commission doubt what the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States would be, if an analogous case in common life were brought before it? On one side we have the chief "Witness, faithful and true" ("Jesus Christ", Rev. 1:5 and 3:14), and four other witnesses, all testifying directly and positively to a certain fact.

On the other side we have a seemingly contradictory parenthetical "exception" attributed to the chief "Witness", such as we find nowhere else, and out of keeping with the constant manner of speech of Him who always "spake with authority, and not as the scribes" (the rabbinical lawyers). This fact is so marked that, as Bishop Gore says, "It is the critical conclusion of an impressive consensus of scholars from Germany, France, America and England . . . mostly Protestants in conviction, that the exceptive clause (in St. Matthew) is an interpolation" (Question of Divorce, p. 23); the explanatory work of an early editor, and by no means meant as a contradiction. (See Bulletin No. 12.) "The Christian standard of the first three centuries (as has been lately written) recognizes no exception to the strictness of the law of Christ. Common sense leads us to the same conclusion. It is precisely the indissolubility of Christian marriage which leads both husband and wife to do their utmost to make their marriage a success. All weakening of the Christian law weakens the high call which marriage brings, and destroys its romance, since the maxim 'safety first' is the death of romance.

"The view that adultery dissolves the marriage bond not only degrades the conception of marriage by making its physical side the dominant consideration; it involves two absurdities. First, a man may cease to be married, yet be unaware of the fact. Secondly, it makes adultery, or a pretense of having committed it, the one way to get rid of a marriage which has become distasteful, and so puts a premium on adultery. If marriage is to be dissoluble at all, it should be also dissoluble upon other grounds than this (cruelty, desertion, drunkenness, etc.), as sensible opponents of the Christian law recognize." (A New Commentary on Holy Scripture, Bishop Gore, Editor in Chief; S. P. C. K. and Macmillan, 1928, New Test. p. 174; also Pp. 86, 87, 140, 173, 175. Compare St. Augustine, qu. in Divorce in America, p. 90.)

Moreover, in order to make this meagre evidence from St. Matthew at all effective against the other direct and absolutely unqualified evidence, the word "fornication" has to be transformed into a distinctly different word, "adultery", and the grammatical construction has to be perverted, to make the exception apply to the final clause of the sentence (forbidding remarriage), instead of to the words which it immediately precedes, namely, "putting away" (divorce). To pronounce such evidence as this conclusive against the united witness of four other "faithful and true witnesses", would be like balancing a pyramid on its apex. No civil court could possibly accept such a conclusion. It has been said recently by one of the most distinguished members of the American Bar, "Lawyers are conservative by training", and "natural antagonists of paper reforms". How any lawyer, therefore, can uphold such a plea as that on which this sixty-year-old "reform" with its "exception" is based is, to say the least, very difficult of comprehension.

6.—"One Thing Lacking."

Once more, in all this "scientific diagnosis" from beginning to end, we find no fixed objective aimed at, but only a selection of varied opinions of what this person, or a set of persons, "thinks" or "feels" or "sincerely believes", together with statistics, of which most are, in the legal phrase, "common knowledge". Of many, in fact, one is tempted to say with Dr. Holmes about the "Katydid",

> "Thou say'st an undisputed thing,
> In such a solemn way".

To any thoughtful Christian it must be very evident that there is one thing lacking in this long report which makes it worse than useless, in fact wholly misleading. Search from beginning to end and you will not find the word "sin", nor any direct appeal to the "words" or "commandments" of Christ, which "the Father gave Him", and of which our Lord Himself said, "He that receiveth not My words . . . the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day" (St. John 12:48-50).

Nor do we find a single reference or appeal to the unanimous witness and the discipline of the whole Primitive and undivided Church, when "the mind of Christ", His "words" and "commandments", were fresh in the memory; nor to the promised guidance of the Holy Spirit in that early history and throughout every century since. Moreover, in the whole Church of the West to this day, there is but one solitary exception to that tradition and witness; namely, the rash, illegal, and revolutionary action of the Convention of 1868, in a canon adopted unconstitutionally, and in flat contradiction to the teaching of both Prayer Book and Holy Scripture.

It was to this unconscious sophistry in the young rich man in the Gospel, who came asking, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" that our Lord gave the blunt and wholesome answer, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." And when the youth asked, "Which?" there came another plain and prompt reply, "Thou shalt do no murder, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness" (St. Matt. 19:16-22). And to the further question, "What lack I yet?" came still another commandment, virtually this, "Give up thy selfishness and follow Me, if necessary, even to My Cross". We find no mention here of "ideals", but only of "commandments". To call them ideals seems very much like playing with language.

So clear and so frequent is this testimony of the entire New Testament, of the whole undivided Primitive Church, and of the whole Church of the West for 1900 years, it is no wonder that Archdeacon Charles in his book, Divorce and Nullity, written in defence of the theory of the power of adultery to dissolve a marriage ipso facto, should be driven as a last resort to the only alternative left him: namely, to deny the truthfulness of all four witnesses, as well as the testimony of 1900 years of doctrine and discipline. For, beginning with an attempt to "prove" St. Mark's testimony "unhistorical and false, untrustworthy from start to finish, inaccurate, mutilated, distorted, and obviously re-written to prove a dogma", no wonder he succeeds in "proving", to his own satisfaction, that the other witnesses, and in fact "the entire New Testament (First, Third, and Fourth Evangelists, and First Corinthians)", are in the same evil company as St. Mark. (Id. p. 4, note, and Bulletin No. 13.)

We may admire Dr. Charles' method of proof for its boldness, though we can give it only scant respect. But is smothering of the "whole problem" in a fog of individual opinions, and statistics about what is "common knowledge," any more respectable? The Census Bureau in 1908 and 1920 gave 1,175 quarto pages of such statistics of divorce, though not with reference to religion, but it is doubtful if any practical use was ever made of them. The same may be said of this present report.

7.—The Net Result.

What then is the net result of this three years' work of 78 pages and 26,000 words? Not even "a most lame and impotent conclusion", but no conclusion at all. What is called a "Conclusion" is really a confession—an amazing confession. It is that "The whole subject of marriage and divorce is a difficult and intricate one, and that truly valuable knowledge can only be obtained through extensive research, involving the personal study of thousands of people who represent all conditions of married life". And then comes another amazing statement: "Doubtless an expenditure of $25,000 to $50,000 a year would be needed over a period of ten years to give us truly worthwhile results." Fortunately the worldly wisdom of the House of Deputies enabled them to turn a deaf ear to this suggestion.

Not once in this report do we find any attempt to study the law of marriage as revealed in nature, or in the express "commandments" of the Lord of all life, but only a confessedly "overwhelming" search after symptoms and effects which are already "common knowledge". Not once is that fatal bacillus spoken of as disobedience to the law of God, which Christ and Christians call sin. On the contrary, one of the Commission's authorities, "an attorney at law, a delegate to this Convention, and a Friend of the Court", is quoted as saying that the whole problem is "fundamentally an economic question . . . a social habit in certain groups" (p. 65). Divorce and its inevitable concomitant, remarriage (its prolific cause), are not once named as sins, only as social or economic failures to attain "success" or "happiness". The same writer adds in a postscript: "I may say that nothing, which I have discovered at least, leads me to a solution of the situation."

No one need wonder at this despairing "discovery", when the law of God, as revealed in the "words", "sayings" and "commandments" of Jesus Christ, is never once directly named as the key of "the whole problem". Yet it is of these words which "the Father gave Him" that He says, "The words that I have spoken, the same shall judge (a man) in the last day". In short it is rejection of this "commandment" of Christ, a rejection actually incorporated into the laws of men, that is the most potent of all causes of haste and levity in entering on marriage, of consequent unrest and dissatisfaction between husband and wife after marriage, and of the great flood of divorce that is the disgrace of our country.

Can any one imagine Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, or Irenaeus of Lyons, in the second century, or Chrysostom of Constantinople in the fourth, appointing a commission to make a careful research of "conditions and causes of divorce" in the Roman Empire, in order that, as Bishops in the Church of God, they might know what to do about it? In view of sixty years of such "study" we may well cry out with the souls of them that were slain for the Word of God, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge"? No wonder a well known clergyman in New York declared in a sermon recently in regard to this greatest of all our moral questions, that "the Church was fumbling". He might have added a much stronger word.

A professor in a well known woman's college in Massachusetts made this statement lately at the annual meeting of The American Association for the Advancement of Science: "If the Ten Commandments are to be obeyed, it should be only when their precepts and advice can be proved to square with the best natural and social science of the present time." Also that "Sin goes into the limbo of ancient superstitions". (Dr. H. E. Barnes of Smith College,) It would seem as if the authors of this report had already anticipated this learned professor.

8.—"The Ten Commandments Will Not Budge."

It was a wiser Massachusetts man who wrote these words. Lowell did not regard our Lord exactly as we regard Him, but he could at least bow before Him in reverence as the noblest of men, and the greatest of all moralists. And no believer in Him as "the Light of the World", and by Whom "all things were made", can doubt that the Ten Commandments will continue to "square" with any kind of real science, natural or social, that the future may produce, as they have done in a good many thousand years of the past. The star of science will always lead, as it led the Wise Men of old, to Bethlehem, and the Divine Infant there, as the true "Light that lighteth every man", and who "knows what is in man". But when Christian men begin to experiment by revising any of the Ten Commandments in order to "square" them with the very variable "natural and social science of the present time", as this teacher in a college for future wives and mothers of Americans puts it, they may well lay to heart the word of "One greater than Moses," and greater than all sociologists and natural scientists: "He that rejecteth Me, and receiveth not My sayings (Rev. Ver.) . . the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." (St. John 12:48, 49.)

After all, it is well, in fact providential, that this professor should have told the world so openly his "angle" of approach to the Ten Commandments as well as to the latest "concept of God, if indeed there by a God." For it ought to show to the authors of this unsigned majority report how perilously near they are to some of these students of natural science when they have wandered beyond their own lawful boundary.

In short, the most extraordinary, the fatal feature, of the whole report is that Holy Writ, or the words of Jesus Christ, are never directly quoted as having any authority whatever on the great problem. Instead of a law-giver, "greater than Moses", and the Maker and the Light of the World, He is reduced to the dimensions of a great "Idealist". Christ, they say in effect, never issued any "commandment" or "absolute rule" on marriage, but only offered to men an "ideal". And this word is repeated again and again in many forms ad nauseam, as if to get readers accustomed to it as a commonplace and a truism.

The Archdeason of Westminster deserved at least more respect, for he was fearless and above-board in his rejection of every passage and word in the New Testament that contradicted his novel theory, not sparing language in his condemnation. But these authors are only evasive. They carefully avoid the slightest direct reference to "sin" or to the "words", "sayings", and "commandments" of their Divine Lord and Judge. Moreover, they have treated as negligible, in fact, have ignored, the age-long history, tradition, pragmatic wisdom, Spirit-guided doctrine, and discipline of 1900 years, together with the certain nemesis that has followed both individuals and nations that have set at naught the Seventh Commandment. Not only this, but they have attempted to minimize what the House of Deputies declared, forty years ago; namely, that "American civilization was decaying already at its roots". If that was true in 1887 with one divorce to seventeen marriages, how much more alarming it is today with one divorce to only six marriages.

9.—As to Legislation.

There are undoubtedly difficulties in legislation, especially in regard to divorced persons already remarried under the present canon. Concerning these a new canon must have no retroactive effect. Those who have trusted to the false guidance of the Church in the past sixty years, have been victims, and must not be treated as willful sinners. Their present status must not be questioned. The Church at large must bear the responsibility for the past. The cases that need a properly constituted court are those many instances of irregularity or doubt occasioned by the chaos of our forty-eight civil codes on marriages, with their united fifty-two causes for divorce and remarriage.

Chief among these are cases of real nullity, where no true marriage has taken place, and for which the only provision the State makes is divorce. (Eight States make no provision whatever for nullity; twenty-seven make no provision for judicial separation, a mensa et thoro.) Because the Roman court or Rota has made some very questionable decisions in regard to nullity, is no excuse for our doing nothing, and much less excuse for our continuing to allow remarriage for any cause. We are in no position to throw stones at others, so long as we retain this falsehood in our law. For it cannot be too often repeated that this particular exception in our own canon not only opens the widest and easiest door of exit, but both actually and logically sanctions "companionate" or "trial marriage".

In other words, these difficulties have only to do with the application of God's law by a competent court to particular cases, and not to the law itself. When that law is recognized in the canon, most of these difficulties disappear. Nevertheless, throughout the discussions and opinions quoted in the report, "to determine the standards", as they say, not of a lawful, but of a "happy and successful marriage" (p. 5), the root of "the whole problem" is only vaguely alluded to, but never once stated. For, above social science, and political economy, and "every name that is named not only in this world, but in that which is to come", is that of the Law-giver, "greater than Moses", as the Bishop of Chicago so clearly and eloquently proclaimed at the opening of the Convention—greater than all legislatures, and philosophers, and philanthropists, and parliaments—the Everlasting Lord and Judge, alike of nations and of men. Jesus Christ cannot be honestly reduced by any Christian man to the place of a mere "idealist". Yet this is the phrase, as we have seen, which is constantly employed through this whole report, and by a commission of a great Christian Council!

It is charitable to assume that the authors of this report are unconscious of the sophistry of this transformation of the meaning of a very plain word into something wholly different. We may well ask, would they apply this word to any other of the Commandments of the Decalogue? Would they speak of "an ideal of honesty", or "an ideal of truthfulness", when they meant "Thou shalt not steal", or "Thou shalt not bear false witness"?

10.—Some Practical Suggestions.

Here let us add three practical suggestions for the present sore distress:

1. Is it too much to expect that the new members, whom the Commission is authorized to add to its number, will be chosen in fairness from among Bishops, Priests, and Laymen, who come to the task, not to revise or amend one of the Ten Commandments, or, as a committee of Congress to discover what would seem to them socially and humanly politic, but as Christians, with diligence, learning, and humility of mind, to ask and see what the Lord Jesus has plainly commanded, and His Church, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, for 1900 years has practiced; and to which all history testifies as the only hope of enduring civilization. For it is not Scripture alone that is ignored, but the long struggle of the Church to elevate man in his sexual relations above the level of the jungle and the poultry yard.

2. In the second place, as a matter of commonsense as well as justice to the Church at large, the report should be printed and published at least three months before the meeting of Convention, which in 1931 will meet in September, and not October. If this rule had been followed in 1928, as was the case with all reports on the Prayer Book revision, it is safe to say that the Commission would never have been continued, or at least the new appointments would have been of a different character.

3. Our third suggestion is that, in selecting deputies to the next General Convention, the members of the Diocesan Conventions should carefully choose only those who have made an intelligent study of this vital question, both in the New Testament, and in the history of the Church from the beginning.

This again throws the responsibility back upon the clergy themselves, Bishops and Parish Priests, where it belongs primarily. Let our Bishops, who are the chief guardians of Christian morals, as well as of Christian faith, make it a point to emphasize this basic principle of family, and home, and civilization itself, in their annual visitations, and their Convention addresses. And let the Parish Priests, whose "lips should keep knowledge", give that knowledge to their willing people, and not merely "keep" it to themselves, as so many have done in the past.

ON WORSHIP

J. N. D.

LOVE seeks worshippers, but it seeks them under the gentle name of "Father". It places them in a position of freedom before Him as the children of His love. The Spirit, who acts in them and produces worship, is "the spirit of adoption", which cries, "Abba, Father". It is not that God has lost His majesty, but that He, whose majesty is far better known, is known also under the more tender and loving character of Father. The Spirit, who leads to worship the Father, leads us also into the knowledge and enjoyment of all the love of God, who would have us to worship Him as His children.

The enjoyment of this love and of these privileges, God be thanked, belongs to the most simple and the most ignorant among Christians. The Christian, when once He has understood what the grace of God is, and has received the spirit of adoption, is entitled to enjoy them without any reasoning; as a child knows and loves and enjoys his father before he can give any account of that which he enjoys. "I write these things unto you," says St. John, addressing himself to the little children in Christ, "because ye have known the Father" (1 John 2:13). The feeblest Christian is therefore perfectly competent for worship. At the same time, it is sweet to be able to estimate and explain this relationship with God. The more we think of it, the more we examine the word on the subject, the more shall we see the import, the deep blessedness, of it. The simple fact that God is our Father, and that we possess the enjoyment of such a relationship with Him by the Spirit, is in itself an immeasurable privilege for creatures such as we are. Every child of God has this privilege in unquestioned right; but it is in Christ, and with Christ, that we possess it. He is "the first-born among many brethren". He is gone to His Father, and our Father, to His God and our God. What a sweet and blessed relationship! what a family is that into which we are introduced! And how are we, who were formerly strangers to these affections and to this love—how are we to learn these things? How are we to learn what the Father is, the knowledge of whom gives birth to these affections in our hearts? It is the only-begotten Son, the firstborn in this new relationship, who reveals Him unto us. Eternal Son of the Father, enjoying the infinite love of Him in whose bosom He dwelt, it is He who reveals Him as He himself has known Him.

Become man upon this earth, Jesus ceased not to be the object of the same affection—affection which, when challenged, could not remain silent. "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Nor did Christ, in anything, put Himself at a distance from this love. Upon earth, from the cradle to the cross, He was the object of it in all its fulness, and He revealed Him in whom it was found. "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him" (John 1:18). Jesus, a man, but also the Son of God, in the enjoyment of the fulness of this affection, dwells, even whilst upon earth, in the bosom of the Father, to originate and make known, here below, all the beauty—all the force—of that affection. As man, He was the object of this infinite love, in order that we might understand it in its application to men. So He associates us with Himself in the joy of this love, and He reveals it to us as He himself knows it.

What grace in Him! and what a position for us! How does Jesus Himself, who by His death and resurrection has planted us in this blessedness, become to us an object of love, of adoration, of devotedness of heart! The very glow which is given to us is presented to us by the Saviour as a proof of this love. "The glory," said He, in John 17, "which thou hast given unto me, I have given unto them... that the world may know that thou hast loved them as thou hast loved me." Such is His affection towards us, that He desires that we may enjoy the Father's love. So He renders us capable of this enjoyment by revealing to us the Father's name. "I have declared," says He in the same chapter, "thy name unto the men thou gavest me out of the world; and I will declare it, in order that the love, wherewith thou lovedst me, may be in them, and I in them." Our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus. This fellowship expresses itself in adoration towards Him who is revealed, and towards Him who reveals.

It will be easily seen how the work of Christ is the foundation of all this blessedness, whether in order to introduce us without spot and without fear into the presence of the God whom we adore, or in order to place us in the relationship of children towards the Father. It was after His resurrection that Christ could say, "I ascend to my Father, and your Father; to my God, and your God". Then it was that He could say, "Go to my brethren". Now the Spirit which He gives from on high answers to this blessing. He is "the Spirit of adoption", as He is the Spirit of liberty; because we are "accepted in the beloved", and we enjoy a redemption which has made us "the righteousness of God in him", and therefore placed us in God's presence without a spot or stain of defilement.

Thus we have reviewed, at least in principle, the great foundation truths of Christian worship. Perfect in Christ, united to Him, brought into the presence of God, whose love and holiness are manifest without a veil; as children beloved of the Father, and objects of the same love with Christ the first-born, we worship together, according to the power and affections which the Spirit, who has been given to us, inspires. We worship the God of Glory, whose presence is the stay, instead of being the terror, of our souls. We worship the God of love, whose will it is that we should be perfectly happy in Him, that He Himself might enjoy our happiness, Himself finding more joy in it than even we ourselves. We adore our Father with endearing confidence in His kindness, which blesses us with all spiritual blessings, and counts the very hairs of our head, while thoughtful of all our present need. We adore Him for that which He is in Himself. We adore Him for that which He is to us, the children of His house for eternity. We thus present ourselves in sweet communion before the same Father—our common Father—as His beloved children; so that brotherly affections are developed, and, the joy of each being reciprocally the joy of all, multiplied praises ascend to God. Hence we see in the New Testament, that, while indeed the consciousness of this relationship must necessarily be individually realized, in order that we may enjoy it together; yet, at the same time, the Spirit constantly associates us, and uses the words "we" and "us", when speaking of Christian affections and feelings. The Holy Spirit shedding abroad the love of God in our hearts, it could not be otherwise.

But the effect of the presence of this "one Spirit" goes yet much further. Not only does He give us the consciousness of being in Christ—of being perfect before God, according to the efficacy of the redemption which Christ has accomplished; not only does He witness with our spirits that we are the adopted children of the Father, but He gives us also the consciousness of being but "one body"—the "body of Christ", and "members one of another". The Church, which God has newly-created in Christ—that "one new man"—the redeemed who have been "all baptized into one body", offering worship in "the unity of the Spirit", and that "with all the saints". They are the "habitation of God through the Spirit"; and, that Spirit uniting them all in the unity of the body of Christ, adoration ascends on high towards God, who formed them to be but "one new man" in Christ. If Israel, as a whole, was represented by the priests who officiated in the tabernacle, the faithful now, who render direct worship to God, do it in the unity in which they are all "one body in Christ". In this worship there is more than brotherhood. There is unity, not of nation, and not only of family, but of the members of one body formed as such, and indwelt by one Spirit. This is the endowment, privilege, and position of the Church, which is baptized into "one body in Christ", the Head being ascended up on high, in order that the members of the body may render worship freely and with joy before God, by that unction which descends from Him.

Let us state some of the practical effects which flow from these truths:

First, it is evident that worship is the privilege only of the children of God. Being offered "in spirit and in truth", and being offered to Him who cannot admit sin into His presence, they, and they alone, who are washed in the blood of the Lamb, and who have received the Spirit, can draw near to God to adore Him. That a man who is not converted should render worship to God is simply impossible; for "with faith it is impossible to please God". Such an one may be blessed in temporal things. He may, perhaps, ask such a blessing, and be heard. God may have tender compassion for him, as a poor sinner; but as yet he knows not God, as yet he has not the Spirit, as yet he is not washed in the blood of Christ; and therefore it is utterly impossible for him to worship God. That he thinks he can draw nigh to God is but the proof that he is ignorant of what he is in himself, and of what the God is whom he thinks to serve. Who can enter into the sanctuary, save he who is sanctified? Who can address himself to a father, as such, save as a child? Worship, moreover, being offered in the unity of the body of Christ, and by the Spirit who has formed this unity, and who dwells in the body as in a temple, he who is not of the body is necessarily excluded. To suppose that a person who has not the Spirit can be a member of this body is to deny its existence, its end, and its nature; for, if a man who is not converted can enter into the presence of God, and worship there, there is no need that there should be either a body in which God dwells as in a temple, nor is there need of redemption, which is the basis of everything. Why should there be a redeemed people, if the worldling can serve God in His presence? Wherefore adore God by the Spirit, if he who has not the Spirit can adore just as well? Worshipping in common supposes persons united in one today by the same Spirit, and that each can say, We, in sincerity, when addressing God. A hypocrite may be present; he will be a hindrance in the worship; but its validity will not be thereby destroyed, when the worshipper says, We, in truth, in the name of all. It is believers who worship God.

To render true worship to God supposes that a soul is set at liberty, and is free to draw near to God, in virtue of the efficacy of the work of Christ. If a person who loves God, and who has no other hope than the work of Christ, is timid in drawing near, it is right to encourage him; but if such a one has no real knowledge of the efficacy of the work of Christ, he will be ill at ease even in drawing near to God, because God's presence will communicate to him rather the conscience of sin, than of the joy which that presence inspires to him who enjoys it in the peace which Christ confers. Nevertheless, in such cases of doubting and trembling, right affections often precede the being set free, and are more true to Christ than the reasoning of the mind; but this state of soul is not the normal state of worship. To be consciously in the presence of God, purified from all sin by the blood of Christ—in the light as He is in the light—such is the true worshipper. This is the standing of the believer in Christ; and, in order to worship truly, this standing must be known and enjoyed. Sometimes bad teaching neutralizes this liberty, although the soul all the while, in its secret communings with God, cries, "Abba, Father!" As a principle, however, whatever allowance be made by charity for these cases of ignorance, true worship supposes that we can draw near to God without fear. This freedom of access is a necessary and absolute effect of the complete and triumphant work of Christ, of which every true believer has the benefit; but it is the presence of the Spirit which enables us to realize it.

How delightful to be able thus to adore God! What a source of joy is He whom we adore! How great the blessedness of finding oneself in His presence, no cloud between Him and us, no tingle of fear, because no vestige of sin! Being made "the righteousness of God in Christ", the presence of God becomes but an inexhaustible spring of happiness for that new nature which He has given us, and which finds its enjoyment in Himself. What joy to be able to express one's acknowledgments, to render to Him one's thanksgivings, knowing that they are acceptable to Him! What a blessing to have His very Spirit, the Spirit of liberty and of adoption, as our power of worship, as the inspirer of praise, of confidence, and of adoration! What joy thus to worship in unity, as members of the same family and of the same body, sensible that this joy is a joy common to all; knowing that those whom we love are infinitely precious and acceptable to the Lord, and that they all find their pleasure in praising Him who is worthy—the God who is the source of all our happiness—the Lord who gave Himself for us, in order that He might be our eternal portion!—Handfuls of Pasture.

RAYS OF LIGHT FROM GOD'S LAMP

NEHEMIAH.

THE name of Nehemiah means "Jehovah consoles". What a consolation he was to the Lord and to His people, this mighty man of prayer, the man who cared!

Subject.

Rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem and restoration of the city government is the subject of Nehemiah.

1. Chs. 1-6. Rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, that the people might be protected from their enemies.

While the walls were down, their enemies continually harassed Israel, defeating their efforts to know God or to make Him known.

2. Chs. 7-13. Restoration of city government in Jerusalem brought about a right relation of the people to one another, and gave them strength from within to overcome their enemies.

Purpose.

To teach us how Christ, the Jehovah who consoles, protects His people from their enemies without and within.

1. Chs. 1-6. Through men of faith and prayer who care for the welfare of God's people, He rebuilds the walls of faith in the personality of the Holy Spirit, faith in the divine inspiration of the Bible, faith in the deity of Jesus Christ, and faith in the personal premillennial coming of our Lord.

As long as these walls are down, Satan oppresses God's people from every angle and makes them believe whatever they hear.

Many today who profess His name believe that the Holy Spirit is only a blessed influence rather than a person, that the Bible is the word of men rather than the God-breathed word from heaven, that Jesus is only a perfect man, and that He will not come until the world has been converted and righteousness has been ruling for a thousand years (John 16:13-15; 2 Tim. 3:16; John 20:31; 14:3; Acts 1:11; Luke 24:50; 1 Thess. 4:13-18; 1 Cor. 15:51-58).

2. Chs. 7-13. The restoration of city government speaks to us of subduing the foes within, by the Word and Spirit controlling lives yielded to God (Rom. 8:32; Phil. 3:21; Prov. 16:32; Rom. 12:1, 2).

INSPIRATION OF THE SCRIPTURES

By A. Corbett

"Every Scripture is God-inspired, and is profitable for teaching" (2 Tim. 3:16).
"Men of God spake being moved (borne along) by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21).
"Yea, has God said!" (Genesis 3:1).

MILLIONS of professing Christians regard the Scriptures as the "Word of God", and as being inspired; yet have not given the matter a thought as to the meaning and application of the word "Inspiration", or in what sense the Bible may be regarded as being the Word of God. That it is so, is persistently presented to the youthful mind and in mature years the impression usually becomes stereotyped, yet no adequate reason can be given for the assumption.

In this paper an attempt is made to show the possibility of inspiration, its logical probability, etc.

Definition of the Term Inspiration.

What is the meaning of the word "Inspiration"? It is frequently difficult to give an adequate definition of certain words. In its simple, literal sense, the term "Inspiration" means "breathing into", and as applied to the Scriptures, refers to the act or process by which the Creator-Father enlightens and influences the mind of certain persons, so making them the instruments or vehicles through which He communicates His Will or unfolds the program of the ages, etc., to the human race which He has created.

Inspiration includes the direct communication of knowledge to the mind relative to the past, present, and future, and also involves the psychological impulse to announce the same in writing or to deliver it orally. Thus St. John was enjoined: "Write . . . the things which thou sawest, and the things which are, and the things which shall come to pass hereafter" (Rev. 1:19; and again: "What thou seest write in a book" (v. 11).

While there is apparently a connection between Inspiration and Revelation, yet they are essentially distinct, as the literal meaning of the words indicate. "Inspiration" implies an "in-breathing", the direct communication of knowledge involving a mental impulse to declare it to others; while "Revelation", literally, means an "unveiling", or information conveyed to the mind as in a panoramic picture, also with the impulse to speak or write of the matter revealed. Thus, the revelation to Abraham concerning the future history of his posterity. Genesis 15: 4, 9-16, also the revelation to Nebuchadnezzar and Daniel concerning the world kingdoms and the final Kingdom of God. Daniel 2:26-45. Revelation 1:19.

Is Inspiration Possible?

Most assuredly, as shown by psycho-physical experiments. It is a psychological phenomenon, not self-induced, but emanating from an exterior source—Deity; Supreme; Immortal; Spirit Being. He who at the beginning inbreathed specifically into a psycho-physical Being, so endowing him with a "living soul" (Genesis 2:7) conferring upon him the faculty of reason, etc., can assuredly still inbreathe into his vivified soul a more exalted degree of illumination and knowledge, relative to His Will, and to circumstances past and future.

In an interesting, but in a much inferior, limited, and crude manner, the possibility of Inspiration may be demonstrated by the phenomenon of hypnosis, showing the influence of one mind over another. Man possesses a dual mentality; an Active, Rational mind, and a Passive, Subjective mind. Normally, the former attends to the active affairs of daily life, the latter presiding over the physiological functions of the body. This latter may be affected for good or ill by external influences, and frequently through the Rational mind. In hypnosis the Rational mind of the "subject" is in abeyance, and the Passive mind is dominated by the mind of the "operator". I have seen and personally investigated several remarkable cases of hypnosis, some involving complete local anesthesia.

Man dwells on a dual plane—the material, earth plane with which he is connected by his material, physical body; and the immaterial, psychic plane on which his mental or psychical processes function. While both planes are distinct as to their functions and mode of operation, yet there is an evident coalescence between them. The existence of this reciprocal action between mind and body is a matter of common knowledge.

Diivine Inspiration Reasonable.

Archdeacon Paley, in his "Evidences of Christianity", says: "It is reasonable to suppose that God having created intelligent human beings, would acquaint them of His designs toward them." That is a logical assumption. If mankind were on the plane of the mere brute creation, instead of being a special creation, endowed with an intelligent, "living soul", we could well realize the race as being utterly and eternally consigned to the abyss of spiritual, mental, moral, and physical darkness and death. It is, indeed, most reasonable to expect man's Creator-Father to acquaint him as His child, with His Will towards him, to inform him of the past relative to his origin, his relation to his Creator, and towards his fellow men, and also to unfold to him "things to come". If not, then why endow man with intelligence if it were not for some specific purpose? Man needs a guiding and controlling hand, and such comes to him through the "Still, small voice", of Inspiration.

The Old and New Testaments contain the Creator's Will towards mankind, as well as the unfoldment to him, past and future, of the program of the ages. To acquaint mankind with the Divine Will, and to unfold to him the past and future, relative to his habitat, a few individuals only were chosen as instrumentalities.

About nineteen writers, historians and national prophets, constitute the staff of the Old Testament, and some nine that of the New Testament. The New Testament writers as well as Jesus, frequently quote from the Old Testament, thus expressing their belief in its Divine Inspiration and credibility, as St. Paul assures Timothy: "Every Scripture is God-inspired, and is profitable for teaching, etc. (2 Tim. 3:16; also St. Peter: "Men spake from God being moved (borne along) by the Holy Spirit" (2 Pet. 1:21).

Inspiration and Personality.

While certain individuals were the subjects of Divine inspiration, such influence does not appear to have obliterated their personal, temperamental characteristics. The special traits of the several writers of the Old and New Testaments, as exhibited in their writings, are markedly distinct. The books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Amos and Malachi, for example, are quite different in style and contents. Also, the diction of St. Paul differs sharply from that of St. Peter, or St. John. Some writers are sympathetic and optimistic, while others are vehement or pessimistic. Isaiah is the hopeful evangelical prophet, while Jeremiah indulges in his Lamentations. St. Paul is the dauntless teacher, and disciplinarian, while St. John is the gentle teacher and exponent of Faith, Life, and Love.

Thus Inspiration does not suppress personal characteristics, but rather utilizes them. Accordingly, St. Paul was chosen and inspired for his work amongst Oriental philosophers, while St. Peter, the impulsive, vacillating, thoroughging Jew, was selected and equipped for his specific work amongst his fellow Jews, and to the loving, spiritually-minded St. John, it was given to "See the King in His beauty", and to announce to the world "Things to come".

The Inspirational Agent

was the Divine Spirit, the Primary, Essential, Supreme Life; the source of all life, as expressed by St. Paul and St. Peter, and specifically by Jesus in His valedictory discourse to His apostles: "The Comforter, the Holy Spirit . . . . shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you" (John 14:26).

The Internal Evidence of the Inspiration of the Scriptures is shown by the manifest organic unity of the several books, relative to subjects and doctrines, and extending from Genesis to Revelation. Any subject or doctrine appearing in Genesis, respecting the human race, will be found referred to in the other books more or less specifically. Thus, the record of earth's creation, the distribution of its inhabitants, and final destruction; man's special creation, and endowment with a rational soul, his degeneration and apostasy, his promised redemption through atonement by a substitutional sacrificial death, etc., run as a golden chain, unbroken, from cover to cover of the Bible. Especially clear-cut and detailed is the unique history of the Jewish race. Yet, the several writers were men of very varied mental ability; some well educated, some not, also they occupied varied social spheres, some in high positions, others in humble.

Further, many were not contemporaneous; they wrote at different times and in different countries, but as St. Paul states: The same Spirit "divided to each severally as He willed", so resulting in one harmonious whole (1 Cor. 12:4-11).

Let us suppose an example of the result of the non-inspiration of the Old and New Testaments: Imagine an attempt to construct a watch under the following conditions. A watch manufacturer in Germany makes the main spring; the balance is made in Australia; the hair-spring in South Africa; the center and associated wheels in England; the dial and case is made in Canada; each manufacturer working independently of the others. Now, suppose the several parts of the watch were sent to New York City to be assembled, what kind of a watch, if any, would result? That watch (?) would be a type of the Biblical writings as a whole, if the writers had not been inspired. But as with the Universe, so with the Divine Scriptures, the same Creative Spirit created and elaborated each into its own interdependent and correlated uniformity.

Whether the several writers of the Scriptures were conscious of being under the special influence of the Supreme Spirit as to what and when they wrote, or were writing automatically, yet autonomically, may not be known. St. Paul, however, was aware when he was writing of his own volition, and when he was the subject of the Divine intuition and impulse (1 Cor. 7:25, 39, 40; 14:37).

"Yea; Has God Said?"

Throughout all ages, there appears to have been those who repudiated and rebelled against the Supreme Divine authority. Thus certain angels "Kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation" (Jude 6); and their chieftain, the "old serpent, the devil", the world's first Modernist, proclaimed to our first parents and their posterity his declaration of independance: "Yea; has God said?" (Genesis 3:1); and which has had through the ages down to the present day, innumerable signatories, whose intellectual eyes instead of "being opened", as promised (Gen. 3:5), have been blinded (2 Cor. 4:4), as is most logically declared by St. Paul: ". . . The natural (psychical, animal) man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, they are foolishness unto him, and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged" (examined, interpreted; 1 Cor. 2:14).

They who reject the Divine Inspiration of the Scriptures, and apply a quasi intellectualism to their study, are as a man studying astronomy with a microscope, or seeking to locate a pain in the body with a yard-stick. There is a clear-cut dividing line between the inferior, secular; and the superior, spiritual planes of human existence. Logically, the earth man—the psychical, animal man—cannot possibly penetrate into and comprehend the processes peculiar to the Spirit plane. It is an incontrovertible assertion, "That which is begotten of the flesh, is flesh (earthly, secular), and that which is begotten of the Spirit, is Spirit" (John 3:6).

"God is a Spirit and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth."

Book Reviews

THE WONDERFUL STORY: By the Rev. G. R. Oakley, M. A., B. D. Cloth. Pp. 246. Published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (The Macmillan Company, New York City). Price, $2.

The author succinctly states his vision, "The purpose of the following pages is to tell in simple language and, so far as possible, in orderly sequence, the history of the Wonderful Life, and to do so with the completeness which the Gospels supply".

And it has been well done. The writer has injected his own ideas of the localisms and the colloquialisms of the days of our Lord's life on earth, putting the language in every-day English, where suitable, and bringing before the child the portraiture of scenes and doings as far as possible, into the range of understandable speech. Yet, it is not an attempt to adulterate the dignity, the profound sacredness of the life. The rather, every child will be more impressed thereby and led to the Gospels with a fresh appreciation of their beauty and appeal.

Critically, we may dissent from some of the exegesis. But who can treat a so variously interpreted life without running counter to some one's predilections?

The book may be read to the very young; and personally by children over nine, who are ordinarily schooled.

MARRIAGE LAWS AND DECISIONS IN THE UNITED STATES: By Geoffrey May. Cloth. Pp. 476, with chart. Price, $3.50.

MARRIAGE AND THE STATE: By Mary E. Richmond and Fred S. Hall. Cloth. Pp. 395, with Index. Price, $2.50.

These timely and intensely challenging volumes, issued by the Russell Sage Foundation, New York City, deserve a wide circulation at this critical period of American history. The former deals with the laws of every state in the Union; so that the reader may at a glance acquaint himself with the salient features of legislation governing each. The latter unfolds such a view of existing social conditions as must appal every pure-minded citizen of our Commonwealth.

How little we know of the tricks of town officials to "get by" with a fraudulent process; of the "marying parsons" who hang out their shingles over against the town hall and connive at false unions for the fee; of even "marrying justices", sworn to uphold the law they purposely break; in short as the book, Marriage and the State unfolds: "The marrying justice, the marrying parson, the taxicab driver, the runner, the too obliging license issuer, the professional witness, the interpreters (where a foreign tongue is the only vehicle of conveying information), even conspiring relatives, etc."

We may expect from this reliable and trustworthy source to find that monogamous marriages, adaptive ages, union of color, physical and mental equipment, consanguinity exclusion, fitting temporal prospects, the full acquiescence of the families involved, the spiritual element of true affection and sacrifice are the fundamentals to a lasting and congratulatory relation.

The recent report of the Committee on Marriage and Home, of the Federal Council of the Churches in America, is in complete accord with the findings of these books; and calls upon the clergy to rectify as far as is in their power the abuses now flagrantly flaunted by unprincipled ministers. And in turn all that the Committee recommends is enjoined by the book. The danger of companionate marriage in placing sex desire above true affection; the tendency to a cynical attitude towards love; lax public opinion regarding divorce; the crying need for uniformity in marriage and divorce laws; the danger of early and clandestine marriages, are all within the province of the Church to control, by quiet persuasion through personal touch and by the purity of life of the minister himself, by wise preaching delicately presenting the problems, and the means of solving them, by upholding sexual purity as the basis of all commendable social order. When our young men can be persuaded to regard every woman as his sister by nature to whom by sexual relation he owes the gallantry of chivalry, the young women, invariably the victims of the stronger passion of their seducers, will be responsive to this lofty ideality. We cannot too often urge the benediction of the Lord, "Blessed are the pure in heart".

"SOUTHERN HEROES."

An Appreciation of Gamaliel Bradford.

Mr. Editor:

Gamaliel Bradford, of Wellesley Hills, Mass., was born October 9, 1863, at the very high-tide of the War Between the States, and many years afterwards he has proven to be the greatest, and best friend the South and the Confederacy has above the Mason and Dixon Line.

When one thinks, and meditates with solemnity upon Gamaliel Bradford, born in the far North, having never been South of the Mason and Dixon Line, and upon the fact that the greatest souls penned by this wonderful writer, are made up of men and women who resided in the South, one feels that hearts and minds should ever praise Gamaliel Bradford.

Hon. Henry Louis Smith, who was for many years President of Washington and Lee University, stated to me in a letter, that Gamaliel Bradford's "Lee, the American", required ten years of constant study by the author before it was published. Washington and Lee University has bestowed the highest honor on Gamaliel Bradford for his work on Lee, and Mr. Smith said that it was the greatest work on Lee that he had ever read.

Gamaliel Bradford wrote in a letter that Robert E. Lee was the greatest general and the most spiritual soul he had ever studied. Of Sidney Lanier he said that for the period of thirty-nine years that Sidney Lanier lived, he had accomplished more than any one he knew of in the face of poverty and disease. So we of the South and all who love the Confederacy can see the high praise this great Northern historian, Gamaliel Bradford, has placed upon our great heroes.

When the United Confederate Veterans held their reunion at Birmingham, Ala., in 1926, that great Commander-in-Chief, General W. B. Freeman, of Richmond, Va., approved and so did his comrades, "Lee, the American", and "Confederate Portraits", and this resolution was approved, and can be found in the organization's Book of Minutes. When one reads, "Lee, the American", he is charmed, and when a study is made of "Confederate Portraits", which comprises sketches of the following men beloved by the Confederacy, he will find a rich mine of living heroes. The sketches are Joseph E. Johnston, J. E. B. Stuart, James Longstreet, P. G. T. Beauregard, Judah P. Benjamin, Raphael Semmes, Alexander H. Stephens, and a description of the Battle of Gettysburg.

When the United Daughters of the Confederacy, Georgia Division, assembled in October, 1926, at Statesboro, Ga., they passed a resolution and endorsed "Lee, the American", and "American Portraits", the last named volume containing a sketch of Sidney Lanier. At Covington, Ga., in October, 1927, the same organization endorsed "Confederate Portraits". These resolutions are in their Book of Minutes.

When the United Daughters of the Confederacy assembled at their National Convention in Richmond, Va., in 1926, and delegates from forty states in the United States assembled, this great organization endorsed "Lee, the American", and "Confederate Portraits", and this resolution appears in their Book of Minutes.

So it is a heart of love and devotion that causes these three great organizations to show their love, devotion and deep admiration for this great historian, who has told the truth and given justice to our own heroes, and the greatest honor of all is that he who was born at the high-tide of the War Between the States, in a distant section of the Union, should write his greatest works based on the lives of our own Southern people so far removed from the author's birthplace.

His other works contain sketches of Southern men, and women that are pleasing to the eye and food for thought. In "Wives", we see the beautiful description of Mrs. Jefferson Davis and Mrs. James Madison. Then we see in "American Portraits" our own Sidney Lanier and Mark Twain. In "Damaged Souls" we see John Randolph of Roanoke, most interesting. In magazines we see John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, and "A Confederate Pepys Diary". Each and all of these are most engaging and attractive to the eye, which presents food for thought for the mind.

May I state that the Boston Chapter of United Daughters of the Confederacy, when Mrs. Frederick L. Hoffman, of Wellesley Hills, Mass., was president, elected Mr. Gamaliel Bradford an honorary member for life.

So, when we read, think and enjoy this great man's works, we know that his vision, and study of the truth, will free many minds of the North, and East, that a closer brotherhood for all sections will be unity of justice for each section. God bless such a student as Gamaliel Bradford and may he ever be honored in life, and each year find more hearts paying homage to his works and deeds.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart," Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. W. Strother Jones, of Red Bank, Virginia:

"I will trust, and not be afraid: for the Lord ....Jehovah is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation" (Isaiah 12:2).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

I would converse with Thee from day to day,
With heart intent on what Thou hast to say;
And through my pilgrimage, whate'er befall,
Walk and consult with Thee about it all.

Since Thou art willing thus to condescend
To be my intimate, familiar friend,
Oh! let me to the great occasion rise
And count Thy friendship life's most glorious prize.

Church Intelligence

Ministers of Music Now Being Trained.

The fostering of congregational worship through music will be the duty of the several score of "Ministers of Music" graduated each year by the Dayton Westminster Choir School.

The fact is not widely known that the Dayton Westminster Choir, which has become known throughout the concert world as America's finest choral society, is also a school for choirmasters and leaders of church music.

The choir which sang in the White House March 9 for President and Mrs. Hoover and which will sing at Carnegie Hall in New York City March 18, is made up of a selection of the best voices from the entire student body of the school.

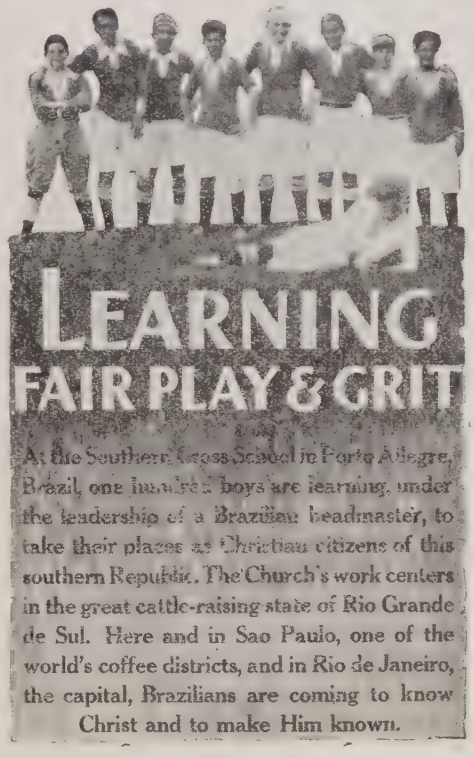
To enter the school Christian character is considered the first requirement. It is the belief of the director, John Finley Williamson, that the spiritual concept of a song must first have been lived and felt before the singer can give a perfect interpretation. Only students who have dedicated their lives to a career of church music, are selected as members of the choir.

The school course for the development of these ministers of music covers three hard years of work. The school day begins at 7:30 in the morning and does not end until ten in the evening. Each student is thoroughly instructed in the art of teaching to sing, the analysis of the possibilities of undeveloped voices, the training of singers to sing so that they can be understood, the production of balanced choruses. But these musical studies are only a beginning. Each student is trained in the forms of worship used not only in the Protestant churches but also in the Roman Catholic Churches and Jewish synagogues. Several courses in Bible study are required. Other courses include those which train the students in the preparation of proper newspaper notices, church advertisements and the numberless odd jobs which a "Minister of Music" can handle to the relief of the pastor.

The school is financed by Mrs. H. E. Talbott, of Dayton, Ohio, as her contribution toward raising the standard of Church Music in America. Its sponsors include: President Herbert Hoover, Chief Justice Taft, the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, Judge Frederick P. Cabot, Dr. Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitsky, Father William J. Finn, Ambassador Myron T. Herrick, Ambassador Sir Esme Howard, the Viscountess Astor.

Upon the completion of its American concert schedule, the choir will tour Europe singing in Albert Hall, London; in the Royal Opera House in Paris and in the Vienna Opera House. The deficits incurred by these world tours are met by Mrs. Talbott.

The members of this choir are then —upon completion of their course— available to the churches throughout the country for employment as choirmasters and directors of church music. The Dayton School also offers short courses in the training of pastors in the elements of church music.



Trinity College, Hartford, Fast Attaining International Interest.

Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., continues to receive gifts of rare interest from the Old World. A few weeks ago Judge Buffington, of Pennsylvania, described the frame and mullions of a window given by Cardinal Wolsey to Whitehall Palace; the Roman tile which formed part of an ancient British Church, thereafter a heathen temple, and finally the chapel of St. Pancras in the Abbey Church of St. Augustine, Canterbury; a piece of Caen stone from Normandy, formerly part of St. Ethelbert's Tower in the Abbey Church of St. Peter, St. Paul and St. Augustine at Canterbury, and had later been used in the screen behind the great Altar at Canterbury.

He now writes of yet other gifts. The Lenten Poster, 1929.

Dean and Chapter of Canterbury Cathedral are sending a carved stone from the Cathedral itself. The authorities of Sulgrave Manor are sending a stone from the Church Yard wall, which will serve as a reminder that the original name of the college was Washington College. Trinity College, Cambridge, sends a carved corbel; and Trinity College, Oxford, has promised to send a stone which has not yet been determined. By request the President of the college visited Trinity College, Dublin, and the authorities there are sending a pillar from the old Chapel of that venerable institution which was taken down about a hundred years ago. An interesting thing in connection with this gift is the fact that Increase Mather, after taking his B. A. at Harvard, pursued his studies at Trinity College, Dublin, and received his Master's degree from that institution. The name of Mather has been held in veneration by the college authorities as one of its notables ever since, and it was gratifying to them to know that the new Chapel at Trinity College, Hartford, was the gift of one of the Mather family.

Since the word of these trans-Atlantic gifts for the new Chapel has been known an interesting thing has been the offers that have been coming in. Lately the offer was made to the President to send a stone that had been in the floor of the prison where Joan of Arc was confined. It was gladly accepted. Other interesting trans-Atlantic gifts in view bid fair to make this Chapel one of international interest, as well as one of rare beauty.

Balanced Budgets But At What a Cost!

Balanced budgets, and surpluses instead of deficits may bring to the people of the Church a feeling of security for the financial status of our missionary enterprise, but no one who realizes the cost to the missionary work of the reductions necessary in order to bring about the balanced budget will ever be satisfied until the Church as a whole undertakes to meet in full its missionary responsibility.—Lewis B. Franklin, in The Spirit of Missions.

Boys' Home Incorporated.

Situated at Covington, Virginia, is a school and farm for homeless boys, regardless of creed, nationality or place of residence. Its president is the Bishop of Southwestern Virginia, and its Vice-President the Bishop of Southern Virginia. Its trustees and Executive Committee number many prominent clergymen and laymen. Mr. E. Reinhold Rogers is Superintendent. A little monthly publication, "The Boys' Appeal", tells of a few definite present needs. It also gives the reason for these needs and this should offer food for thought to all Churchmen whose diocesan heads are being forced to cut down to balance budgets.

"With the proviso that, so far as this article includes an appeal for money for maintenance, it is not directed to the Richmond friends of this work, since the Richmond Community Fund adequately provides now for the maintenance of Richmond boys at Boys' Home, we here present a statement of our chief present needs.

First: We critically need additional money for current support. This need has always existed to a certain degree, but rarely so keenly as now. The chief positive reason for present emphasis upon this lack is to be found in the reduction of appropriations from our owning dioceses. Both in Southwestern Virginia and in Southern Virginia the recent annual campaigns for financing the work of the Church have fallen short of the totals needed to carry out the budgets of these dioceses. Consequently appropriations have had to be reduced; and for this year Boys' Home suffers badly in this reduction.

Second: Since our maintenance fund is sadly cut each year to supply money to pay interest on notes still standing at six per cent, we very acutely need money to reduce these debts to the point where they will not continue to absorb so large a part of our slender income. Every gift to meet this need helps doubly, by reducing the principal of debt and by saving six per cent for interest."

Graduating Class at St. Luke's College, of Nursing.

Speaking at the commencement exercises of the school of nursing at St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Mr. K. Fugui said: "A hospital is like a ship in which the doctors are the officers. The nurses represent something almost more vital. They may be compared to the lights, without which the ship would be helpless, Dr, Caroline Macdonald said to the graduating nurses: "If you are taking up nursing in expectation of honor or financial reward, give it up, There are much easier ways of getting both. But if you are choosing it because you feel it your God-given work, you will be able to withstand the many disappointments that will come your way and will never regret your choice. Many times you will feel despondent, that your work is not successful, or of value, but if you practice it steadfastly, there is nothing greater that you could do for humanity."

The graduating class numbered sixteen, the largest in the twenty-seven years of the school's history.

American Clergymen Needed in China.

Bishop Gilman writes in the Hankow Newsletter: "We are desperately in need of American clergymen, teachers and women workers of all kinds. The workers from America must have a full measure of the spirit of Christ, especially long-suffering patience with things not done as they can best be done, a willingness to be railed at without railing in return, and a buoyant faith that knows that God rules and that in Christ we shall conquer though the time be long."

A Dream Come True.

To the great joy of a faithful congregation in the Panama Canal Zone, Bishop Morris on February 3, consecrated St. George's Church, Gatun. The Bishop says:

"The capacity of the church was taxed by the congregation, which seemed to include the whole community, and the service was dignified and impressive.

"I wish I could tell you how happy these people are at this realization of their dream. It certainly was a great day in the life of the faithful lay-reader, Joseph O. Laurie, who has ministered there ever since coming to the isthmus many years ago.

"Members of the congregation have made the font, pulpit, clergy stalls, Bishop's chair, and a concrete walk nearly fifty yards long."

C. P. C. Renders International Service.

When broadcasting comes into such frequent and convenient use that we can connect most of our Church people with any given service or meeting, one of the events that must be among the first to be shared is the regular monthly meeting of the Church Periodical Club. At the February meeting Miss Scheres-chewsky told of Miss Cornwall-Legh's work for lepers in Japan, and of her own work at Nara, where she is the only foreigner; a letter from Dean Kroll of Haiti was read, full of enthusiasm about the work of the newly-consecrated Cathedral; Archdeacon Kent of Alaska wrote of his approaching transfer from that country to Valle Crucis, North Carolina. Charming letters were read from two sons of Archdeacon Wyllie of Santo Domingo, acknowledging books. Mrs. Frazier of the Hare Industrial School, Mission, South Dakota, wrote of the twenty-one boys now enrolled in that new school, and of the great need for readable story books. Miss Richards of the Tuttle Training School, Raleigh, N. C., needs books on home management, for the young Negro women in training there. Archdeacon Goodman, away up beyond the Arctic Circle, could make use of good pictures and illus- them home and browse over them in their dusky igloos. New Mexico and Maine sent word of children and grown-ups in constant need of books and pictures. Mrs. C. F. Odell from Maine told of a family in which there are three boys, aged 21, 18 and 13, all serious crippled by meningitis, who have much trated magazines as his Eskimos take joy in receiving the National Geographic.

The Annual Service of the Church Periodical Club was held this year on the afternoon of the second Sunday in December at Trinity Church, New York. It was also the second Sunday in Advent, and the very beautiful Service with its emphasis on the Gospel Message found in Holy Scripture, and on the missionary messenger soon to speak to us, was well suited to the thought of the Church Periodical Club.

The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Norman S. Binsted, newly-consecrated Bishop of Tohoku, Japan. He began by speaking directly to the members of the Church Periodical Club, reminding them that they were workers together with the missionaries. By providing literature that missionaries cannot obtain for themselves the C.P.C. maintains their contacts with other parts of the world and keeps them mentally alert. This regular and friendly service comforts them in isolation, keeps up their morale and assures them that the Church at home is holding up their hands.

The C.P.C. also furnishes tools for the work of the missionaries, whether it be large Bible pictures for individual teaching, or libraries for educational institutions. Bishop Binsted had experienced this help both in his former work and in the new diocese of which he now has charge. Tohoku is in the north. It is sometimes called the Siberia of Japan and on account of the cold many people will be found dressed in the skins of animals. The Bishop considers them more open-minded than in some other parts of the country, and believes they will be ready to receive Christian teaching. In appealing for the building fund for St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Bishop Binsted referred to the excellent medical library which had been provided through the efforts of the C.P.C.

A Noble Woman.

Miss Sarah R. Davidson, the oldest active woman missionary under the U. T. O., died at her post in All Saints' Mission, Vieques, Porto Rico, on January 30. For nearly a quarter of a century, Miss Davidson, who celebrated her eighty-first birthday last November, had worked among the Negroes on this small, over-populated island off the Porto Rican coast. After working with the Sisters of All Saints in New Jersey, she applied, in 1904, for service in Porto Rico, an island which had always held a peculiar fascination for her. She went first to Ponce, where she began work among young girls whom she gathered about her in an embroidery and drawn-work class, meeting every Wednesday afternoon in the corner of a room, ill lighted and poorly equipped, used at other times for packing oranges. After a time she began a Sunday School which met in this same room.

A year later she was transferred to Isabella Segunda, commonly called Vieques, after the island on which it is the chief town. Half of the 10,000 or more people inhabiting this island, largely Negroes from the British West Indies, lived n the town. It was among these people that Miss Davidson spent the remainder of her life. In the early years she assisted a resident minister, but latterly she was alone. Here she labored for over twenty years, with meagre opportunities for companionship as the island had but a handful of American families. Late in life, as an added hardship, came the fire of November, 1926, in which not only was the mission property destroyed but all of Miss Davidson's personal belongings as well. Her ministry there, among a most needy people, is now ended, a courageous, pioneering, little known piece of work.

G. F. S. to Hold National Conference in Kansas City.

A national conference for the leaders and members of the Girls' Friendly Society will be held in Kansas City, Mo., April 12 to 17. Outstanding features of the program will be: a discussion led by Dr. Valeria Parker, of the American Social Hygiene Association, on "The Art of Living Together"; conference on the most up-to-date methods of program planning, budgeting branch finances, publicity, rural work, personal problems and the problems of the Society; a symbolic service of lights; a banquet at which Bishop Partridge of Missouri will be one of the principal speakers; and daily morning devotions.

It is expected that through the sessions of this conference leaders and members will come to a better understanding of their mutual problems and of the problems which girls are facing today. It will also be an opportunity for those who are working nationally and locally to know each other.

This conference is especially significant because it indicates that the Girls' Friendly Society is keeping pace with modern trends in girls' work. The Girls' Friendly Society today reaches from Boston to Los Angeles, from Porto Rico to Alaska and from Mexico to Japan. Girls of every race, creed and background are included. They may be found in high schools, boarding schools and colleges; in industry, business and professions; and in the city and in country. One of the most stimulating aspects of this growth is the development of its program and activities, to keep in step with modern interests, needs and conditions.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

Bishop of Mackenzie River.

Canada.—On February 3, in St. John's Cathedral, Winnipeg, the Venerable William Archibald Geddes, D. D., was consecrated fourth Bishop of Mackenzie River, probably the largest diocese in area in the British Empire and the smallest in population. Five days previous the young bishop-elect- was married to Miss Beatrice Terry, a graduate of the Wellesley Hospital of Toronto.

Large Parishes.

An English clergyman writes to St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, from Madagascar: "I have between fifty and sixty churches to look after, with only four native priests to help me. The district is about the size of Yorkshire and Lancashire together, and covers mountain forest, mountainous country with only maboo and a few palms, and low-lying country along the sea-coast, From my center my furthest station is some six or eight days' journey away."

Another writes from Newfoundland: "I have thirty settlements on a 120-mile coast line. It takes a month to visit them and I can get round only four times a year. All the travel is done by boat."

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, Bishop.

Christ or St. Peter's Church?

As the result of a friendly suit, an interesting decision was recently handed down by Judge William H. Grimball that it would be legal for Christ Church, Charleston, to change its name to St. Peter's Church in order to receive the fund of $41,000 which was offered to it last spring by the vestry of old St. Peter's Church which has been a dormant parish ever since the burning of the church in the great fire in Charleston in December, 1861. The vestry carefully invested and reinvested the remaining assets, about $4,000, so that in sixty years time it has grown to nearly $41,000. The donor of the site of Christ Church had given it on condition that the Church be named "Christ Church", hence a suit was necessary to determine the validity of the change.

Steps will now be taken to secure the proper legislative enactment to build the new St. Peter's under a new charter of corporation, or to have the old name changed to St. Peter's.

During the month of February the Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin, rector of St. Paul's Church, Helena, Ark. (the second largest parish in the diocese of Arkansas), has been acting as supply at St. Michael's, Charleston.

The parish has invited the Rev. Mortimer W. Glover, of Sanford, Florida, to become its rector, but no definite word has been received from him.

Executive Council Pares Down Budget and Endorses St. Luke's, Tokyo.

The meeting of the Executive Council which was held at diocesan headquarters recently, adjourned late in the afternoon, after a decision had been reached to pare the 1929 budget down from $46,000 to $40,000. The action was taken after each item on the budget had been considered separately and it was seen that a policy of strictest economy was the best one to pursue. A committee will be appointed by the Rt. Rev. A. S. Thomas, Bishop of the Diocese, to fix the quotas of various parishes.

The committee also voted the diocese's support of the campaign for $2,500,000 by the National Church in behalf of the Church's hospital at Tokyo, Japan It was pointed out that New York has already raised $1,500,000 towards the fund, so a balance of only $1,000,000 remains to be secured. The part that the diocese will take will be directed by the field department, of which O. T. Waring is chairman.

Many Memorials Dedicated.

On Sunday, March 3, Bishop Murray visited St. Margaret's Church, Westminster Parish, Anne Arundel County, and dedicated an altar and ten memorial windows. He also confirmed a class of six and celebrated the Holy Communion.

The altar is a memorial to William H. Singleton and Ina N. Duvall Singleton. The windows are memorials to the following:

Window No. 1.—Louisa D. Pettedone.

Window No. 2.—Richard Tilghman Brice and Mary Elizabeth Brice.

Window No. 3.—Prudence Mezick Corner.

Window No. 4.—Richard and Elizabeth Moss and descendants.

Window No. 5.—Ellen Mezick Ridout and Dr. Zacariah Duvall Ridout, M. D.

Window No. 6.—Charles Duvall and Florence E. Duvall.

Window No. 7.—Presented by the Junior members of St. Margaret's, in memory of those whom God has called.

Window No. 8.—Millie Corner Mezick.

Window No. 9.—William Stinchcomb and Rosina Stinchcomb.

Window No. 10.—Jacob and March Winchester and their children.

Each window was unveiled by a relative or descendant of the family represented. Members of the different families were present from Virginia, Washington, Baltimore and the different counties.

Perhaps never in the history of the parish, which dates back to 1697, have so many come to the Holy Communion at one time. Bishop Murray was assisted by the rector, the Rev. R. C. Cowling. The Bishop congratulated the rector, vestry and congregation upon the many improvements since his last visit

NORTHERN INDIANA.

Rt. Rev. Campbell Gray, D. D., Bishop.

St. James', South Bend.

When the parish meeting of St. James, South Bend, Ind., was held in January, the rector presented to the parish his program for the year and it received the hearty approval of the entire parish. That program consisted of the following: to pay up and cancel all past obligations to the diocese, especially the assessments not paid in 1927 and 1928 amounting to thirteen hundred dollars; to pay off the parish indebtedness at the bank of two thousand dollars; to purchase a rectory and to build a parish house. The people have kept their promise, and the vestry have held tenaciously to the program. The past due assessments have been well paid, and on the first of February the vestry purchased a most beautiful home to be used hereafter as the "Rectory of St. James' Church", the present rector to be its first resident, rent free.. Two initial gifts of one hundred dollars each made the purchase possible, one from Mrs. E. Louis Kuhns and one from Miss Helene Neitzel.

Along with this great advance goes the much-needed parish house. Plans are now being drawn by Mr. William Fett and a Committee of Women will serve to bring about the best possible. It is expected that work will be started shortly after Easter.

The Rev. F. G. Deis, of the National Council, visited St. James' Church for five days at the invitation of the rector. A complete survey was made of the parish, and from it we hope and pray that this parish will, before the Council in May, accept its full quota to the diocese and the National Church. To this end, a Mission on the Church will be held for one week beginning the third week after Easter. Conferences, classes and meetings will be held everywhere in the parish to educate and stimulate interest in the great work before the whole Church. Mr. Deis will conduct the Mission. The Bishop has given his whole-hearted approval and blessing, and will participate in the Mission.

Conference on Christian Life Service at Pennsylvania State College.

At the suggestion of the Rev. Leslie Glenn, Secretary for College Work in the Department of Education, St. Andrew's Church, State College, the Rev. Edward M. Frear, Chaplain, recently held a Conference on Christian Life Service, conducted by the Rev. Alexander C. Zabriskie, Professor in the Virginia Theological Seminary, assisted by Mr. Frank Bancroft, a middle year student at the Virginia Theological Seminary.

The chief public appearances were at the regular morning and evening services on Sunday, by which they aimed to arouse interest in the subject. Mr. Zabriskie preached in the morning. Mr. Bancroft led the discussion group in the evening.

Out of the meetings there developed two conferences, one in the rectory on Sunday afternoon, at which thirteen students earnestly discussed the question, "How one can best fulfill the will of God"? A similar discussion occurred after the evening service with another midnight service at one of the fraternity houses.

All day Monday was devoted to personal interviews broken only by engagements at fraternity dining halls. The leaders in this way made many interesting and useful contacts with students, not only with Episcopalians, but with others. It is expected that this work will be followed not only by some definite decisions, but also by more earnest Christian living.

One Year's Progress.

St. Andrew's Parish, Harrisburg, the Rev. Hollis W. Colwell, rector, have increased the salary of their rector from $1,800 to $3,000 a year, and in addition they have made an allowance of $25 a month for automobile expenses. Their Church School has increased eighty-four in membership, so that it now numbers 157. This is remarkable progress to have been made in one year.

Enthusiasm for St. Luke's, Tokyo.

The Diocese of Springfield had a great luncheon meeting February 27, at the Abraham Lincoln Hotel, Springfield, in the interest of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo.

Ninety-three men and women came from sixteen parishes and missions in the diocese. Mrs. Robert B. Gregory, of Chicago, was the principal speaker and spoke splendidly of the work St. Luke's and Dr. Teusler were doing and urged the people of Springfield to respond. Mr. Wilson, of the New York office, was also present, as was the Rev. F. G. Deis, of the National Field Department from New York. Mrs. George Thomas Palmer, Chairman of the Women's Division of the drive for the diocese, presided. Dr. Irving W. Metz, Chairman of the Diocesan Committee for St. Luke's, spoke on the work, as did Mr. Spencer, the Diocesan Execu-

THE MIGHTY GOD.

"Let me expect to see the miraculous."—The late Dr. A. Smellie.

William Olney.

We have a mighty God, whose power divine
Brought Earth to life;
His strength has not enfeebled grown,
To Faith's glad eyes again is shown
His deeds, with wonder rife:
To witness, Providence and Grace combine.

The unfailing seasons His own Word fulfill:
Both Moon and Sun
Declare the upholding of His Hand;
His mighty works in ev'ry land,
Since Time its course has run,
Record the actions of His Sovereign Will.

But mightier in His work of Saving Grace
Converting souls:
The hardest heart Christ's Love can melt;
Throughout the world that Grace is felt,
The Cross Man's Sin controls:
Prodigals find among the sons a place.

Therefore expect the miraculous to see:
Expect the Word
To work revivals o'er again,
When penitents cannot refrain
From seeking for the Lord:
And wondrous harvests shall ingathered be.

What Is Man?

The nature of anything, especially of any growing thing, is to be discerned in its end rather than in its beginning, in the fruit and not in the root. However man originated, he is a present fact and is to be judged in his own light.

Man obviously stands at the top of the creation as we know it, closest to God and likest to him in faculty and power. He is endowed with personality, and this fact at once lifts him above the level of nature into the rank of moral beings wearing the high crown of responsibility and character. The constitution of his soul is patterned after his Maker as this is imaged in the work of his hands. The world reflects the three primary powers of intellect, sensibility and will as constituting the fundamental nature of God, as these same faculties unfold in man. His mind grasps the world and reads it as a book, his sensibilities are swept with all rich and various emotions, and his will clothes him with a degree of sovereignty over himself and over the world. These powers combine into personality, of which conscience is the highest office and crown, resulting in a character that is the glory or the shame of man. Standing at the center of the creation, man mounts into dominion over nature, putting his foot on the earth, seizing the stars in his hand, yoking all nature's steeds to his wagons, and shooting his lines of thought and purpose out through the universe to its ultimate frontiers. He is thus a reduced copy of God and parallels him at every point. This divine sonship of man makes him a wonder to himself and leads him to exclaim with Shakespeare, "What a piece of work is man! How noble is reason! How infinite in faculty! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god!" and with the Psalmist, "Thou hast made him but little lower than God, and crownest him with glory and honor". This high view of man is one of the central columns of both science and religion and of a worthy human life.

Man is a growth. The first man was as essentially human as is man today, but through what long ages of education he has passed, how much he has grown? He did not start with knowledge and civilization, but at the foot of the ladder down in the lower strata of primitive life in the jungle of nature and at the bottom of savagery where we find his earliest remains today. But he was endowed with germinal faculties and boundless possibilities, and slowly and painfully he had to develop these for himself. Not only the centuries of recorded history register this growth, but it began far back of this and stretches into the mists of unrecorded time. This process is still going on and apparently more rapidly than ever as we see man going forward by leaps and bounds along every path of exploration and achievement. Yet it still stands true that the first man had essentially the same nature and powers that we possess today, only they were latent and waited for development as dormant seeds wait for the summer. God made man an outline sketch, or as a seed or bundle of unpacked powers, and left him to fill out the sketch and unfold himself into blossom and fruit of his glorious achievements. If we wonder why God did not set man up with a full outfit of knowledge and civilization, morals and religion, the answer is that this would have robbed him of his greatest opportunity and kept him in childhood. Besides, character, the crown of the human soul, cannot be created and put on from without, but must grow up within as process and product of experience. The centuries are the milestones of man's progress as he has fought his way forward and climbed upward to his present summit of attainment.

There are views of man that fall infinitely below this true and worthy evaluation of his nature, and it is one of the ominous symptoms of our day that they are becoming current and pervading much of our popular literature and affecting our life. The worst of these and the one that practically sums up all other unworthy views is that man is only a passing moment in the process of nature, a momentary gleam in the light of a million million suns and will soon be extinguished in the storm and night of eternal oblivion. This degrades man to the level of a beast, if not below it, as it endows him with the powers of a troubled existence that the beast does not have, so that of all creatures he is most miserable. This view at one stroke denies and destroys the responsibility of man, robs him of his power of free will and makes him only a tiny cog in the vast machinery of the world or an atom whirled about in its infinite storm, and discrowns him of conscience and character, giving him only a moment of meaningless existence and then casting him as rubbish to the void.

The logical practical consequences of this view is that nothing is worthwhile, no worthy goal is in sight, all our creeds are withered weeds, all our hopes are liars and our ideals and efforts utterly vain. The next step is to relax all self-restraint and let ourselves go in the false and fatal liberty of "self-expression". By this act we throw the reins down on the neck of our animal nature and bid it go as it will, and then go it surely will the way of wreck and ruin. If we believe we are beasts we shall presently live as beasts and even sink to a lower level than they do and can. In contrast with this low and fatal view of our nature we are to stand upon our feet and assert our sovereignty and exercise our freedom in following and achieving worthy ideals and ends. Our divine sonship, which implies and proclaims divine Fatherhood, is to be given its rightful place and possibilities in our view of our nature and worth. God hath made man upright, and upright we are to stand and not grovel in the dust with beasts of the earth. We are strangely compounded of a lower and a higher nature, and if we let ourselves go, our lower instincts will gain the mastery over our higher aspirations and will sink and smother the spirit in the flesh. The sons of man have in them the nature and possibility of becoming in an ever higher degree the sons of God, and this should ever be our ideal and destiny.—Presbyterian Banner.

Baldwin on Peace.

Mr. Stanley Baldwin, Premier of England, speaking at the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the League of Nations' Union, had the following signifiicant statement to make concerning the maintenance of world peace. "The fact is that we have paid much too little attention in the past to these tigrine impulses that lie deep down in human nature. If you think you are going to beat the things that culminate in hatred and in war without a spiritual fight, you are foredoomed to failure. To make a vow with your lips is not enough; to sign a covenant with your pen is not enough. It savors of crying, 'Lord, Lord'. Such of you now listening to me who, as myself, were baptized, made a vow of peculiarly solemn nature through your proxies—and you renewed it if you were ever confirmed—to renounce the world, the flesh and the devil. I wonder how many of us have done it. I know myself I have not. I have tried often. I fall down again and again, and I know that if this vow of renunciation is to be kept it means a daily struggle until you fall into the grave. It is exactly the same with these old tiger instincts of human nature. You can only save yourself and the world by constant daily fighting with these old impulses, and in time you will win. You may feel that I ought to bid you go and wash in the rivers of Syria, whereas I am only directing you to the Jordan. But if you want to do something perfectly simple and easy that would really help, let me submit that from tonight onward no member of the League of Nations' Union add one drop to the fetid stream of insinuation and suspicion, and the attribution of low motives to statesmen of your own country or other countries who are engaged in pacificatory work in the world. In my view, the statesman who makes an observation doubting the good faith of or makes insinuations against the bona fides of a foreign country for the sake of obtaining a cheer, the newspaper which puts in such paragraphs to make news—they are both of them doing the devil's work and making it infinitely harder. Suspicion very quickly becomes hate, and hate very quickly becomes war. You in this league are missionaries—or you ought to be—and as missionaries you should conduct yourself."—Exchange.

A Courageous Oriole.

About ten feet from the ground, in a small water maple growing in the front yard of my home in Knoxville, Tenn., an orchard oriole nested. In a surprisingly short time after the nest was begun, it seemed, it was completed, and eggs had been laid and hatched.

All one sultry afternoon a storm brewed; sullen clouds hung low in the northwest, and, about seven in the evening, began to rise. Shortly before eight the storm broke in all its fury. Shrieking wind stripped leaves and twigs from trees; the ground was littered with branches; and some large trees were blown down. For nearly two hours driving, beating rain, accompanied by some hail, poured down incessantly.

When the storm was over, at about ten o'clock, I investigated the nest. The storm had partially blown down its tree. The stem, toughened by many high winds, had not snapped, and the roots had held, but the soil, softened by other rains, had given, as the tree was beaten about by the wind, so that the top now almost brushed the ground, and the oriole's nest, which had been approximately ten feet in the air, was not more than four feet from the ground.

Seeing this, I first, with a flash-light, looked about on the ground near the tree for dead birds, thinking it impossible that they could have escaped being thrown out of the nest and drowned.

I was mistaken. Upon turning the light on the precariously tilted home, I saw there the mother bird, squatting desperately, but safely, upon her babies, and blinking uneasily at the flash-light, held less than two feet away! I hastily withdrew, lest I should frighten the mother from the nest she had guarded so courageously.

During the night there came more wind and rain. In the morning, however, the nest, the mother, and the babies were revealed safe and sound. The young birds, glimpsed for a moment while their dam was off the nest, seemed well and happy.

I straightened up the tree, and the mother oriole at once returned to the nest in its original position. During that wild night she showed courage which, I believe, I have never seen equaled.

The oriole's nest, in the process of construction, was a thing of great beauty. As it was woven of green grass, it was at first difficult to distinguish it from the surrounding leaves. When the frame was complete, it resembled nothing so much as a little open-work, crocheted basket.—Our Dumb Animals.

ALL.

'Tis not a single bird
That makes the forest ring;
A thousand joyous notes are heard,
A thousand warblers sing.

'Tis not a lonely flower,
Though it may glad the sight,
That makes the earth one summer bower,
All beautiful and bright.

But each thing brings its share
Amidst the mingled throng
Some cadence of some treasure rare,
Of beauty, or of song.

All have their tasks to do,
All have their work assigned,
And carry out in order true,
The plan their God designed.

When Aram Found His Brother.

Aram stood listlessly by the old stone arch that marked the boundary of the Near East Relief Orphanage buildings at Antilyas, watching hundreds of boys flash by him on their way to the morning swim in the Mediterranean.

"Come on in, Aram!" urged Sarkis, and "Wake up, Aram!" yelled more than one boy as he ran past, but he made no move to go. Most of the eight hundred boys paid no attention to him, either, for his sudden dreamy fits were well known and respected. The other orphans knew what he was thinking about—his little brother, lost on the long march six years ago. Most of them had lost brothers and sisters, too, as well as parents. But the busy life of the orphanages, filled from sunrise to sunset with classes, shop work and games during play time kept them from brooding. All but Aram.

"It's a pity," mused Sarkis, cutting short his own swim in the hope of being able to coax Aram into the water. "He's so strong and steady, he could lead in everything if he wanted to. The Scout Master said so. He said, if anything ever happened to wake Aram up, he'd be the best of us all. But he—"

Out of the doorway of the nearest stone building shot Garabed, one of the older boys, with a face so tragic that Sarkis never finished his sentence. Garabed ran straight to Aram, and the younger lad edged closer, for what concerned his hero mattered to him.

"The Scout Master says," shouted Garabed, panting for breath, "oh, it's terrible," he choked, conveying his excitement to both boys. "He's—he's down with the dengue fever." He choked again.

Both boys knew what that meant, and looked at each other in utter dismay. The fever! Sarkis had had it last year, when forty boys came down with it, and he sighed at the memory. It had lasted less than two weeks, but it left him with an all-gone feeling for months.

"Then Mr. Garmarian will take charge", Aram spoke with unusual quickness, but Garabed's face answered him before the words came.

"No, he's down, too; and Mr. Banian, and Mr. Levonian, and—" He named the teachers who had charge of the shop work, of the food supply, of the kitchen work and the school gardens; the principal leader of the Sunday School, the bandmaster and the doctor. It was overwhelming. Why, who would take care of them now? This was far worse than last year. Then the American director had been with them; now he was in the mountains on sick leave. To be sure, this was a school, where the older boys were organized to help the younger in work and play, but never without any help at all from the Director and the teachers. Besides, now—Aram and Sarkis spoke together as the same thought hit them.

"But the bride's furniture! Who's going to see that she gets it in time for the wedding?" The disaster could not have overwhelmed the school at a worse time. This was a remarkable recent order, the first of its kind, for a set of modern furniture for the son of a pasha; a graduate of the University of Beirut, whose bride-to-be must have everything up-to-date. If they bungled this order, it would mean untold loss in money and prestige for the Orphanage.

"The Scout Master said," Garabed came to the point of his message at last—"he said, 'the older boys must keep things going. Tell Aram—' And then the nurse wouldn't let him talk any more."

"Tell Aram!" That must mean that the Scout Master was trusting Aram to take charge. Sarkis stared at him with adoring eyes, confident that Aram could do it. But Aram looked completely crushed. And then, as both boys watched him fearfully, they saw the signs of some great struggle taking place in Aram. At first, that broody look that Sarkis dreaded; then a sternness coming by degrees; then uncertainty; and at last, quite a new look that made both boys catch their breath. Sarkis did not fully understand, but he knew that he had seen a victory.

"We'll all help," said Aram with a note of authority that Sarkis had never heard him use before. "Garabed, who is in charge of the hospital?"

"Nobody except the nurse."

"Report to her every morning, and all day between classes," Aram went on in that steady voice. "She will need a lot of help. Bring water, or food, and clean up; do what she wants done. Choose aides if you need them. You will make a fine orderly, Garabed." And Garabed straightened up with a new look on his face, too, saluted in Boy Scout fashion, and ran back to his new duty.

Sarkis had felt very little and forlorn a moment ago, but now he felt ready for anything, with this new leader. "What shall I do, Aram.

"You will stand here, and when the boys come back from swimming, you will help me stop them here." Sarkis forgot that he had missed the morning's swim, he was so excited. Already the boys were coming out on the beach, grabbing up their clothes from the sand where they had dropped them, and racing back toward the school and the shops. Aram and Sarkis halted the first group. Aram told them what had happened, asked Krikor to remain with him, and sent the rest of them, greatly sobered, on to their classes. The same thing happened a score of times with fresh groups, and each time Aram picked out one boy to remain there by the palm-tree. Not one had objected, Sarkis noted proudly; they were all influenced by the strange new power in Aram.

None of them ever forgot how Aram broke the news of their leadership. "As though they'd won a game, or something." Sarkis told the Scout Master a month later. "It was like victory, somehow. I can't tell you what he said, except just one sentence, over and over again—'We have no leaders, we are the leaders.' Then he told Hagop to take charge of the bakery and Vartan of the tin shop, and Tavit, the shoe shop, and so on. He said it was their chance to see what they could do when they were grown-up." Sarkis himself was to be a sort of lieutenant for Aram. The whole Council was to meet Aram every morning by the palm-tree.

Only one thing had not been mentioned, and that was the most important of all. Sarkis lingered after the others had been dismissed to their work. "But, Aram, what about the bride's furniture?" he asked, anxiously. Aram looked surprised.

"I am in that shop," he said. It was enough.

In the days that followed, days of anxious waiting on news of the hospital till every patient was pronounced out of danger, the young new leaders carried steadily on. Sarkis and Tavit and Hagop and all the rest. A visitor, but there were none, when it was known that the terrible fever was there, would have seen everything going on just as usual, on schedule time. Every morning, the boys rolled up their sleeping mats and piled them in a corner of the bare stone room under the watchful eye of a captain in order to make room for breakfast, and classes later in the day. Then the kitchen squad reported for duty, the waiters' squad put a cup and half a loaf of bread at each boy's place, and laid the long, clean strips of cloth on the ground outside, where some of the eight hundred would be sitting down for their morning meal. After breakfast another squad cleared away, and others swept the big room and put it in order, then hung the wall blackboards for the classes. All through the day squads reported for hospital duty. Thirty boys were up there now, and twenty-two of the twenty-eight teachers, and Garabed needed help above stairs.

In the carpenter shop, the beautiful new furniture was being finished day by day, carefully, and smoothly. There was no rush and no waste under Aram's eye, and yet, Sarkis noticed, he did his own share of the work, too. Some of it was expert cabinet work, and more of it plain carpentry, but Aram seemed to know just which boys could be trusted to do any work best.

Sometimes he told them stories of the University of Beirut, where the young bridegroom had studied. He told them what he had heard from older orphans, returning on a visit, of the nineteen boys from their own orphange who shared a basement, got their own meals, and studied at the university. "They don't need any director to keep them at it," he would say cheerfully. "They know what they have to do, and they do it." Once, at the morning council meeting by the palm-tree, Aram had added.

"That's like us now. Some day, some of us can be there at the University, too, if we want to hard enough. This will keep us in practice." All the boys echoed, "Yes, we will". They all looked actually taller, Sarkis thought, and some of them seemed to have grown up overnight, but none so much as Aram.

At last, after anxious weeks, there came a day when the beloved Scout Master struggled out into the sunshine, quivering with weakness, to attend the palm-tree council. Every boy saluted and cheered, then stood at attention.

"We are glad to report to you, sir," said Aram. One by one, the boys told their story. The food had been prepared as usual, and kept within the allotted amounts; the school gardens had been kept in prime condition. The buildings had been kept clean, and the old wooden buildings had been scrubbed with beach sand and laundry soap, because no paint could be had. Classes had been held as usual, with older boys in charge of all but six. Chapel services had been held, but there had been no Scout meetings, for nearly every Scout had been doing double duty in the last month. The last thing they had done had been, on their own intiative, to clean out the canal which brought water for the mill and the gardens. And the school band had been playing lustily, doing its best to keep everybody's spirits up.

The Scout Master heard all the reports in silence. Then, with generous praise, he dismissed the other boys, and turned to Aram. Sarkis, as usual, managed to stay near by. "What about you, Aram?" he asked. Aram saluted.

"I have to report that the furniture for the new bride is nearly finished, and will go out a day ahead of time," he said proudly. The Scout leader laugned, rather shakily.

"I don't mean that," he said. "I care more about you boys than I do about the furniture. You—you—" it was very hard to put into words this change in Aram—"why, you look as happy as if you'd found your brother!"

Sarkis caught his breath. How cruel, to remind Aram of his lost brother. Perhaps it would send him back to "mooning" again? He need not have worried.

"I have, sir." It was Aram's leader-tone. "They are all my brothers—Tavit, and KriKor, and Hagop, and most of all, Sarkis here." But he knew what the Scout Master wanted, and he tried to tell him. But it was hard to put the six years of training in the orphanage into a sentence. "I—I thought, if my brother was here," he blurted out, "I wouldn't want him to be a quitter!"

The Scout Master raised himself on unsteady feet and gripped Aram's hand strongly. Here was a boy who in finding his brothers had found himself.—May Kinnes, in The Target.

A SHOP IN GALILEE.

Will Chamberlain.

Sometimes I think if I could be
A carpenter as Jesus was,
And plan and build the same as He,
Plying the hammer and the saws,
Causing the ribbons of the wood
To roll like waves about my feet,
That life would be more understood,
Would happier be and more complete.

For when I'd shape a joist or beam,
Or smooth the roughness from a board,
Might not some glory of that dream
Of His, my fellow and my Lord,
Descend on me, and might not I
Catch through the lapse of centuries
The joy of His plane's soft cry,
His shingle-tapping rhapsodies.

Might not the rafters firmly set
To hold the crowning roof in place,
Suggest a surer parapet,
Plus love reflected from His face;
And might not I in each design
My workmanship should make arise,
See in far outline His divine
And lasting temple in the skies.

Why should I choose as others have Murmur for place that cannot give
A shred of comfort when I die?
Does not His love surpass all fame?

WHY THE OWL FLIES ONLY AT NIGHT.

A Story That is Told to the Children of Africa.

Here, then, is the story. Hark to it.

Once the owl committed a theft. She took the thing into a hole in the tree and hid it there.

Then the Kite and the Hawk collected together all the birds.

Said the Kite: "Let the Owl be sought and brought before us. No bird shall return to his home until the Owl is found."

But the Owl heard of this and hid herself in the hollow of a tree. She came out only at evening time.

Then the Kite and the Hawk heard that the Owl was with the Ostrich and sought her there.

But the Ostrich replied that she had not seen the Owl.

Then they heard news that the Owl was in the home of the Crocodile, and they issued an order that the Crocodile should be sought and questioned. But the Crocodile refused to come out. He said that it was no concern of his and he entered the water and hid himself.

Rumor had it that the Owl had taken refuge with the Porcupine, but when she was asked if she had seen the Owl she shot off her quills and refused to answer.

Then the King heard that the Owl was being sought and sent for the Hawk and the Kite to appear before him. But they did not come. So he had traps set for them, and when they were caught he had them brought before him.

"Why seek ye the Owl?" he asked them, and they replied:

"She has committed a theft."

The King said: "What did she steal?"

"She has stolen an egg," they replied.

"Let it go," said the King. "She shall go free." And he released the Kite and the Hawk.

But they were angry, and ever since then the Kite and the Hawk have sought the Owl that they may punish her.

But the Owl does not come out except at night.—Black Folk Tales, Harpers.

THE QUEST FOR HAPPINESS.

Mary B. Carr.

I used to think that happiness
Was at one's beck and call,
Like manna it would fall and bless
In bulk enough for all.

But as I older now have grown
And mayhap wiser too.
Such views are sadly overthrown
For happy, I see few.

Just as a collie, gaunt, half dead
Will search from door to door
To pick a scrap of bone or bread
To tide starvation o'er.

So do I treasure night and day
A word, a look, a smile,
Stray crumbs that chance along my way
Give sustenance meanwhile.

While happiness seek with might
That vague, elusive thing,
What comes just whets my appetite;
I'm sad with wondering!

Music is the art of the Apostles—Luther.

The more one prays the more occasion is there for thanksgiving and praise.

Robbing the Founder of Smith College (en Mass.)

Dr. Knight Dunlop of Johns Hopkins University and Harry Elmer Barnes of Smith College, in papers, locked horns on the value of mental hygiene and Freudian psychology. Dr. Joseph Jastrow occupied a sort of middle position, saying that one need not be a thorough-going Freudian to accept something of Freud's version of the psychogeneci principles.

Consummate, Condeuced Asininnity by Barnes.

Barnes of Smith College in a paper on "Medical Science versus Religion as a Guide to Life", appealed for a supplanting of theology by mental hygiene and said that the sociologist must unite with the student of mental hygiene to work out a valid basis for new rules of conduct that will rest squarely on scientific foundations.

"Hay" Barnes said that if there is a greater need for an adequate conception of God, "this newer view of God must be formulated in the light of contemporary astrophsics, which completely repudiates the theological and cosmological outlook of Holy Scripture"; and yet the trustees of Smith College, Northampton, Mass., are so false to their trust that they permit this Bolshevist Barnes to remain in their faculty, although poor Sophie Smith, who established Smith College with her money said in her will that she desired every department of the college to be permeated with Christian Evangelism.

What can wisdom profit me
If I am too blind to see
Wayside beauty in the grass,
Nameless beauty where I pass?

If I am too deaf to hear

A LULLABY.

Clyde Robe Meredith.

The weary sun has gone to rest—
So lullaby!
Upon his patient mother's breast—
Oh, lulla-lullaby!
The stars look down from Heaven above;
And watch and wait with sleepless love;
While mother, to her precious dove,
Sings lullaby—oh, lullaby!

An angel bright will come ere long—
So lullaby!
With gentle smile and soothing song—
Oh, lulla-lullaby!
To bear my dove to slumberland,
Where rainbow fays a merry band,
Spread happy dreams with open hand.
So lullaby—oh, lullaby!

THE MISSION HOME.

St. Andrew's Mountain Mission

PIEDMONT PARISH, MARSHALL, VA.
Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Rector.
A STATEMENT.

About two years ago we began making special appeal for funds with which to purchase a desirable property for a Mission Home adjoining our Mission Chapel. The response was as gratifying as it was unexpected, considering the many worthy objects for which appeals flooded the country.

We have moved into this property where our workers are housed and which serves as a meeting place for the different classes and various activities of our growing mission work.

There is still due upon the property and equipment nearly $3,260.00, which will be due early in April, and we wish to wipe out this indebtedness as soon as possible. We hate to keep begging, but somehow—from somewhere—we must secure funds to clear our Mission Home of edbt. Who will help?

The late Bishop Brown, on two occasions, said, that he considered the work being done at St. Andrew's one of the very best social service works anywhere in the diocese.

The Right Rev. St. George Tucker, present Bishop, endorses th's appeal.

I agree to subscribe to the above fund the sum of $..... , to be paid in cash or istalments as follows.....

Please make checks payable to Rev. W. B. Everett, III, Marshall, Va., or Mr. John T. Ramey, Parish Treasurer, Marshall, Va.

CHARLES YANCEY LIGON.

CHARLES YANCEY LIGON, only son of the late Dr. John and Sallie Warwick Ligon, of Clover Lick, W. Va., died at his home in Prestonsburg, Ky., on December 17, 1928, in the forty-sixth year of his age. He leaves a wife, Osa Fitzpatrick, and one daughter, Mrs. John Clarke, and four sisters. Mr. Ligon was a member of Grace Episcopal Church, of Clover Lick, W. Va. He was a friend to all.

CELIA NELSON GOOLRICK.

In Memoriam.

Entered into the joy of Paradise at Fredericksburg Va., on February 1, 1929. MRS. CELIA NELSON GOOLRICK, widow of Dr. W. B. Goolrick and daughter of Keating S. Nelson and Julia Rogers Nelson of "Belvoir," Albemarle County, Va., and granddaughter of Governor Thomas Nelson of Yorktown, being the nearest living descendant. Early in life she moved to Culpeper, Va., where her father conducted the first Episcopal Church School in Virginia. Shortly after her marriage, she made her home in Fredericksburg, Va. She is survived by three children, William K. Goolrick, Celia Bruce Goolrick and Mrs. W. J. Lacy, of Fredericksburg, Va. Three children preceded her to the grave, K. Nelson Goolrick, Virginia May Goolrick and Charles T. Goolrick. She was a sister of the late Bishop Kinloch Nelson of the Episcopal Diocese of Georgia. Mrs. Goolrick was a gentle, cultured woman of fine intellect and beautiful character and won the admiration of a large circle of friends. All who knew her, recall her charming gift of conversation, a gift that grows rarer as the years go by. However, Mrs. Goolrick's chief charm was in the intimate relation of her home. Here her tender love and care as faithful wife and mother knew no limit of sacrifice. In times of repeated and overwhelming grief there was always submission and perfect faith in an allwise Father's love. She was a devoted Christian and loyal communicant of St. George's Episcopal Church. While we catch feeble glimpses of the approaching Easter-tide, we rejoice in the full assurance that she stands in the light of Life Eternal and is satisfied with the full knowledge of her Risen Lord.

"Oh, the beauty! oh, the gladness! of that resurrection day;
Which shall not through endless ages pass away."

Dean Robbins to Join Permanent Preaching Staff of the Church of the Heavenly Rest.

Sunday morning the following announcement was read by the Rev. Dr. Henry Darlington, rector of the Church of the Heavenly Rest and Chapel of the Beloved Disciple, at the eleven o'clock service in the new Parish House at 2 East Ninetieth Street:

"The vestry of the Church of the Heavenly Rest and Chapel of the Beloved Disciple is happy to announce that arrangements have been made for the Very Rev. Howard Chandler Robbins, formerly Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, to become an associate preacher on the clergy staff of this church.

"Beginning with next October, he will always be with us on the fourth Sunday of the month, both morning and afternoon, and at such other times as opportunity may offer.

"A leave of absence has been granted to the rector, starting the middle of next month. Dean Robbins will preach at the morning services beginning April 14 through the first Sunday in June, with the exception of April 28, when he will be at Amherst College."

"The St. Peter and St. Paul Foundation"

A gift of $200,000 was announced by Bishop Manning in a letter read at the dinner of the Church Club, New York City, on January 31, which he was forbidden by his physicians to attend. The gift is to be held as a trust fund, to be known as the St. Peter and St. Paul Foundation, and the interest used, at the discretion of the Bishop, for the help of the weaker parishes and missions and to aid in the erection of new churches and chapels wherever needed in the Diocese of New York.

The donor was described as a generous and devoted Churchwoman of the diocese who requested that her name should not be divulged.

The speakers at the dinner were Dr. Angell, President of Yale University, and the Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates.

Bishop Manning's letter was read by the President of the Church Club, Mr. George E. Fahys.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

In the Associate Missions Field.

The Rev. J. J. Ambler, Jr., of Dante, underwent an operation for appendicitis in the hospital there, February 11. There seems to have been no dangerous complications, an he is now progressing normally on the road to recovery. Mr. Ambler is assistant, in the Dante area, to the Rev. Herbert H. Young, Dean of Associate Missions. For the present his place is being filled by Captain Wiese of the Church Army. Before joining the Church Army and while a student at DuBose Memorial Church Training School, Mr. Wiese spent some of his vacation time in the Associate Missions field. It is a great pleasure to have him in the diocese again, even for a brief period.

Since the Rev. John S. Wellford accepted the rectorship of St. Thomas' Church at Abingdon, Va., on September 1, 1929, there has been no regular clergyman at All Saints' Church, Norton, and the mission at Toms Creek. Recently Bishop Jett placed these two points under the care of the Rev. H. H. Young, Dean of Associate Missions. Mr. Young has three assistants: the Rev. Messrs. Edward W. Hughes of Pearisburg, John A. Wilson of Richlands and J. J. Ambler, Jr., of Dante. It is probable that Mr. Ambler, being the nearest of the three, will give special attention to the work at Norton and Toms Creek.

Mr. W. H. B. Loving.

With the deepest regret we note the death of Mr. W. H. Bruce Loving in the early morning of Sunday, February 24, at his home in Raleigh Court, Roanoke, Va. Funeral services were conducted Monday afternoon at Christ Church by the Rev. W. Taylor Willis, rector, with interment in Evergreen Cemetery.

Mr. Loving was a devoted member of Christ Church, formerly a vestryman and, at the time of his death, a member of the "Associate Vestry". His widow, Mrs. Grace C. Loving, is the beloved Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary. He is also survived by a daughter, Miss Margaret Loving, of Roanoke.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Men's Club.

The forty-sixth anniversary of the Men's Club of Epiphany Chapel was commemorated by a meeting on Tuesday evening, February 26, the place of meeting being the same room used by this Men's Club continuously for forty-six years. An account of this meeting which is one of significance in the life of the diocese, appeared in part in the "Epiphany Guide" as follows:

"The special guest and speaker of the evening was the Rev. G. Freeland Peter, D. D., Canon of Washington, who at one time was Vicar of the Chapel. Canon Peter, who was presented to the men by the Rev. Mr. Lier, spoke very feelingly of the pleasant memories he has of his association with the 'Men's Meeting', and also commented on the widespread influence that it has unconsciously created. The speaker referred to the place of assembly as "another Upper Room, consecrated to the service of God'.

"A special musical and social program, arranged under the competent leadership of Mrs. Ella L. Limerick, Mrs. Mary D. Farrar and Mrs. W. W. Riley, was greatly enjoyed by the men and women present. Mr. and Mrs. Ross Farrar each sang groups of well-known songs, and Mrs. J. S. Detwiler gave an interesting reading.

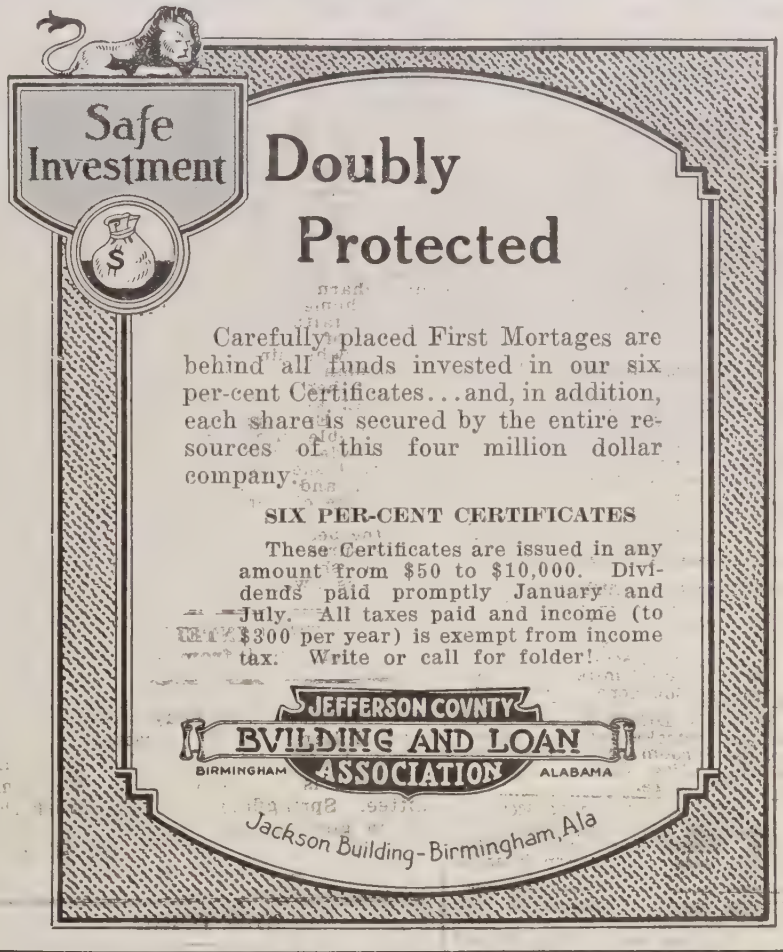
"It will interest the members of the Parish to learn that two men, Messrs. George and John Matheney, who were present at the first meeting and one who has attended regularly ever since the second meeting, Abram Price, were present last Tuesday evening.

"Any notice pertaining to the 'Men's Meeting', is incomplete without one word of precious memory of one of the founders of the organization, namely, Mrs. Mary A. Hodges, whose soul of pure white, Christian simplicity and far-reaching influence, still goes marching on!"

Emmanuel Church Shows Record Growth.

Emmanuel Church, Anacostia, often regarded as one of the smaller parishes of the diocese, is rapidly changing its position and by reason of unusual growth and activity, becoming one of those classed as the stronger parishes. The rector, the Rev. Luther B. Franck, who has served in that position only a few years, is doing outstanding work in this parish. For the past three years, along with the increased activities, there has been felt an intensified spiritual awakening among the people. It all seems to have been epitomized in a recent confirmation class, when Bishop Freeman laid hands on sixty-two persons. The number would have been sixty-six, except for the illness of four of the number prepared. During the past three years the confirmations at Emmanuel Church have numbered in all 142 persons, and the offerings to the Church's Program have increased over 900 per cent. Bishop Freeman, at his recent visitation there, commented on this fine record and commended the rector and people for their splendid achievement. The Rev. Mr. Franck entered the ministry from Virginia and received his education and training in Virginia. The state is proud of him and thankful for him. He has visited Richmond several times since his rectorship at Emmanuel Church and has conducted missions there. His parish ties in Richmond are with old St. John's, Church Hill.

Woman's Auxiliary.



The diocesan meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary for the month of March was held in St. Thomas' Church, on Tuesday, March 5. The special speaker was Miss Margaretta Ridgley, who told of the Church's Work in Liberia, Africa. Mrs. Spencer Wood, of Christ Church, Georgetown, and Diocesan President of the Auxiliary, presided.

CANON DYSON HAGUE, ONE OF AMERICA'S GREATEST BIBLE SCHOLARS

EXPOSES GREAT ERRORS IN BISHOP GORE'S NEW COMMENTARY

Probably no commentary, not even Peake's, has come out with such a blare of trumpets as this new commentary of Bishop Gore's. It has been anticipated with great eagerness and no one who is at all acquainted with the life of Bishop Gore can fail to recognize his eminence in the religious world to-day, or his undoubted piety, godliness, and zeal for Christ. Many of the writers are men of eminence in the modern world of scholarship, and all of them unquestionably able. But what one feels with regard to the Commentary as a whole is that it is on the wrong side. As anyone can see who goes into it at all carefully, it is an extremely one sided book, and unfortunately in nine cases out of ten throughout it sides with what is called "The Critical School." Its tendency throughout is unquestionably to weaken faith in the Bible, and to shake the old foundations of trust and faith in the Bible as the Word of God. As a whole, it makes the fundamental error of the modern school of attempting to establish faith in the New Testament by dis-establishing faith in the Old. You cannot settle by unsettling, or strengthen by weakening. When one compares with it the magnificent commentaries of the past, the Speaker's Commentary, the Pulpit Commentary, the introductions to the Biblical Illustrator, one is struck at once with the immense gap that yawns between the writings of men who accept the Bible as divine revelation, stamped with divine inspiration and authority, and those who regard the early chapters of Genesis as unhistoric folklore and follow generally the conclusions of what are called the Higher Critics. As a matter of fact, the Commentary accepts the position of the Critical School, both with regard to the Old and, in measure, with regard to the New Testament. In Genesis the writer followers Driver like a child, and it is well known that Driver follows Wellhausen and Keunen and accepts most positively the theory of the J. E. P. D. documents. "It was in rationalistic workshops," says Professor Orr, "that the critical theory was elaborated. It is rationalistic in its basis and in every fibre of its construction." It is a thousand pities, therefore, that such eminent scholars should have accepted and exploited views which, in the beginning, were elaborated by men who were the foes to supernatural religion and to the Bible as the churches accept it. I have been reading very carefully during the last week the pages of Gore and Peake and in almost parallel columns the writings of those great scholars, Professor Green of Princeton and Professor Orr of Glasgow and the Rev. A. H. Finn, whose masterly work on the "Unity of the Pentateuch" ought to be studied carefully by every advocate of the modernist position. The great contention of the Driver-Gore school is that we must follow truth, and the conclusions of scholarship must be accepted. That truth is mighty and must prevail, thank God, we all believe; but scholarship is a different matter. While I would not say that the new commentary is characterized by daring profanity and colossal ignorance as one Old Country critic asserted, or that it is not an intelligent book for all its pretence of learning as the president of the Wesleyan Conference in England publicly asserted, I would say without any hesitation that nearly all the writers in Gore follow the leading of men whose scholarship, based on purely literary grounds, nearly always tends to the end of eliminating the supernatural, and their methods, in spite of all the high claim of scholarship, are sometimes positively fantastic. They ignore the fact that their supposed discrepancies can easily be harmonized, the inconsistencies and incongruities and anachronisms that they discover can be explained, and the passages they suppose to indicate differences of authorships, interpolating designers, variant accounts and diversities of authorship can be and have been accounted for by a reverent and earnest investigation. Both Green and Orr have torn into many more fragments the hypotheses of the critics than the critics have torn into pieces the books of the Pentateuch and the prophecies of Isaiah and Zechariah. What saddens one about the whole of the Commentary and of the modernist treatment is the avidity with which they seize any text or chapter that seems to support in any way the rationalistic position or may be taken as affording evidence for the rationalistic view. They say they cannot maintain any longer the old literal approach to the Bible. But that is a very different thing from greedily swallowing the main theories of the destructive school of biblical criticism. They are obsessed with a fear of the old orthodoxy that would be amusing if it were not so serious. They accuse others of following the old fundamentals like sheep and have a contempt for opinions handed on from the past. Yet they themselves follow like sheep the German rationalistic school and are themselves slaves to the authority of the school of Wellhausen. They placidly ignore the fact that Wellhausen has been demolished by Ruppercht, Miller and Winckler, and the views of Driver, Chapman, Bicknell and Eiith by Green, Orr and Finn. Their attitude is essentially unscientific. As slaves to the school of Wellhausen, they refuse to consider the other side put forth by such unquestioned scholars as Green and Orr, with a there-is-no-other side pooh pooh! We admit, of course, that the English scholars in moderation of tone differ obviously from the rationalistic German school, but what we deplore is their tendency, like the Germans, to take from the honor and glory of God's inspiring Spirit and to give to men who are not moved by the Holy Ghost, and even to Babylonian and Pagan authors a portion in this Holy Word of God. We feel that the vast body of Christians will still read the Bible as the Word of God for the purpose of soul-edification, but we are sure also that where criticism in the name of misguided scholarship tells us that the records of Genesis are largely legendary, undoubtedly based upon Babylonian traditions, and much of the Old Testament is folklore and not literal history, the stories legendary and worthless, the joy as well as the glory of God's Word will have departed. The writer would like to add a list of more reliable and valuable commentaries, commentaries that are commentaries and not mere criticisms. There are, for instance, vastly superior to Peake and Gore in scholarship, dignity and spiritual insight as real Bible commentaries, the Speaker's Bible—the Students' Edition—six volumes, and Ellicott, six volumes; and for illumination and real helpfulness that grand old commentary of Matthew Henry, which has been the inspiration of myriads and now after two hundred and twenty years has appeared again in a fine new edition of six volumes. (Marshall Bros., London, Eng.) There are larger works, such as the Pulpit Commentary, the Biblical Illustrator, or Parker's People's Bible, all of which are scholarly and valuable, positive and constructive, and almost entirely free from the destructive Germanism and self-conceit that pervades and vitiates Peake's Commentary. Smaller and more within the reach of the average reader are the one-volumed and cheaper works: Jamieson, Fausset and Brown's Old Testament and New Testament; Gray's Christian Workers' Commentary; and the latest of all, The Students' Commentary (Thynne and Jarvis), all of which can be ordered through any bookseller in the United States. If some of these are old, let the reader be assured that they are as sound as the day when they were written. God's Truth does not change.

THE ATONEMENT

BY ARCHDEACON F. W. NEVE, D. D., OF VIRGINIA.

That Christ died for our sins according to the Gospel is one of the fundamental truths of the Christian religion. There have been a number of theories put forth at various times in the endeavor to explain this doctrine, but none of them has been entirely satisfactory for the good reason that none of them covers the whole ground. Fortunately we are not required to understand the Atonement in order to get the benefit of it, but only to believe it. What follows is simply an attempt to throw some light upon the subject, and in order to do so I shall follow two separate and distinct lines of thought. The first has to do with that aspect of the truth which may be referred to as at-one-ment, the other with Atonement.

Some of the Greek fathers regarded the creation of man as the first stage of, and a preparation for, the Incarnation, and there is a good deal in this idea, for man was made in the divine image and therefore was linked to the divine nature in such a way as to be capable of union and communion with God.

The marks of the divine image are three-fold: In the first place, the mind of man is capable of reflecting the mind of God; what is truth to God can be recognized as truth by the mind of man, and thus man is capable of sharing God's mind and purpose.

In the second place, there is in man a moral consciousness which is capable of recognizing goodness as an ideal to be desired and striven for, and this goodness has its source in God Himself, in Whom alone supreme goodness is to be found. "Be ye holy, for I am holy," was the divine command which showed that God intended man not only to realize His goodness but to share in it.

In the third place, man was made with a capacity for loving and responding to the love of God. In fact, love is the supreme motive in man's life and character, and Jesus Christ made love to God and love to one's neighbor the essential characteristics of His religion, and since He declared that "God is Love," the kinship between God and man could not be more clearly established. We may therefore say with good reason that there were, in man's nature, the rudiments, as it were, of the divine natures which formed a sort of preparation for the union of the two natures in Christ.

In the Incarnation we are taught that the Son of God created for Himself a human body together with all that goes to make up a human being, save that His Person took the place of a human personality, which is the property of every other member of the human family. There was also one other exception: He was without sin.

Of late years there has been a revival of the Socinian or Unitarian theory that Christ was a human person, born in the ordinary way, but specially endowed with the Holy Spirit, which made Him, in a certain sense, a Son of God, just as other men are capable of becoming, and not THE Son of God.

Thus it is argued that to be a perfect man He must have a human personality, but the fact is overlooked that the only way by which man can be perfect is by sharing in the divine nature, since it is only in God that he finds the complete fulfilment of that part of his nature which was made in the image of God. St. Paul says: "Ye are complete in Him," that is to say that in Christ as the Son of God, our nature rises to complete perfection, which could not be brought about in any other way. For Christ could not have become perfect man unless He had first been the Son of God.

There is also another point which needs to be made clear, and that is that Christ, by taking to Himself our nature in union with His own, became THE Son of man, and not A Son of man, since by virtue of His being the Son of God He took to Himself the whole of our human nature and became the representative of humanity, which made it possible for Him to represent mankind as a whole before God, and also enable all men, including every possible individual type of manhood to find the fulfilment of their hopes and and aspirations in Him. It is as Tennyson says, "We are but broken lights of Thee," but our individual broken lights find themselves complete in Him as the Sun of Righteousness.

St. Anselm, the great theologian of the middle ages, wrote a treatise entitled, "Cur Deus Homo," why should God become man? Of course the answer would be for the redemption of mankind, but there seems to be a wider and more important reason than this, and it is that man's creation and man's redemption were both part of a larger plan to bring the whole of creation, through our human nature, into a closer relationship with God and to raise it to a higher level.

And so the New Creation marks a new stage in the fulfilment of the divine purpose with regard not only to man, but to creation as a whole.

A LENTEN PRAYER.

Martha L. L. Doughty.

Dear God, help me not to look with scorn
On those whom I feel have done some wrong,
Recall to me mine evesy weakness
And please clothe my life with humbleness:

Cleanse my heart from things that are unkind,
Refresh and calm and rule my mind,
Let my whole life speak only for Thee.
O God, bless me with humility.

While I feel so laden down with sin
Forgive me for all the wrong that's been,
Forgive me, Saviour, and help me be Strong and a lifelong witness for Thee.

THE ROAD TO CALVARY.

God rides in triumph and the people shout,
They wave green palms, and cast their garments down
For Him to tread on, and the merry rout
Of men and women cheer Him to the town.

So God the King-Creator stoops so low,
He comes in our own way, as we desire,
In pomp and glory, out, alás! to show
This way will never raise us from the mire.

Such triumph is but failure; it will end
In cold rejection and in wild disdain.
And so it proved. Without a single friend
God bore the world's great cross of sin and pain.

Men chose the way of palms—it could
God chose the way of Calvary, and through sin
He made a pathway clean and straight and brave,
It leads to joy if we will walk therein.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Only the ignorant man can be irreverent.

To preach the truth "in love" is to preach against every heresy.

The greatness of our service depends on its Master and not on the work.—E. J. Brown.

The will of God will be done; but, oh! the unspeakable loss for us if we have missed our opportunity of doing it.—Bishop Westcott.

The forest trees—
Do they fall round us into builded homes
Without an axe or arm? The blowing winds
Are but the servants when we hoist a sail.

"Christ leads us
Through no darker rooms
Than He went through before."

"There is not one visible Church, and another invisible; but one Church invisible in the spiritual, and visible in the material world, and as God cares for both body and soul, so does Christ govern the external affairs of the Church, just as certainly as with His grace He nourishes it internally."

Why does He bear these agonies of sin's guilt?
Why dies He there, this Son of God Divine?
Whose sin hath nailed—oh! that one shrinks from utt'ring!
For, brethren, lo! the sin was yours and mine!

Fidelity in little things is one of the surest tests of character.

Sinless, as chief Transgressor,
He
Poured out His blood upon the tree,
While Penitence and unbelief
Reaped His compassion, and His grief!

If in the course of duty you are tried by the distrust of friends, gird up your loins and say in your heart, I was not driven to virtue by the encouragement of friends, nor will I be repelled from it by their coldness. Be just and fear not; "corruption wins not more than honesty"; truth lives and reigns when falsehood dies and rots.—Dr. Thomas Guthrie.

What a bold religion this faith of Christ is! No human ambitions has ever touched the height of its aspirations. The faiths of the world have sought their glory in the part; this faith forgets the things that are behind. It has no past. It is all future, all desire, all longing; it presses on to the mark for a prize. Yet say not this is pride in my soul; it is the very breath of humility. It is because my soul is humble that it is aspiring. If I were satisfied with my past, that would be pride. But when I press on to something in the front I do so because I feel poor. Pride is the opposite of aspiration. Pride watches over her conquered treasures. Aspiration soars away into the far future and reaches forth to the things that are before.—George Matheson.

VICTORY

Crude and simple minds, expanded and guided by impulse of the Divinity within us, which knows no horizon or boundaries, can grasp the illimitable width and depth of the philosophy and meaning of Lent, Palm Sunday and Easter. The season and the days commemorate and should bring to us teaching and example for conduct of the high and loyal soul in all the vicissitudes of life.

The forty days of poverty, loneliness and hunger in the wilderness were borne with courage unflinching and faith unfaltering. The temptation to the Saviour to prove His own kinship to God before a mocking scoffer, to acquire supreme earthly power and wealth by one act of treason to duty and right, was put aside without loud protestation of righteousness or noisy denunciation of the tempter, with tranquil recital of the command for allegiance to the Father. The entrance to Jerusalem was a victory over victory, a triumph over triumph. Probably the applause of the multitudes makes the most searching and trying test to which humanity may be subjected. The pages of history are crowded with stories of men and women and nations wrecked by successes, large or small. Most of us have like instances in our own memories, occurring within our own observation. The Saviour went direct from amid the resounding plaudits and hosannahs, to dare the wrath of influence and invite vengeance by cleansing the Temple and sternly rebuking and punishing those who were profaning it, with sanction of custom and public sentiment and the law as administered. He accepted no compromise, disregarded danger and resentment, spared no sting from his words. This one of the few manifestations of sternness in the life here of the gentle and loving Saviour is a call clear as a bugle peal to those who would serve God to put aside all considerations of safety or selfishness or the adulation or malediction of the multitude in fighting sacrilege and hypocrisy and upholding the cause of God. It is a warning, too, fearful as any ever uttered or expressed, to all who would commercialize the Church, to those who are in it for personal advantage, guilty and inviting the scorn and wrath of the Almighty as surely as the money changers whose tables were overturned and those who sold doves.

From the hunger and isolation of the wilderness; from the glittering proffer of kingdoms and supremacy; from the shouted praises and chanted worship of the multitudes; from the daring defiance of wealth and authority, the Saviour went to victory over apparent defeat, triumph over the direst sorrows the heart may feel, the most dreadful pains the body can suffer. He went to betrayal and desertion by once loved friends, to humiliation, to the contemptuous gibes of foes and shouts of detestation and taunt from the populace, to the solitary agony of Gethsemane and the hours of anguish on the Cross. He was victor over all; triumphed over the most inveterate enemies by His parting prayer that they be forgiven, over death itself; rose to glorious resurrection made the more glorious by new promises of mercy, no word of condemnation for those who had persecuted Him, new exhortation that the message of salvation and deliverance and hope be carried to all mankind—the same message proclaimed to the shepherds from the skies at the Annunciation entrusted to the eleven humble men at the Ascension.

The narrative is familiar to all Bible readers and attendants at Church services. The succession of demonstrations of the highest, finest, purest qualities known to humanity, and evidences of our kinship to divinity win our love and admiration and inspire us to emulation. It may be, however, that many of us fail to realize how absolutely and irrefutably the chapters and verses telling of the fasting, the temptations, the entry to Jerusalem, the cleansing of the Temple, the crucifixion and the resurrection, prove the truth of the Scriptures, the divinity of Christ and the inspiration of the Apostles.

Greek, Roman and Egyptian philosophers had splendid minds, access to all the learning of their time. Many of them sought all their lives to know the meaning and purpose of the life, how to build pure and beautiful character. They left us many wise and uplifting maxims, precepts, lines of reasoning. None of them gave us such swiftly incisive, crisply told, wisdom as that in the proverbs of Solomon; but it is thrilling to note how closely those old living searchlights, ceaselessly busy in a firmament of mists, approached the true conception of God and our relations to Him; what distinct glimpses of divinity in humanity caught, from an atmosphere of sensualities, of worship of merely physical beauty, of stalwart virtues intermingled with sordid standards and mean treacheries. Antisthenes, four hundred years before Christ, pupil of Socrates and contemporary of Plato, said: "It is royal to do good and be abused." In the "Meditations" of Marcus Aurelius, more than a hundred years after Christ, and professing adherence, sometimes somewhat dubiously and vaguely, to the Roman deities, are passages suggesting that the author must have known something of the life and teachings of Christ. "Reverence the gods and help men," he wrote. These philosophers and thinkers sought through the centuries to spiritualize the gods in whom their nations believed. They stand very great and dignified and high compared with the small harlequins who in times since, and in our time, have posed and postured as philosophers, brandishing their toy torches of pretended discoveries, attempting to obliterate God and His Son or debase them to the human level, and to debase humanity to the level of the beasts by denying it the soul from which our highest aspirations spring and the hope of a purer and sweeter life when our vicissitudes here are ended. But the point is this—

All these really great, faithfully seeking and exploring and thinking philosophers failed to imagine a character or devise a philosophy and plan of life like that of Christ. These were beyond their scope beyond the reach of their powerful, trained and earnest minds. Obscure men in the little and obscure province of Judea recorded and gave to the world the description of a personality, of a life, a series of victories and triumphs over the most seductive temptations and terrifying dangers that can weaken resolution and overcome valor, such as the great philosophers of the great centres of intellect and art and culture could not imagine.

In addition to the many other lessons of the Lenten and Palm Sunday and Good Friday and Easter time, we may gather assurance that the events in the Gospels we honor by special observance bring us proof beyond dispute by sanity and honesty of the truth and inspiration of the Scriptures. It is impossible to imagine that these remote and unknown men of Judea could have constructed such a character, such a symmetrical, cohesive narrative of trials and tests and triumphs, as the active, deeply and widely searching minds of Greece and Rome could not construct; that these unlettered and poor men, knowledge and thought limited by their immediate surroundings and restricted by their daily toil for food, could have invented the parables and the precepts and teachings they recorded.

Nearing the end of Lent, telling of victories over the varied and contrasted temptations of life, beginning the week telling us of the victory over death, it will be well for us, as we attend the Palm Sunday service, to realize the victory the Scriptures give us over doubts and denials, petty seeking of flaws, cheap sneers at sacred things and obligations. All our minds can grasp and realize the magnificence and majesty of the teachings and promise and glory recorded for us by these few lowly Jews. All of us can comprehend the perfect harmony of the Holy Scriptures. Moses, chosen servant of God and deliverer of Israel, received amid the darkness and thunder and lightning on the crest of Sinai the word of God, died in solitude, after being permitted to look on the earthly land of promise. Across seventeen intervening centuries and hundreds of generations, crowded with alternating calamities and glories, the Son of God, deliverer of Israel and mankind, preached from the Mount to eager multitudes the promises of God, assurance of eternal home and refuge to be won, not by arms and combat and conquest, but by love and service. The Law Giver was buried in a grave, unknown to man, by heavenly hands. The divine messenger of the new law died and by heavenly hands was taken from the sepulchre to ascend to Heaven. From Commandments to Beatitudes. Surely the more closely we consider and scan and study the facts, the more absolute the proof of the sure development of mysterious, almighty purposes for deliverance, redemption and blessing of mankind. With penitence and new resolves for better and higher work and living and loving gratitude, Lent and Holy Week should bring us also stronger and more intense faith, deeper conviction of the endurance and triumph of truth against which no power of error or evil may prevail.

A Visit to Our Educational Chaplain in Jerusalem

By the Rt. Rev. Joseph M. Francis, D. D., Bishop of Indianapolis.

On a visit in Jerusalem two years ago, I had the pleasure of spending much of it with the Rev. C. Thorley Bridgeman, our Educational Chaplain, and an opportunity of seeing something of his work. The time was all too short for sight-seeing and for personal contacts, but we made the most of it. Mr. Bridgeman very kindly gave us a full day and under his guidance we made profitable visits to the sacred places. A visit was paid to the Anglican Bishop in Jerusalem, and another to the Theological School in the Armenian Monastery on Mount Zion, in which Mr. Bridgeman is the Professor of Practical Theology, Preaching and English. There I had the pleasure of giving a greeting to the interesting body of students and teachers, one of whom was an Armenian Bishop. In the evening, after dinner with Mr. Bridgeman, I had a delightful conference with him and his associates.

My impressions, after seeing and hearing even the little that was possible in the restricted time, were very definite. First, the work undertaken in Palestine by the whole Anglican Communion, the Jerusalem and the East Mission, which our Good Friday offerings help to support and with which Mr. Bridgeman is associated as our representative, while teeming with difficulties, has tremendous value both as an evangelistic agency and a unifying force. Second, the contribution made by our American Church both in money and in Mr. Bridgeman is of real worth; and, third, an associate for Mr. Bridgeman is urgently needed. Our Educational Chaplains in the Near East are entirely dependent upon the Good Friday Offering.

Mr. Bridgeman has close relations with the various Eastern Churches represented in Palestine, especially with that of the Armenians. The opportunity for helpful new contacts is constantly growing. Much of his time is devoted to teaching in the Armenian Theological School in the effort—to quote his own words—"to supply the Armenian Church with a new generation of well-trained clergy to replace those hundreds of educated men who were lost in the dreadful war period." Nevertheless, not a little of his time and effort must be spent in elementary teaching. To relieve Mr. Bridgeman of some of the latter duties would set him free for a wider and more effective service.

Blessed Be His Name

I have a Friend whose faithful love
  Is more than all the world to me;
'Tis higher than the heights above,
  And deeper than the soundless sea:
    So old, so new,
    So strong, so true—
Before the earth received its frame
He loved me.—Blessed be His name!

His was the highest place above,
  Adored by all the sons of flame,
Yet, such His self-denying love,
  He laid aside His crown, and came
    To seek the lost:
    And at the cost
Of heavenly rank and earthly fame,
He sought me,—Blessed be His name!

It was a lonely path He trod,
  From every human soul apart;
Known only to Himself and God
  Was all the grief that filled His heart:
    Yet from the track
    He turned not back
Till, where I lay in want and shame,
He found me.—Blessed be His name!

Then dawned at last that day of dread
  When, desolate, yet undismayed,
With wearied frame and thorn-crowned head
  He, now forsaken and betrayed,
    Went up for me
    To Calvary;
And, dying there in grief and shame,
He saved me.—Blessed be His name!

Long as I live my song shall tell
  The wonders of His matchless love.
And, when at last I rise to dwell
  In the bright home prepared above,
    My joy shall be
    His face to see,
And bowing then with loud acclaim,
I'll praise Him.—Blessed be His name.

VIA CRUCIS

By Kenneth Mackenzie

THE CROSS is the focus of history. Beyond it lie centuries of darkness. Before it radiate streams of light. By its means myriads of souls have been drawn Godward; and in turn have caught inspiration to make the world the better for the illumination, inspiration and life it conferred. The Cross is equally the mystery of the ages. Before it, philosophy has stood baffled and confounded. It has been a stumbling block to the worldly-wise, an unsolved enigma to the speculations of skepticism. The warning of the Apostle has been confirmed by the testimony of time, "The preaching of the cross is to them that perish, foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the dynamics of God" (1 Cor. 1:18). When that lovable man, William James, having studiously traversed all the spheres of religious experience, came to his ripened maturity in the enriched knowledge with which he was so signally possessed, he wrote as probably his last message, "There is no conclusion. What has been concluded that we might conclude in regard to it? There are no fortunes to be told and there is no device to be given. Farewell." That other man whom we have quoted, equally insatiate to discover and appropriate truth who cried in passionate devotion, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. 6:14) came to the end of his life, the sword of martyrdom impending, crying, "I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. ... The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge shall give me in that day" (2 Tim. 1:12; 4:7, 8).

Between these two men and the great company which they represent, stands the Cross in majestic silence, an everlasting challenge to mankind. Destiny is determined by our attitude towards it; for we cannot evade it. Turn where we will, it still confronts us. Acceptance or rejection is the eternal determination. And the men be careless of its appeals, religious instinct, when not over-mastered by a persistent obstinacy, comes to the fore in hours of need. Captain Smith, the night before the fated Titanic left port, was honored by a dinner at which he said, "Gentlemen, the Titanic simply cannot sink; there is nothing known that will be able to overcome her proof against any possible element of destruction". With pride in his heart, that he might surpass the record of any previous ship, he urged his engines through the treacherous ice fields of the North Atlantic, bearing his precious freight of human life to an unparalleled tragedy. The subtle impact of the hidden iceberg, was not discernible to the happy, care-free passengers on that memorable Sunday evening. But the filling bulkheads gave ominous warning of the irreparable cataclysm. The salons thronged with innocent men, women and children whiling the hours away at the card-tables, reading, chatting or otherwise awaiting the hour of retiring, making glad in the midst of assured secure surroundings. No picture of the awful transformation would be adequate to describe the scene, when the life boats had taken all that could be removed and stark death stood before the affrighted passengers, the leader of the band at the head of his brave men, led them in playing, "Nearer my God to Thee". Hoarse throated men and women, sang as they never had, "E'en tho it be a Cross that raiseth me". No contemptuous cynic has dared to protest against this as a religious superstition. It went into history as the token of a resident faith in this emblem of God's love and compassion, vitalized by the death of Him who permitted Himself to be called the Son of God.

And if we regard this august insignia of the divine yearning for the restoration of humanity to fellowship with God as merely indicating an example of patient suffering by Him who bore it and hung upon it, we miss the core of the truth it signifies. There is that, to be sure, but infinitely more. Ours is the quest to find what that more may be.

There is a tradition that on the first day of the year of release, when all obligations among the Israelites must be cancelled, the pious Jew would wend his way to the debtor's home at break of day and nail to his door post the due bill receipted and folded over. This may have been in the mind of the Apostle when in describing the result of Calvary's accomplishment, he avers that "the bond (R. V. for handwriting of ordinances) that was against us (our indemnity, forfeited by our incompetency to pay and our failure to pay) was by our glorious Lord taken away and nailed to His Cross" (Col. 2:14). This is the ground of New Testament doctrine. Sin within as an infection and sins expressed as a resultant, are both removed from accountability to those who embrace the provision. "There is, therefore, now no judgment to them that are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1). Let us be certified that not the human Jesus in the flesh as a great Teacher and Leader, but the Christ on the Cross secures this.

There is another feature of the folded due bill of the Jewish creditor. We have in Isa. 40:2, the memorable passage immortalized by oratorio, "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." This cannot mean double punishment, for in another passage (Isa. 61:7) we read, "In their land they shall possess the double; everlasting joy shall be unto them". Our Lord, so to speak, folds our forfeited bond double, in the double grace of His tenderness, and nails it thus to His Cross where no demon may bring it to light, where no human hand may drag it down. Thus sin forgiven by this gracious transaction is sin (and sins) forgotten, and angels rejoice in our behalf because of this marvellous estate (Heb. 10:17; Luke 15:10).
